

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. CASES

DECIDED IN

THE BRITISH GLANZSTOFF MANUFACTURING COMPANY, LIMITED, (Pursuers) Appellants.—Lord-Adv. Ure—Hudson—D. Anderson. No. 1.
THE GENERAL ACCIDENT, FIRE, AND LIFE ASSURANCE CORPORATION, LIMITED, (Defenders) Respondents.—Atkin, K.C.—Constable, K.C.—Norrie Miller. Oct. 28, 1912.
British Glanzstoff Manufacturing Co., Limited, v. General Accident, Fire, and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited.

Contract—Construction—Breach—Damages for delay—Measure of damages—Provision for liquidate damages for delay—Failure of contractor to complete contract—Completion of contract by other parties—Applicability of provision for liquidate damages.

A contract for the construction of certain works by a specified date contained a clause providing for liquidate damages at certain rates to be paid by the contractor for each week's delay beyond that date. A separate clause provided that, if the contractor should suspend the works, the employers might take possession of the plant and materials and engage others to complete the contract, and that, should the expenses thus properly incurred by the employers exceed the amount which would have been due to the contractor on completion of the work, the difference was to be paid by the latter to the former. The contractor became bankrupt and suspended the works, and the employers thereupon engaged other persons to complete them, but they were not completed until at least six weeks after the date specified in the original contract.

In an action of damages, at the instance of the employers, for the loss incurred by them through the failure of the contractor to fulfil his contract, the pursuers claimed, inter alia, damages for six weeks' delay at the rate specified in the liquidate damages clause.

Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that, while the pursuers were entitled to sue for damages for breach of contract, they could not found on the liquidate damages clause, as that clause applied only where the contractor had himself completed the contract, and did not apply where the employers had finished the work under a separate clause of the contract containing its own remedy.

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords.

The appeal was heard on 28th October 1912.

At the conclusion of the appellants' argument,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question which arises on this appeal is as to the construction of a contract, which was entered into between the appellants and a firm of contractors, who have since got into difficulties. The point which is to be determined is whether a certain clause, which confers

The respondents are an Insurance Company who, by a contract of guarantee, became cautioners for the carrying out by the contractors of their contract, and there is no question raised in this case that their contract covers the question at issue. What we have to determine is matter of pure construction. The contract between the original contractors and the appellants covers a number of contingencies, but the important clauses of it are clauses 24 to 26 inclusive. These clauses show that the bargain which the appellants made for themselves was that the contractors should be bound under certain penal clauses to do the work which they had undertaken to do, and that in addition to what was provided for by those clauses, the employer should have a special remedy, which was conferred by clause 26. As I read clause 26, it was this. It had previously been provided in the contract that if the contractors failed to carry out and complete the works within the time, they should be subject to certain penalties; and if on the other hand they anticipated their time, they should get certain advantages. But when we come to clause 26, there is this carefully guarded power which is given (on a certain default being made by the contractors, and certain notice being given to them) to the employer to enter and to complete the work either himself or through another contractor under the guidance of the architect, who is made the judge between the two parties, and whose duty it is to see that the employer does not put a larger burden upon the original contractors than could properly have been the case. The employer is bound by the opinion of the architect, who, on the completion of the works carried out after this taking possession and ousting of the original contractors, is to certify the amount of expense properly incurred. If by chance there has been an advantage in that the work has been more cheaply done than it would have been done under the original contract, then the original contractors, notwithstanding they have been in default, are to get the benefit. The reason is plain: this is a very exceptional remedy under which they are ousted from the contract. But if, on the other hand, the architect certifies that additional expenses have been incurred, then those are to be recovered.

Now that clause 26, as I read it, constitutes an enclave in the contract by itself providing for a special remedy. The general remedy is to be found under the earlier clauses, and among them the one which has raised the question with which we are here dealing. Clause 24 provides that "if the contractor fail to complete the works by the date named" in the previous clause, which is the 31st January 1910, "or within any extended time allowed by the architect," then the architect, if he certifies "that the works could reasonably have been completed by the said date, or within the said extended time," gives a certificate on which the contractor becomes liable to the payment of liquidated damages. The words are these: "The contractor shall pay or allow to the employer the sum of £250 sterling per week for the first four weeks, and £500 per week for all subsequent weeks, as liquidated and ascertained damages for every week beyond the said date or extended time, as the case may be, during which the works shall remain unfinished, except as provided by clause 23, and such damages may be deducted by the employer from any moneys due to the contractor." In Oct. 28. 1912. this case the appellants claim these sums as liquidated damages from the Insurance Company, who guaranteed the performance by the contractors of their contract, and the question is whether, as the procedure which has followed on the default of the contractors has been directed under clause 26, and not under the other general clauses of the contract, this clause 24, which I have just read, applies. In my opinion it does not apply, and I think it does not apply for two reasons: first of all, that it is altogether inapt to the provisions made by clause 26, which contain a complete code of themselves; and secondly, because upon its construction I read it as meaning that if the contractors have actually completed the works, but have been late in completing the works, then, and in that case only, the clause applies. Under the circumstances in which this appeal comes before us the contractors have not completed the works; on the contrary, they have been ousted from the works by the employers under their powers given them by clause 26. I am therefore of the same opinion as the learned Judges in the Court of Session, who were unanimous in holding that clause 24 has no application to the present case, and I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed, with the usual consequences.

Lord

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I concur in the judgment which has been delivered.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—In this action liquidated damages are asked against the original contractor named Brown. During the period stipulated in the contract for the completion of the works another contractor named Henshaw was called in, Brown having become bankrupt. The damages therefore here claimed are claimed as liquidated in respect of such number of weeks as is estimated to be the time which Brown would have taken to complete the contract had Henshaw not been called in. This problematical estimate seems to me, in its nature, inconsistent in principle with the very idea of pactional damages. Clause 24, in my judgment, gives no foundation for such a hypothetical claim. It only applies to the failure by Brown himself to complete his contract timeously, but it does not apply to a state of matters in which, under section 26 of the contract, a different remedy has been adopted under what is really a separate code.

I desire to add that there are two points in the judgment of Lord Macenzie¹ with which I wish to associate myself. These are as follows:—"The provision," says the learned Judge, "that the architect may allow an extension of time is of importance. The contract has been so innovated upon that no application to the architect for an extension of time by the original contractor is possible." On another point his Lordship says, and in this I also agree, "I am unable to see how the pursuers can charge Brown & Sons under a liquidate damages clause because they failed to complete the works by 31st January 1910, when, on Messrs Brown's bankruptcy, the pursuers made a contract with Henshaw & Sons to complete by 31st December 1909."

Oct. 28, 1912. On the main ground I entirely agree with what my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has said, and I am glad in conclusion to know that the actual damages, if any have been incurred, can be proved in this suit, and, if proved, will be recovered.

In 1897 the Corporation of Edinburgh, under powers conferred by Acts of Parliament, issued corporation stock, the certificates of which bore that the holders were the proprietors of a certain value "of Edinburgh Corporation Two and a half per cent Redeemable Stock, subject to the Acts of Parliament relating thereto. . . . Redeemable at par after Whitsunday 1927." The Act under which the issue in question was directly made was the Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Act, 1896, which by section 83 authorised the issue of a new class of stock "redeemable at the option of the Corporation at one and the same period to be fixed by the Corporation, but not exceeding sixty years from the first issue of such stock."

Held on a construction of the statutes (rev. judgment of the Extra Division) that the Corporation were not bound, on the application of the holders, to redeem the stock at par at Whitsunday 1927, but had merely an option of so doing.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This appeal raises a question of construction on a section in one of a series of private Acts, and, as is often the case in the construction of a private Act of this kind, the relation to each other of the sections in the various Acts which have to be considered is attended with some obscurity. But although the question is an important one, and although in the view which I have to express I am differing from Judges, including Lord Kinnear, for whose opinion I have a very great respect, yet so fully and ably has the question been argued before us on both sides, and so unhesitating is the conclusion to which I have come, that I feel no difficulty in dealing with the case immediately on the conclusion of the argument.

* The leading sections of the Acts under consideration are quoted in the report of the case in the Court of Session. In addition to the sections there cited reference was made to the Edinburgh Corporation Stock Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. lvi.), secs. 2, 8, 10, 15, 21, 41, and 55; City of Edinburgh Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. lv.), secs. 41, 44, 45; the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxxii.), secs. 87, 88; the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 22, 43; the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 69), sec. 103.

In addition to the cases cited in the Court of Session the following were referred to:—In re Joseph Stocks & Co., Limited, [1912] 2 Ch. 134, at p. 140; In re Southern Brazilian Rio Grande do Sul Railway Co., [1905] 2 Ch. 78; Bodman v. Bodman, [1891] 3 Ch. 135.

Oct. 29, 1912.
British Linen Bank v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.
Lord Chancellor.

The pursuers in the action were the British Linen Bank, and they brought an action of declarator to have it established that, when a certain period should arrive, the Corporation of Edinburgh were bound to redeem the holdings of a certain stock. The stock was issued by the Corporation of Edinburgh, the appellants in this case, in 1897, under powers contained in an Act passed in the year previous. The British Linen Company were the allottees of a part of that stock, which was issued under a resolution passed by the Corporation of Edinburgh pursuant to the Act to which I have referred.

Now the whole question here is, whether the Corporation of Edinburgh are bound to redeem the stock which is held by the respondents after the expiration of a period of thirty years from 15th May 1897. Lord Sker-rington held that they were not, and dismissed the pursuers' action. On appeal to the Extra Division of the Court of Session the learned Judges who constituted that Extra Division took a different view.

The question is really a very narrow one; it turns upon the construction of a few words in the Act of 1896, and if those words were quite clear in themselves, and the Act in which they occur contained no reference to other Acts, it would be easy to deal with the question shortly. Section 83 provides that the Corporation, in addition to the powers which are contained in the previous Act of 1894, are now authorised to create and issue a new class of stock for any of their purposes "to bear any rate of dividend which the Corporation may fix, and all stock of such class shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at one and the same period to be fixed by the Corporation, but not exceeding sixty years from the first issue of such stock." If I were reading these words without any obligation to have regard to anything else, I should read the words "at one and the same period to be fixed by the Corporation" as referring to the expression "all stock," and as meaning that in whatever sections the main block of stock was issued the period of redemption was to be the same in all cases—one period for all the sections. But the great question which arises is as to the meaning of the word "redeemable." As I interpret the word it means redeemable at the option of the Corporation, the words which immediately follow "at the option of the Corporation" relating to the word "redeemable."

Now that, so far, might be simple enough, but it ceases to be simple if you proceed to import into the meaning of the words "stock and stockholder" the relation of debtor and creditor. To my mind the fundamental fallacy of the reasoning of the Court below is this, that the learned Judges have tried this question as if it could only be a question of the relation

Oct. 29, 1912. of debtor and creditor. Of course if you get the relation of debtor and creditor, then the word "redeemable" may come to have a very different significance from what it has here. A creditor is prima facie entitled at some time to get his money paid and his debt thus redeemed. But if the relation is not one of debtor and creditor the situation may well be very different.

British Linen
Bank v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

Lord
Chancellor.

The mere desire to raise money does not by any means necessarily import that you resort to the establishment of the relation of debtor and creditor. In England when the Usury Acts were in force it was legally impossible to borrow money at more than a certain rate of interest. Consequently, in order to get money, impecunious persons whose credit was not good were in the habit of doing what was very extensively done, namely, selling annuities. Sometimes these annuities had attached to them an option of repurchase on the part of the seller of the annuity. But although this was a device for getting round the difficulty of borrowing money, it substantially avoided anything that was really in the nature of borrowing by substituting the sale of a perpetual annuity. I observe that the Corporation of Edinburgh in the earlier days of its history resorted to the same device. The first of the Acts to which our attention has been called is the Act of 1838, the purpose of which was to extricate the Corporation of Edinburgh out of some of its financial difficulties. From this Act it appears that at that time the Corporation of Edinburgh, in order to get over the difficulties which it had with its creditors, granted a number of annuities which were to satisfy those creditors. The only sections to which I need refer are sections 41 and 44, which show that the debts and obligations were to be "compounded by granting, free of all charges and deductions, to all and every person in right of such debts, bonds of annuity in the manner and form hereinafter provided," at the rate of 3 per cent, and then in section 44 these are described in the form of bonds of perpetual annuity.

That was at any rate one mode in which the Corporation of Edinburgh was enabled to raise money. Then under a later Act, the Act of 1879, there was conferred a power to raise money by mortgage, which shows the Corporation exercising the power of borrowing in its real form, that of borrowing by granting debtor and creditor obligations with security.

Now, in that state of things the Act of 1894, which is the first of the two Acts with which we have to deal, was passed. The Act of 1894 contains several sections which throw light upon the question with which we are concerned. First of all, the preamble refers to the annuities granted in favour of the city creditors in lieu and satisfaction of their debts. Then there is a definition of "statutory borrowing power" in section 2, which shows that the expression is meant to include almost every form of raising money, whether by borrowing or by creating annuities.

Then we come to section 5, which enables the Corporation of Edinburgh to create a stock which is to take the place of the older securities, and which is to be one of the modes, although I think not the only mode, by which for the future the Corporation is to be able to raise its money. It is said in section 5 that where the Corporation has any statutory borrowing power it is to be empowered to create "redeemable stock to be from time to time issued for such amount within the limit of the power" at a certain price, to bear dividends as the Corporation should resolve, and to "become Oct. 29, 1912.

redeemable as hereinafter provided after the expiration of one and the same period from the first creation of Corporation stock." Then subsection 3 says that "the resolution for the first creation of Corporation stock shall provide that such stock shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at par after the expiration of a period to be fixed by the resolution not exceeding sixty years from the first creation of the stock."

British Linen
Bank v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.
Lord
Chancellor.

Now, the reason why I read that section is because it throws light upon the situation in which the Corporation stood when the Act of 1896 was passed. It shows to my mind that the Corporation had powers of raising money by issuing what were strictly speaking perpetual annuities, redeemable in the sense of being repurchasable upon certain terms, being the terms which I have mentioned. The relation was not one of debtor and creditor, the relation was one of seller and buyer of these annuities; and that being so, the presumptions which seem to have weighed in the minds of the learned Judges of the Extra Division do not seem to me to apply to these transactions. Reading the words quite simply as I have stated them they are consistent, and I think only properly consistent, with the view I have stated, which is that "redemption" merely means optional repurchase.

The Act to which I have referred is by no means perfectly drawn, and section 21 in particular, which refers to stock "issued for the whole term limited for the continuance of any loan" or issued "for part only of that term," is a section which does not seem to fit in well with the earlier sections of the Act. But the learned counsel for the appellants drew our attention to the circumstance that this section had been imported by the draftsman out of a quite different Act, the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891, of which it constitutes section 22, into the middle of this one, and that the reason why it seemed to fit ill was that its language belonged properly to a statute of another structure and dealing with a different kind of security. It may, I think, be possible to give a meaning to these words by reading them as applying to a case where part of the issue (all of which is to be redeemed at one time, if redeemed at all, by the Corporation in the exercise of its option) has been issued late, and has not got the whole term to run. It is possible in that case that there may have to be re-borrowing, and the not very happy wording of the section may be said to cover that case. But whether the section is properly worded or not, in my opinion there is nothing in the section which is sufficient to cut down what to my mind is the plain effect of the previous section, section 5; and I am confirmed in this view when I turn to section 41, which relates to the appointment of a judicial factor. In section 41 of the Act of 1894 a judicial factor is only appointed to recover the dividends; there is not a word about capital, or any suggestion that it is contemplated that there should be a capital sum due to a creditor which might have to be recovered; whereas if you turn to the Act of 1879, and equally if you turn to the general Act just referred to of 1891 which regulates borrowing in Scotland by local authorities, you find the power of the judicial factor there applied to the recovery of capital.

Having said so much, it seems to me that the question resolves itself into a very simple one. When I turn to the Act of 1896, section 83, which I

Oct. 29, 1912. have already read, and on which this question turns, it becomes, in the state of things which I have indicated, quite natural that the language should be what it is, and that the appellants should be able legitimately to rely upon it in support of their contention. If the relation is not one of debtor and creditor, but one of the seller and the buyer of annuities, then the words "and all stock of such class shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation at one and the same period to be fixed by the Corporation, but not exceeding sixty years" would naturally import "repurchasable at the option of the Corporation."

British Linen
Bank v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

Lord
Chancellor.

I have come to the conclusion that this is the true view of the statute, and that under the circumstances the only result at which I can properly arrive is that the view of the Lord Ordinary was the correct view, and that this action ought to have been dismissed. This appeal must therefore be allowed; and I move your Lordships accordingly.

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I hesitate very much to add a single word to a discussion, which has now proceeded practically for two days, on the construction of three words. I speak with most unfeigned respect for the very distinguished Judges from whom this appeal comes, but I say that I have been unable to feel the difficulty with which some of them seem to have been possessed. So far as I am concerned, I am contented with a single sentence in the Lord Ordinary's judgment which seems to me to comprehend the whole case, and upon which the case turns. "Anyone," he says, "who alleges that a redeemable stock must be redeemed, is bound, in my opinion, to show the existence of the obligation upon which he founds, and this the pursuers have failed to do." I believe that that sentence comprehends the whole that it is necessary to say upon the matter, and I entirely concur with the motion which the Lord Chancellor has proposed.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I agree.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (3)—Act of Sederunt, 26th June 1907, (2)—Arbitration—Competency—"Question" as to duration of compensation.

The employers of a workman, who had been totally incapacitated by an accident, admitted liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act, tendered the amount of compensation due (as to which there was no dispute), and requested the workman to sign a receipt which contained this clause:—"At the first or any subsequent payment liability is admitted only for the compensation to date of payment. Further liability, if any, will be determined week by week when application for payment is made." The workman objected to this clause on the Feb. 10, 1913.

ground that he was entitled to have an unqualified admission of liability, refused to sign the receipt, and initiated arbitration proceedings. The employers maintained that the arbitration was incompetent as no ques- Freeland v. Summerlee tion had arisen between the parties. Iron Co., Limited.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that there was a question between the parties as to the duration of the compensation which had not been settled by agreement, and, accordingly, that the arbitration was competent.

Gourlay Brothers & Co. (Dundee), Limited, v. Sweeney, (1906) 8 F. 965, and Payne v. N. Fortescue & Sons, Limited, [1912] 3 K. B. 346, considered.

(In the Court of Session, July 5, 1912—1912 S. C. 1145.)

The Summerlee Iron Company, respondents in the Court of Session, appealed to the House of Lords.

The appeal was heard on 10th February 1913. Counsel for the appellants, in the course of their argument, referred to the undernoted case,¹ which was not cited in the Court of Session.

At the conclusion of the appellants' argument,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question in this appeal arises under section 1, subsection 3, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which provides for recourse to arbitration in a case of dispute in the following terms :—"If any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to the liability to pay compensation under this Act (including any question as to whether the person injured is a workman to whom this Act applies), or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act, the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the First Schedule to this Act, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the Second Schedule to this Act." It is to be observed that duration is specified as one of the matters about which a question may arise, and that is not the less true because the First Schedule, by paragraph 16, provides that from time to time there may be applications to review the amount of compensation. There may be a decision that the injury is prima facie of indefinite duration, that is to say, permanent; and what the Schedule does is to provide machinery for the review of that matter from time to time as the question arises.

In this case the respondent, who was a workman in the employment of the appellant company, sustained injury to his right eye in the course of his employment as a miner in their colliery, and he has been totally incapacitated since the date at which the injury was received. There is no doubt as to the amount which the appellants are liable to pay: it is agreed that it is 14s. 9d. a week in respect of total incapacity in accordance with the Act. But a question has been raised, which is the subject of these proceedings, as to whether there is a dispute under the Act as to the duration of the compensation. The appellants, admitting liability to the extent which I have indicated, tendered payment of compensation, but on terms only; they said to the respondent that he must sign a receipt in the following terms :—"At the first or any subsequent payment liability is

Feb. 10, 1913. admitted only for the compensation to date of payment; further liability, if any, will be determined week by week when application for payment is made." The respondent objected to that on the ground that he was entitled to an admission of liability, embodied in an agreement so that he could have it recorded, or that he was entitled to arbitration, on the ground that a question had arisen as to duration. The Sheriff-substitute, while thinking there was no question, nevertheless properly stated a case for the opinion of the Court. The Second Division, taking a different view from his, laid it down as law that in this case there was a question, seeing that the contention of the appellants would have put the workman in the position of being in petitorio—that is to say that, without any prima facie right to continuance of payment in any subsequent proceedings, he would, if that contention was allowed to prevail, be deprived of the right to which he was entitled, viz., to have a question of the prima facie duration of his injury immediately determined, subject to the remedy which the appellants would have if they could discharge the burden which lay upon them on an application under paragraph 16 of the First Schedule.

Lord
Chancellor.

In that state of things the question comes before this House as to whether the decision of the Second Division was right, and reliance has been placed—I think not without apparent justification—by the learned counsel for the appellants on the case of Payne v. N. Fortescue & Sons, Limited,¹ a decision of the Court of Appeal in England upon a question which presented some analogy to the case before your Lordships.

I do not think it necessary to go in detail into the question whether Payne v. N. Fortescue & Sons, Limited,¹ was rightly decided. It is sufficient to say that there are observations in the judgment with which I do not find myself in agreement, and I cannot, in this appeal from the Court of Session, treat myself as bound by that decision. I therefore turn to the Act of Parliament itself as the only matter which concerns us here, and upon the construction of the section on which the argument turns, I am of opinion that there is a question as to duration, which arose in these proceedings, and which ought to have been decided, and upon which the respondent was entitled in presentis to have arbitration. I agree with the reasons for this conclusion given by Lord Salvesen in his judgment, and I cannot treat this case as disposed of by the principle laid down in general terms by Lord Pearson in the case of Gourlay Brothers & Company (Dundee), Limited, v. Sweeney.² The facts in the present case raise what, in my opinion, is a definite question.

Under these circumstances I agree with the decision of the learned Judges in the Second Division, and move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed.

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I concur. The case of *Gourlay Brothers & Company (Dundee), Limited, v. Sweeney*² was cited to your Lordships. I desire to add, if I may do so, a reference to that case. The Feb. 10, 1918. circumstances, which were narrated in the judgment of Lord Pearson, Freeland v. Summerlee Iron Co., Limited. were substantially these: that the employer of the workman had through- out, after the accident sustained by his employee, acknowledged liability; that he had paid compensation upon the amplest scale under which he would have been liable in law; that he continued that payment; and that he proposed to make no change in the relations so constituted. In those circumstances it was held that so long as a party has secured by private arrangement the full rights which he had either by statute or at common law, and no suggestion of a challenge of these rights by the persons so admittedly liable is made, it was not appropriate to institute proceedings under the statute, for giving him the very thing which he was then obtaining, and had throughout obtained. It is unnecessary to determine whether or not that case was properly decided; for I cannot hold that this House can consider the decision of Lord Pearson, to which I have referred, as assisting towards a conclusion in this case, the circumstances in which are so materially different and of a character so much more strongly in the direction of destroying the rights of, and the protection afforded to, the workman.

I desire particularly to add with regard to the case of Payne v. N. Fortescue & Sons, Limited,¹ that, like my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, I do not find myself in agreement with certain observations there made by the learned Judges. The circumstances of that case also do not equate with those of the present case. In the present case no payment has been made, and issue was at once taken for the determination of the rights of parties. The dates are significant. On 29th December this workman, totally incapacitated by reason of an injury to his eye, was offered by his employers a certain weekly payment on condition of granting this receipt. He declined, and on the following 5th January, no payment by the employer by that time having been made (and no payment has yet been made), he brought his application under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The whole question between the parties was stated timeously. The workman is in the position of having been injured; the employer is in the position of having declined to pay; and, with much respect to some observations which have been made in certain decided cases, the difference and dispute between the parties are not, as it humbly appears to me, confined in such a situation to the mere question of the duration of compensation.

There are three points, no doubt, as was properly stated, upon which arbitration can proceed. There is the point of liability itself; there is the point as to the amount; and there is the point as to duration. What are the conditions appended to the receipt tendered to this workman as conditions under which he was to be bound before he received any payment? They are thus expressed, namely, "At the first or any subsequent payment liability is admitted only for the compensation to date of payment. Further liability, if any, will be determined week by week when application for payment is made." These conditions appear to me to amount fundamentally to a possible challenge upon each and all of those three points. As I view

Feb. 10, 1913. them, after one week had elapsed it was open to the employer, under the form of that receipt, substantially to challenge all liability whatsoever under the statute, also to challenge the amount, and also to challenge the duration. And therefore, here is a condition tendered as attached to this receipt which is a negation of all the very points which the workman is entitled to have secured, and secured in such a way that an agreement can be recorded.

Freeland v.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

I do not proceed to the further question. The policy of the statute is that there must be something which both parties can look to; business could not be conducted unless both parties, employer as well as employed, were in the position of having something definitely fixed to which reference could be made in subsequent weeks, quarters, or years. It is quite true, as has been said by Lord Salvesen, that a workman accepting payment under such a receipt, if he sought to continue the situation which was thus established, but which the employers might wish to depart from or to change, would be put in petitorio. I do not find myself in any difference with the judgment of the Second Division, and I desire to say, for my own part, that there are passages in the judgment of Lord Salvesen, notably the second and third paragraphs of his judgment, which I entirely accept and respectfully adopt.

No. 4. WILLIAM SCHULZE AND ANOTHER (Hugh Lees's Trustees) AND OTHERS,

Feb. 17, 1913.

JOHN SANDERSON DUN AND OTHERS, (Defenders) Respondents.—

Lees's Trustees v. Dun.

D.-F. Dickson—Constable, K.C.—C. H. Brown.

Et c contra.

Trust—Liability of trustees—Negligence of original trustee—Action by assumed trustees—Alleged delay and contributory negligence of pursuers—Right to maintain action for behoof of beneficiaries—Mora—Personal objection.

One of the original trustees acting under a trust-disposition and settlement died in 1887, and in the same year two new trustees were assumed, one of whom was also a beneficiary under the trust. In 1909 these new trustees, suing in their capacity as trustees, brought an action against the representatives of the deceased trustee for recovery of funds which they alleged had been lost to the trust-estate through his negligence. The defenders pleaded that the pursuers were barred by mora, and by the fact that they had themselves been guilty of negligence which had contributed to the loss.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that, as the pursuers were suing as trustees for behoof of the beneficiaries whom they represented, the plea of bar stated against them was unavailing.

Interest—Rate of interest—Rate where trustees personally liable.

Circumstances in which the representatives of a trustee, who were found liable to refund to the trust-estate a sum of money which had been lost through his negligence, were ordained to pay interest thereon at the rate of three and a half per cent.

Feb. 17, 1913.

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords against the interlocutor of the Second Division in so far as it awarded simple interest at the rate of three and a half per cent per annum instead of compound interest at the rate of five per cent.

Lees's Trustees v. Dun.

The defenders appealed against the interlocutor in so far as it held them liable to make good the loss to the trust-estate and found them liable in expenses.

Earl of Halsbury.
Lord Kinnear.
Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.
Lord Mersey.

The case was heard on 11th and 17th February 1913.

Argued for the appellants (Lees's Trustees);—Compound interest should have been awarded at the rate of five per cent from 31st May 1870.

Argued for the respondents (Dun and Others);—The plea of mora, or, as it was called in England, laches, should have been sustained. There was no rule of law, as Lord Salvesen appeared to think, that the plea of mora was not available to a trustee as a defence in an action against him for breach of trust, nor was there any logical reason why there should be such a rule. In the case of *In re Sharpe*¹ there was an expression of opinion by North, J., that directors, who are in the same position as trustees, might have successfully based their defence on this plea had it been established on the facts and had they been prejudiced by the delay. In Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank v. Mackinnon,² where the action was against a director acting in a fiduciary capacity, the defence of mora was, inter alia, sustained. To support the plea of mora it was true that two things had to be proved. First, there must have been excessive delay in asserting a known right, and secondly, the position of the party against whom relief was sought must have been prejudiced.³ Both these essentials had been established in the present case. If this had been an English action a complete answer would have been found in the Trustee Act, 1888.⁴ The cases of Metropolitan Bank v. Heiron,⁵ Moncrieff v. Waugh,⁶ and Smith v. Patrick,⁷ were also referred to.—[The Earl of Halsbury intimated that their Lordships did not desire to hear the respondents' counsel upon the question of interest argued by the appellant Schulze, or to hear the latter upon the question argued by the respondents' counsel.]

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I am disposed to think that this matter may be very summarily disposed of. I am of opinion that the judgments of Lord Dundas and Lord Salvesen should be adhered to, and I am content with the reasons given by Lord Salvesen.

With regard to the question which has been suggested as to the amount of interest due, I am of opinion that it is absolutely unarguable, and I move your Lordships that both appeals be dismissed with costs.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree entirely with the opinion expressed by the noble and learned Earl, and I have only to add that I at the same time

It is not material to consider whether the defenders' pleas of mora and taciturnity or their counter-charge of negligence against the pursuers would have been valid if the latter had been suing in their own private right and interest, because, as the learned Judges very clearly point out, they are suing as trustees to recover trust moneys, and are entitled to call the defenders to account, even if they may be themselves accountable.

Lees's Trustees v. Dun. Lord Kinnear.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I also agree except to this extent, that I think it is unnecessary to make any pronouncement with regard to the larger portion of the observations in Lord Salvesen's judgment. For in my opinion the matter is brought to its proper and only issue in one of the concluding sentences of that learned Judge's opinion, when he says that he cannot see that Mr and Mrs Schulze's delay affords any defence against a claim which he thus to my mind properly characterises: "a claim by the beneficiaries whose rights are being maintained and can only be maintained by the trustees now in office." It appears to me that the beneficiaries' action so directed under the guidance and charge of the existing trustees is not open, upon the facts disclosed, to the defence of mora, and that that is the only point which we have to decide.

LORD MERSEY.—I agree entirely, and for the reasons pronounced by my noble and learned friend Lord Shaw.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from affirmed, and appeal and cross-appeal dismissed, with costs.

Russell v. Stubbs, Limited. Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Newspaper—Trade publication—List of decrees in absence—Erroneous entry—Imputation of insolvency.

An issue of a trade journal known as Stubbs' Weekly Gazette contained a list headed "Extracts from the Court Books of Decrees in absence in the Small-Debt Courts. Note.—It is probable that some of the decrees have been sisted, settled, or paid; and in no case does publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of anyone named, or anything more than the fact that the entry published appeared in the Court books."

In an action of damages for slander against the proprietors of the journal at the instance of a tradesman, whose name was erroneously included in the list in respect of a decree for £9, 19s. 6d., the facts being that the debt had been paid and the action dismissed, the Lord Ordinary approved of an issue in which the pursuer innuendosed the entry as falsely and calumniously representing that he was unable to pay his debts.

Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the entry, when read in conjunction with the explanatory note, would not bear the innuendo suggested, and that the issue fell to be disallowed.

(In the Court of Session, 29th May 1912.)

On 27th December 1911 John Russell, wholesale and retail furnisher and general ironmonger, 28 Quarry Street, Hamilton, brought an action of damages for slander against Stubbs, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, and having their principal office at 42 Gresham Street, London. Russell v.
Stubbs,
Limited.

Ld. Chancellor
(Haldane).
Lord Kinnear.
Dunfermline.

The pursuer averred, inter alia :—(Cond. 2) “The defenders are the proprietors and publishers of the gazette known as Stubbs' Weekly Gazette. The defenders carry on for profit a business which they describe in their advertisements and prospectuses as a means of enabling traders to avoid making bad debts, and they act as an agency for the recovery of overdue accounts, bills, and rents, &c. The said Stubbs' Weekly Gazette has a wide circulation, which is not confined to the trading community, throughout Scotland, and also in England and Ireland. It has a special portion devoted to the publication of the names and addresses of traders and others by and against whom decrees in absence have been taken. This is popularly known as and called the ‘Black List,’ and the name of any trader appearing in that list is looked upon with grave suspicion as to solvency by all persons reading the said Gazette or knowing of its contents. Its object is to give information to tradesmen and the mercantile community generally as to bankrupts, insolvents, and defaulters in payment of their just debts and obligations.” (Cond. 3) “The pursuer, as a part of his business, is a dealer in explosives, and a large part of such business consists in supplying colliery companies and dealers with explosive material and colliery furnishings. One of the companies from whom the pursuer obtained the goods he required was the British Electric Detonator Company, Limited, 43 Castle Street, Liverpool. Questions arose between the pursuer and this company as to the amount of the pursuer's indebtedness, the pursuer maintaining that he had a counter claim which fell to be set off against this company's claim. Ultimately, the British Electric Detonator Company raised an action against the pursuer in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court at Hamilton for payment of the sum of £9, 19s. 6d. On 12th October 1911 the dispute between the pursuer and said company was adjusted, and on said date said sum of £9, 19s. 6d. was paid by the pursuer, and the action was settled. The case was called in ordinary course in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court at Hamilton on 20th October 1911, when, the matter in dispute having been settled as stated, neither party appeared, and the action was dismissed.” (Cond. 4) “Notwithstanding that the said action had been dismissed as aforesaid the defenders wrongfully, falsely, and calumniously published in the issue of said Stubbs' Weekly Gazette, of date 26th October 1911, under the heading, ‘Extracts from the Court Books of Decrees in Absence in the Small-Debt Courts’ the following statement :—

Court.	Date.	Pursuers.	Defenders.	Amount in Decree.
Hamilton.	Oct. 20th.	British Electric Detonator Co., Ltd., Liverpool.	John Russell, 28 Quarry St. Hamilton.	£9, 19s. 6d.

April 3, 1913. This entry is not a correct record from the Court books, nor of what took place in Court, and is of and concerning the pursuer, and is false and calumnious. It falsely represented that a decree in absence had been granted against the pursuer for £9, 19s. 6d., that the pursuer was unable to pay his debts and was in insolvent circumstances and in pecuniary embarrassment, and was evading payment of a just debt, and it was so understood by the public, and in particular by the pursuer's customers and creditors. . . ."

Russell v.
Stubbs,
Limited.

The defenders averred, inter alia, in answer:—(Ans. 4) "The issue of Stubbs' Weekly Gazette, of date 26th October 1911, and the entry therein regarding pursuer are referred to for their terms. Explained that said notice is in a column of the defenders' Gazette to which the following heading is prefixed: 'Extracts from the Court Books of Decrees in Absence in the Small-Debt Courts. Note.—The following extracts from the Court books have been received since our last issue, made up to the several dates given in the second column. It is probable that some of the decrees have been sisted, settled, or paid; and in no case does publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of anyone named, or anything more than the fact that the entry published appeared in the Court books. . . . We are willing at all times to insert any authentic information or explanation relative to decrees, or to correct any inaccuracy of record or otherwise.' Explained further that said entry is in accordance with the original entry made in the Court book, but it is explained that the entry in the Court book was altered after the entry had been copied by the defenders, and it is admitted that it is not in accordance with the amended entry in said Court book. The original entry had in the column under 'Interlocutors or Decrees' the letter 'D,' which represents 'Decree.' This entry was afterwards amended, and the word 'Dismissed' was substituted for the letter 'D.' Quoad ultra denied. Explained that during the period from February until October 1911 the pursuer has persistently refused or delayed to make payment of the just and lawful debts of his trade creditors, who have repeatedly requested payment from the pursuer of the amounts due, and in consequence of pursuer's failure or refusal to make payment have been compelled to raise actions against him in the Courts. In particular, during said period the following creditors of the pursuer were unable to obtain payment from him of the sums due at their due date, notwithstanding repeated remonstrances, and only obtained payment after actions had been raised in the Sheriff Courts of Lanarkshire, and in some cases after decrees had been pronounced, viz.:—" [Here followed a list].

The pursuer proposed an issue—Whether on or about 26th October 1911 the defenders wrongfully published in the Gazette under the heading quoted in condescendence 4 a statement in the form of the entry quoted in the same condescendence, and whether the statement was of and concerning the pursuer and falsely and calumniously represented that he was unable to pay his debts? No reference was made in the issue to the Note quoted in answer 4.

The defenders proposed a counter issue—Whether the pursuer, during the period from February until October 1911, repeatedly refused or delayed to make payment of his just and lawful debts to his trade creditors?

On 28th February 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) pronounced an interlocutor approving of the issue and disallowing the counter-issue.

The defenders reclaimed, and on 29th May 1912 their Lordships of April 8, 1913. the Second Division pronounced an interlocutor * refusing the reclaiming note, adhering to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and granting leave to the defenders to appeal to the House of Lords.

Russell v.
Stubbs,
Limited.

The defenders appealed to the House of Lords and the case was heard on 10th February 1913.

Argued for the appellants ;—The issue ought to have been disallowed because the entry in the Gazette could not bear the innuendo the pursuer sought to put upon it, the test being whether the innuendo represented a reasonable or natural or necessary inference from the words used. It did not. It was not enough to say that some persons might understand the words in a defamatory sense, because, where a statement was capable of bearing a number of good interpretations, it was unreasonable to select the only bad one as having been the one necessarily meant.¹ It was out of the question to say that a statement that a small-debt decree in absence had gone out against a tradesman meant, or would necessarily suggest to anyone the meaning, that the tradesman was insolvent, there being many other reasons which might account for the occurrence. The entry referred to one particular debt only, and was not a representation as to the pursuer's general financial position. Accordingly, even if there had been no note prefixed to the list, the pursuer would have failed. The note, however, in express terms disclaimed the interpretation which the pursuer sought to put upon the entry.² Hunter & Company v. Stubbs, Limited,³ was distinguishable from the present case because, firstly, no objection had apparently been taken by the defenders to the issue, and, secondly, because the Court was not concerned with the law as to the adjustment of issues, but was considering whether a new trial should be allowed after the issue had been tried. Crabbe & Robertson v. Stubbs, Limited,⁴ assuming it to have been rightly decided, was also distinguishable because the explanatory statement made by the defenders in that case as to the meaning of the list was far less explicit than the one here. It had to be kept in mind that the question here was not the general question whether it was slanderous to say of a tradesman that a small-debt decree in absence had gone out against him, but the particular question whether the precise statement published by the defenders could, upon any reasonable interpretation of it, mean that the pursuer was unable to pay his debts.

Argued for the respondent ;—The entry was capable of bearing the innuendo suggested, and the issue had been rightly allowed. Crabbe & Robertson v. Stubbs, Limited,⁴ was indistinguishable from the present case and should be followed. Although Hunter & Company v. Stubbs, Limited,³ was not precisely in point, Lord M'Laren, with whom the other Judges concurred, indicated⁵ a clear view that the publication of a person's name in such a list was a representation that he was unable to pay his debts. Reiss v. Perry,⁶ where *Searles v. Scarlett*² was discussed, also supported the pursuer's case. In considering whether the statement was capable of bearing the innuendo it was legitimate to Russell v.

Stubbs,
Limited.

At delivering judgment on 3rd April 1913,—

LORD ATKINSON.—The Lord Chancellor desires me to state that he has had the advantage of reading the judgments which have been prepared by Lord Kinnear and Lord Shaw, and that he concurs in them.

LORD KINNEAR.—The question in this case is whether the Court below has done right in adjusting an issue for the trial of an action for libel, or whether they ought not to have refused to send the case to a jury and given judgment at once for the defenders. We have not the advantage of having any opinions of the learned Judges before us. But from what was said at the bar it may probably be inferred that they proceeded on the supposed authority of the case of Crabbe & Robertson v. Stubbs, Limited.² I am of opinion that that case does not support the judgment. But, however that may be, it is not binding on this House; and before I examine it I think it will be convenient in the first place to consider the present question on its own merits, with reference to rules of law that are otherwise well settled.

The appellants, who are defenders in the action, are the proprietors and publishers of a newspaper called Stubbs' Weekly Gazette; and the pursuer avers that they carry on for profit a business which they describe in their advertisements and prospectuses as a means of enabling traders to avoid making bad debts. As Lord President Inglis observes in Andrews v. Drummond & Graham,³ with reference to a similar publication, "the object seems quite a legitimate one, and if prosecuted in a legal manner no one could object to it." But the pursuer's complaint is that the defenders have gone beyond what the law allows, to his injury, inasmuch as their Gazette contains a list of persons against whom decrees in absence have been obtained; and in the issue of 26th October 1911 his name appeared in the list as a defender against whom a decree in absence for £9, 19s. 6d. had been taken in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court at Hamilton, whereas, in fact, this statement was false, because the claim of debt to which it referred had been settled and the action had been dismissed.

It is admitted that the entry of the pursuer's name in the list was made in error. The validity of the excuse the appellants put forward for their mistake is not relevant to the present question. But I observe in passing that people who follow such a business as was undertaken by the appellants impose upon themselves a duty of care and circumspection, because they have taken the reputation and credit of their neighbours into their own hands, and it will be no answer to any well-grounded complaint of injury through misrepresentation of fact that they have misunderstood the import of entries in the Sheriff Court books, or that the entries themselves were misleading. They undertake to say what passed in Court apparently by a study of what is recorded in the Sheriff Court books, and they take the April 3, 1913. risk of their own interpretation of the entries which they may not perfectly understand. But, as I say, that is not material to the present question, which is whether there should be a trial or not. All that it is to the pursuer to say upon this statement in defence at present is that the appellants cannot plead, as they might otherwise have done, that no action will lie for a mere statement made in a newspaper or elsewhere that a decree has passed in a public Court of justice, because that is a public fact which everybody is entitled to state. But no such plea of justification is required if the statement is not in itself libellous, and I am of opinion that taken by itself it bears no defamatory meaning. To apply the approved definition of a libel for which action will lie, it certainly does not hold the pursuer up to hatred, contempt, or ridicule, and just as little does it convey an imputation injurious to him in his trade. An injurious inference might no doubt have been drawn, if inability to pay a just debt were the only reason which could account for a decree in absence being allowed to pass in a Small-Debt Court. But, as the appellants' counsel very forcibly pointed out, such a thing may happen from a variety of causes that are perfectly consistent with solvency and honest intention on the part of the debtor. If this were all, the question would be whether a publication is libellous because one out of various possible inferences from the facts which it states may be injurious while others are harmless. This question was answered in the negative by the decision of this House in Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty.¹ But in the present case it does not really arise. It is absolutely excluded by the express language of the very statement of which the pursuer complains.

The alleged ground of action is an entry in what he describes as the defenders' black list. But the entry is a mere statement of names, with a date and a sum of money; and what it is intended to represent is explained in a head-note, which must be read along with it in order to make it convey any intelligible meaning. The head-note begins with a descriptive title of what is to follow, to wit:—"Extracts from the Court Books of Decrees in Absence in the Small-Debt Courts," and to this there is appended a note in the following terms:—"The following extracts from the Court books have been received since our last issue. . . . It is probable that some of the decrees have been sisted, settled, or paid; and in no case does publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of anyone named, or anything more than the fact that the entry published appeared in the Court books." This appears to me to be conclusive of the whole question. It is impossible to say that this statement fairly read would convey to any reasonable mind the imputation on persons whose names are found in the list that they are unable to pay their just debts. The pursuer admits that he cannot put the bare entry in the list to a jury without an innuendo; and the only innuendo he proposes is embodied in the issue which has been allowed, and by which it is proposed to ask the jury "whether the said statement" (that of course refers to the statement in the appellants' newspaper which it is proposed to append in a schedule

Russell v.
Stubbs,
Limited.

Lord Kinnear. It is said that, although the language of the statement taken by itself may be harmless, a libellous character may nevertheless be given to it by evidence of extrinsic facts relating to the purpose or circumstances of the publication. I agree, and if there were any relevant averments of such facts, I should think the pursuer should be allowed to prove them. But there is nothing stated on record which can alter the plain meaning of the document. If the purpose ascribed to the defenders were more suggestive than it is of an intention to defame by imputing insolvency, no inference of that kind could stand against the positive and explicit language in which it is repelled by the defenders. The question is, in reality, whether the defenders' statement means what it says, or whether it means the reverse of what it says, and I am of opinion that that is a question which should not be allowed to go to a jury.

The law is perfectly well settled. Before a question of libel or slander is submitted to a jury the Court must be satisfied that the words complained of are capable of the defamatory meaning ascribed to them. That is a matter of law for the Court. If they are so, and also of a harmless meaning, it is a question of fact for a jury which meaning they did convey in the particular case. It is unnecessary to cite authorities, because they are many, but I take the doctrine as laid down by Lord Selborne in Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty,¹ where, after stating the general rule to the same effect as I have just stated it, the learned Lord adds:—"If the Judge, taking into account the manner and the occasion of the publication and all other facts which are properly in evidence, is not satisfied that the words are capable of the meaning ascribed to them, then it is not his duty to leave the question raised by the innuendo to the jury."

In a very recent case, Smith v. Walker,² in the Court of Session, the Lord President pointed out that, in applying this doctrine, which his Lordship cited from Lord Selborne as I have just done, to the practice of Scotland, it is necessary to substitute for the words "facts properly in evidence" the words "properly averred on record." This is because in Scottish practice the question of libel or no libel, so far as it is a question for the Court only, is not left to be raised at the trial, but must be decided at the stage at which the interlocutor now under review has been pronounced. The Court cannot allow an issue in any case without deciding that there is a proper case to go to a jury and ascertaining the question of fact which the jury is to decide. In the present case, therefore, it is decided by a final judgment of the Court that the words complained of when taken in connection with the facts alleged on record are capable of the defamatory meaning ascribed to them; and the Judge at the trial would have no power to withdraw the case from the jury on the ground that they will not bear that innuendo. I think it clear, in the first place, that the whole of the statement in the head-note, as I have quoted it, must be read in conjunction with the alleged excerpt from the Sheriff Court books, and, secondly, that when it is so April 3, 1913.

read it is impossible that any reasonable man should collect from it the libellous imputation alleged.

Russell v.
Stubbs,
Limited.

Taking this view of the law, I do not think that the Court need have been embarrassed by the case of Crabbe & Robertson v. Stubbs, Limited.¹ Lord Kinnear.
It so far resembles the present that in an action against the present appellants it was held that a statement in their paper that a decree in absence had passed against a certain person when read along with the context, and in the circumstances there alleged, might support an issue in the same terms as that before us. But the facts alleged as to the avowed purpose of the publication were more suggestive of an intention to impute insolvency than anything stated in the present record; and, what is much more important, the perfectly explicit statement which I have quoted, and which seems to me to be the vital point in the appellants' case, was not to be found in the paper complained of in the case of Crabbe & Robertson.¹

There was a statement as to the possible imputation of insolvency, but the Court did not read it as a clear disavowal of such imputation as regards all the persons whose names were found on the list, but only as an indication that some of them might have paid their debts or taken proceedings for avoiding the decree. It was therefore thought that the record presented a relevant case to go to a jury. I am bound to say that I think the case was a very narrow one, although I still remain of opinion that it was rightly decided. But the only general doctrine for which it can be cited as an authority is that which I have already had occasion to state, and which I take to be beyond dispute, that the purpose and circumstances of a publication may impart to language a meaning which it would not otherwise bear.
Whether that doctrine was rightly applied or not in the particular case is a matter of no importance, because a decision as to the libellous or innocent character of particular words in particular circumstances cannot govern the construction of different words, however minute the difference may be.

The other case cited, Hunter & Company v. Stubbs, Limited,² is in a different position. The publication complained of seems to have been in terms which I cannot distinguish from those in the publication now complained of; and it follows from what I have said that, in my opinion, the issue ought not to have been granted in that case. But the only question reported arose after trial, when it was too late to question the issue; and it does not appear from the report on what ground it was allowed, or whether the point was contested. I cannot therefore regard the case as an authority upon this question one way or the other. It was certainly not binding upon the Court below, and of course it is not binding upon this House.

I have only to add that, if the innuendo proposed cannot be allowed, I think it impossible that your Lordships should send the case back to the Court below, as was suggested, in order that some permissible innuendo may be discovered. This would, in my opinion, be inconsistent with all sound practice and with legal principle.

I cannot say that I see any other libellous suggestion in the publication complained of if the pursuer's innuendo fails; and there are no extrinsic

April 8, 1913. facts averred which would support any other. But I do not propose to put my judgment upon that ground. I make the observation in passing, but the true ground of judgment is to my mind that the pursuer must allege his own ground of action and must state on record all material facts which he is prepared to establish in support of it. If it cannot be sustained as he states it, it is not for the Court to discover some other ground which he has not found out for himself, or to require him to prove some injury which he has not averred.

Russell v.
Stubbs,
Limited.

Lord Kinnear.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutors under review ought to be reversed.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—The appellants are the proprietors and publishers of Stubbs' Weekly Gazette. This is a newspaper which they issue for profit, and which it is admitted has a large circulation among traders. It is considered to be of interest and advantage to these traders to find in this paper what upon application they could have ascertained for themselves as registered public facts, namely, the decrees in absence pronounced in the Small-Debt Courts of Scotland. No question is raised as to the right of the appellants to publish this record.

Upon the other hand, it is also, as it must be, conceded that while this is the appellants' right, it is also their duty to make their publication of these decrees accurate in fact. If for any reason they fail in this duty, and if thereby a trader against whom no decree in absence has in fact passed is erroneously entered in that list, the appellants must stand responsible for any injurious consequences which the erroneous entry has produced or would be reasonably likely to produce, taking into account its terms and the circumstances upon the one hand of the trader and upon the other of the publication. I did not gather that the appellants disputed this proposition. It has been the basis of many decisions both in Scotland and in England, and I do not desire in the judgment which follows to throw doubt upon it. It lies, however, with the pursuer to make a relevant averment of such injurious consequences, and the burden rests upon him of establishing them as the effects of the erroneous publication.

The rights and obligations of parties being thus granted, it must also, I think, be admitted that an erroneous statement that a decree had been passed for a small debt in Scotland would not necessarily import harm to anybody. In order to enable it to be treated as a harmful publication, an innuendo must be placed upon the erroneous entry showing that the character or business of the trader has been injuriously affected because the readers or the public were led to conclude as against him something much more serious.

For such a decree might pass for a large variety of reasons, none of which would injuriously affect the reputation or trade of the debtor. One quite natural interpretation of the entry would be that the alleged debtor had forgotten to pay the small sum sued for. Another reason might be that he was—having certain opinions as to the injustice of the claim or the full amount of it—determined not to pay except under force of law: A third reason for such a decree might be that he was absent and knew nothing about the summons: A fourth that he was a person given to refusing or delaying to pay his debts in ordinary and proper course. This last might April 3, 1913, possibly affect the reputation and credit of the alleged debtor. And I am not prepared to say that there may not be circumstances in which injury, more particularly to a trader in humble and struggling circumstances, would be produced if the erroneous entry had been taken up in the last-mentioned sense. Such a person might never have been in a Court, might always have met his obligations with regularity, might be in a critical stage in the development of his business, and, as at present advised, I should not say that it was a strained construction to put upon the entry that it was reasonably likely to imply that he was given to or had begun the practice of refusing or delaying to make payment of his debts and that the public or those dealing with him had understood it in that sense.

Russell v.
Stubbs,
Limited.
Dunfermline.

The position taken up by the respondent, the pursuer in the action, however, is that he has put forward in issue the erroneous entry with a much more sweeping and serious innuendo. That innuendo is that the entry "falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer was unable to pay his debts." He has, in short, taken upon himself the burden of saying that the entry of a decree in absence having passed against him for £9 odd was equivalent to or implied an imputation of his insolvency.

After much consideration, I am of opinion that this innuendo imports into the erroneous entry more than it can reasonably bear. For I think the test in these cases is this:—Is the meaning sought to be attributed to the language alleged to be libellous one which is a reasonable, natural, or necessary interpretation of its terms? It is productive, in my humble judgment, of much error and mischief to make the test simply whether some people would put such and such a meaning upon the words, however strained or unlikely that construction may be. The interpretation to be put on language varies infinitely. It varies with the knowledge, the mental equipment, even the prejudices, of the reader or hearer; it varies—and very often greatly varies—with his temperament or his disposition, in which the elements, on the one hand, of generosity or justice, or, on the other, of mistrust, jealousy, or suspicion, may play their part. To permit, in the latter case, a strained and sinister interpretation, which is thus essentially unjust, to form a ground for reparation, would be, in truth, to grant reparation for a wrong which had never been committed.

There are circumstances, to which I am about to allude, which bring very vividly before the mind the mischief to which I have referred. But before I mention them I desire to add that it appears to me that the statements which I have made are amply supported by authority. The general rule, indeed, occurs by way of statement in a single sentence of Brett, L.J., in Henty's case¹: "It seems to me," said that very learned Judge, "unreasonable that, when there are a number of good interpretations, the only bad one should be seized upon to give a defamatory sense to the document." In the same case in the House of Lords,² Lord Selborne enunciated the familiar proposition that the words must be "taken in their natural sense." I refer to Henty^{1 & 2} on account of its high authority. It was twice argued in this House and was the subject of careful and elaborate judgments. On

April 3, 1913. this question of the meaning attributable to words no dissent in the judgments of the majority is expressed from the general proposition just quoted from Brett, L.J. Indeed I am not sure that in particular the judgment of Lord Blackburn¹ does not go further, for he states the principle on which the Court is to proceed in this language, "viz., that unless the plaintiff has so far satisfied the onus which lies on him to show it to be a libel that the Court can, with sufficient certainty, say that the writing has a libellous tendency, they should not so say"; and in another passage he refers to this onus which is upon plaintiff thus, "that the Court can (to adopt Lord Tenterden's language) with reasonable certainty say that the tendency of the letter was to convey the libellous imputation." Lord Watson² used language of a less pronounced but still broad and emphatic character when he said, "If I were satisfied that an inference injurious to the credit of the bank would naturally and necessarily suggest itself to the mind of any person of average intelligence on reading the circular"; and Lord Bramwell³ puts the hypothesis, "If a libellous inference may be drawn from them as a necessary or natural consequence, they are libellous." Out of this variety of expressions I have ventured to gather up what I think to be the result, namely, that the innuendo must represent what is a reasonable, natural, or necessary inference from the words used, regard being had to the occasion and the circumstances of their publication.

By the laws both of England and of Scotland the duty of saying whether this inference may be made lies with the Court. The difference of procedure between the two countries is this, that in England the whole inquiry may be taken and the jury may have passed its verdict, before this essential and truly preliminary question is determined. If the verdict be for the defendant, then of course that is an end of the matter; but if the verdict be for the plaintiff, it is open—after, it may be, a very lengthy procedure—to the defendant to maintain that the inference made by the jury in favour of the plaintiff was one which the language employed will not bear. If the Court affirms that proposition, then judgment is entered for the defendant.

In Scotland the inquiry as to the reasonable, natural, or necessary interpretation of the libellous words is not entered upon at so late a stage. It is for the pursuer of an action to state definitely the meaning which he alleges that the article or words complained of bear, and to put that meaning in issue; and thereafter the Court determines whether there is any issuable matter and approves or disapproves, or it may vary or adjust, the issues proposed for the trial. But the principles upon which the Court proceeds in Scotland at the early stage are identical with those which the Courts in England proceed upon at the later stage in reference to the point now under discussion.

What happened in the present case was this: The pursuer stated the entry, and alleged that it was false that there had been such a decree in absence. This was admitted. He then proposed the issue whether the statement was of and concerning him, and "falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer was unable to pay his debts." The defenders in their record founded upon the following heading which was, in the issue of their April 3, 1918. paper complained of, prefixed to the list of decrees in absence which they gave. That was in these terms:—"Note.—The following extracts from the Court books have been received since our last issue, made up to the several dates given in the second column. It is probable that some of the decrees have been aisted, settled, or paid, and in no case does publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of anyone named, or anything more than the fact that the entry published appeared in the Court books." For some reason which has not appeared, the pursuer was allowed to present his issue with a schedule confined to the erroneous entry, but without any mention of this note. Such a proceeding cannot be defended. It was corrected by the Inner House in the case of Crabbe & Robertson v. Stubbs, Limited.¹ It appears to me quite clear that the omission of this note from the schedule must have been inadvertent.

Russell v.

Dunfermline.

The defenders admit the error, explain how they had been led into it, and quote the apology made to the pursuer in their next week's issue. But they then proceed to give a list of eleven cases, extending over six months prior to the alleged slander, in which the pursuer had figured in the Court lists, and with regard to which they say that the pursuer's creditors "were unable to obtain payment from him of the sums due at their due date, notwithstanding repeated remonstrances, and only obtained payment after actions had been raised in the Sheriff Courts of Lanarkshire, and in some cases after decrees had been pronounced." They also accordingly proposed a counter issue "whether the pursuer, during the period from February until October 1911, repeatedly refused or delayed to make payment of his just and lawful debts to his trade creditors."

The importance of the shape of the pursuer's issue, and in particular of its innuendo, thus becomes apparent. For while the pursuer's issue with its sweeping innuendo has been allowed, the counter issue of the defenders—that the pursuer repeatedly refused or delayed to make payment of his debts—has been disallowed by both Houses of the Court of Session. This has been done presumably upon the familiar ground that the counter issue does not meet the entire breadth of the innuendo which the pursuer had put in his issue, namely, that he was unable to pay his debts. In short, the defenders were disabled from tendering proof that the pursuer for eight months before the entry founded on repeatedly refused or delayed to make payment of his just debts because he might have done all that, although he was not insolvent, and the pursuer had so framed his issue as to make the erroneous entry of one decree in absence impute insolvency in general terms. It is plain to my mind that this was paving the way for a complete miscarriage of justice.

But that miscarriage arose, or would have arisen, simply because, in my humble judgment, the Courts below had permitted the imputation of insolvency to be put forward as a reasonable, natural, or necessary inference from a statement that a decree in absence had been taken for a sum of between £9 and £10. I do not refer to the note, which specifically stated that nothing was meant to be inferred except that a decree had been taken.

April 3, 1913. It may be true that in a weekly gazette of this character a note so inserted might not obliterate the evil effect of the erroneous entry; but it does not appear to me to be justifiable to infer an imputation of insolvency from a single decree in absence for a small amount. Had the far less strained interpretation been put upon the words that the entry meant that this trader was a person who was refusing or delaying to pay his just debts, this would have enabled the whole facts under both the issue and the counter issue to go before the jury, because it was exactly that not unreasonable interpretation which the defenders were willing to meet, and if they had established their averments and their counter issue, they would, of course, have been entitled to a verdict.

Russell v.
Stubbs,
Limited.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

It would be productive of wrong if the over-straining of an innuendo were in such a manner and by a finesse of procedure to be permitted to block out the real substance of a case; a verdict for the pursuer in such a situation would be obtained because the jury had been left compulsorily in the dark. I am aware of the answer made, that the debtor's had record could be looked at for the purpose of mitigating damages, and that the jury might grope towards the real truth on the whole case by the light thus let in upon one point as through a chink in the shutter. This again is a finesse of procedure; its use beyond the one point is illegitimate as all parties know. In the case in hand any exclusion of the whole light on the whole case would, in my opinion, be productive of possible mischance and contrary to law.

These considerations illustrate the necessity of confining innuendoes upon, and inferences from, words which in themselves are not libellous within an area which admits of their being made without strain and as an expression of the reasonable, natural, or necessary meaning of the words employed. The present case shows that, if that rule were to be departed from, it would enable pursuers, first, to strain by inference the meaning of words, and then, secondly, to prevent a complete answer to an issue being made by a defender, who might be thoroughly furnished in his defence against the inference which was the reasonable and natural one.

I am aware that in the case of Hunter & Company v. Stubbs, Limited,¹ and also in that of Crabbe & Robertson v. Stubbs, Limited,² to which I have referred, the form of issue now to be declared by this House improper was allowed. In Hunter's case,¹ however, the defender had agreed to the issue and the question was not raised at the proper stage. Crabbe & Robertson's case² has been dealt with fully by my noble and learned friend Lord Kinnear, and I agree with his Lordship's observations thereon and with the course which he suggests should be pursued.

The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, enacts, sec. 179, "The magistrates . . . shall from time to time cause to be made and maintained . . . within the burgh such sewers and drains as shall be necessary for the effectual draining of . . . the burgh. . . ."

The Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, which incorporated the estate of Craigentenny in the burgh, by sec. 28 provided with regard to a burn, which flowed through the estate and carried off a portion of the drainage and sewage of Edinburgh, that (except upon an order of the Sheriff) it should not be lawful for the Corporation to diminish the supply of sewage water flowing through the burn and used for irrigation, or to deepen, or otherwise interfere with, the burn so far as passing through the estate.

On two occasions in 1909, after heavy rainfalls, a market garden on the estate of Craigentenny bounded by the burn was flooded owing to a culvert which carried the burn under a road being of insufficient capacity to admit free passage of the water, which in consequence overflowed on to the road, whence it found its way into the garden.

In an action of damages at the instance of the tenant of the market garden against the Corporation, held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that sec. 28 of the Act of 1900 did not affect the obligation of the defenders at common law, and under sec. 179 of the Act of 1879 to make and keep the drainage system of the burgh effective, and that accordingly they were liable in damages.

Observed that the liability of the authorities did not arise only if and when flooding had been periodical or frequent, but that they were responsible for every failure in effective drainage.

The pursuer appealed to the House of Lords.

The view of the facts taken by their Lordships, which differed from the view of the Judges of the Second Division and agreed substantially with that of the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale), is set forth in the opinion of Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. Briefly stated it was that owing to the insufficiency of the culvert the burn overflowed its banks on the upstream side of the culvert, flowed on to the road and thence, through the gate, into the pursuer's garden.

Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—The appellant, who is the pursuer of this case, sues as tenant of a market garden on the estate of Craigentinny within the bounds of the city of Edinburgh for damage done by the flooding of his market garden and premises on two occasions, namely, the 25th July and the 13th October, both in the year 1909.

The Restalrig Road runs from that village southward, and by way of a bridge across the Craigentinny Burn. The appellant's garden is upon the east of that road ; upon the west of it is the stretch of ground known as the Lochend Meadows, which have for many years been artificially irrigated. The road crosses by a bridge the Craigentinny Burn, which flows upon the south side of the meadows, then through a culvert under the road and part of the adjacent land, and thence along the south side of the garden in an easterly direction towards the sea.

On the dates mentioned the pursuer's ground was, to the extent of about 9 acres, flooded by water from the burn, and it is not disputed that considerable damage was thereby caused. The Lord Ordinary has assessed this damage at £150 sterling, and the respondents do not dispute this estimate. The natural water of the Craigentinny Burn is mixed with the sewage of the city of Edinburgh, which is emptied into it at a point considerably above the pursuer's garden ; and the burn, thus containing the city sewage, flows in an open channel for a space of about 250 yards before reaching the culvert under the Restalrig Road. The city, while not challenging the fact that damage was done by the overflow of this sewage burn, disputes its liability in law for the injury so caused.

The case of the pursuer is extremely simple. He maintains that on the dates mentioned the burn, being in spate, rose until the culvert as constructed could not carry its waters away. These accordingly gathered until they flooded the Lochend Meadows to a considerable height. The waters, thus dammed back, burst over the road, flowed from the level of the bridge down the slope of the road until they reached the pursuer's garden gate, which is the point of the lowest road level, and rushed in considerable volume through that gate and on to his land. The accumulation thus formed was added to by this circumstance, that owing to the damming back of the water the drains in the road itself, both between the village and the culvert, and also to the south thereof, were filled up ; and they regurgitated, emptying considerable volumes on to the gathering water in the road, and adding to the destructive flood.

On the other hand, the case of the respondents is that the volume of water thus stated to have swept through the garden gate on to the appellant's ground is exaggerated, and that the real cause of any flooding which resulted in substantial damage was not on account of the damming back of the water and the regurgitation just described, but arose by reason of the banks of the burn on the south of the pursuer's garden being insufficient to contain the flow of the stream, and that with that circumstance they have nothing to do.

This defence upon the facts is altogether different and is separate from the defence which the respondents found upon their statutory position, duties, and responsibilities. That defence in law will be dealt with presently.

Upon the allegations of parties with reference to the flooding, the learned April 4, 1913. Lord Ordinary, who heard the witnesses, and has manifestly considered the evidence with minute care, has little hesitation in holding the pursuer's case to be made out. It might be sufficient to say that in these circumstances it is the habit of this House to accept a verdict so pronounced unless there be some manifest or controlling reason in the nature of the case, or in the views of the Judges on appeal, to displace the verdict. But this case was argued with such anxiety, and the issues in it are evidently of such importance both to the local authority and to the general body of riparian occupiers and owners, that it may be expedient to examine the evidence independently, not without brevity but in some detail.

Hanley v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

I understand all your Lordships to be of opinion, as I am, that the allegations as to flooding of the meadows occasionally happening many years ago have no real bearing upon the present case. The accommodation of the culvert to receive the swollen waters of the burn may have been different in those times; but in no view can a prescriptive right of the character adumbrated be maintained.

An event, however, occurred towards the end of the year 1906 which appears to me to be of considerable importance. The Edinburgh and District Water Trust made an application to the respondents, who are also the road authority, for leave to carry a water-pipe, not over the culvert, but across and through the culvert, enclosing the upper portion or arch thereof and reducing, so to speak, the frontage of the culvert to the advancing water by about 6 superficial feet in a sectional area which in all is rather over 36 feet. I shall consider afterwards what is denominated the scientific evidence with regard to this subject; but there can be no doubt that this alteration was assented to; and the permission for carrying the water-pipe in the manner described was granted by letter of the 5th December 1906, "provided the work is carried out at the sight and to the satisfaction of the Burgh Engineer."

The sectional area of the culvert being thus reduced, it is certainly to be observed that, whether causally connected therewith or not, the reduction was succeeded in fact by flooding of the watercourse.—[His Lordship reviewed the evidence which proved that there had been flooding on several occasions.]

Upon the fact whether the pursuer's garden was injured by water accumulated on the road and flowing through his gate, I cannot myself see any ground for doubt.—[His Lordship reviewed the evidence which established this point.]

The case for the defenders on this matter of fact is not so much a denial of the flood, and even of the flood in some volume through the pursuer's gate, as an assertion that the flood was mainly caused by water which overflowed the banks below the culvert. If this be true, it might not absolve the defenders, if the facts otherwise showed that the obstruction by the culvert caused a damming of the water and an artificial increment of the force and volume of the flow below that point. But I cannot view the evidence as to the overflow over the banks of the stream with any satisfaction.—[His Lordship reviewed the evidence on this matter.]

I do not pursue the analysis of the evidence further. A review of it as

April 4, 1913. Hanley v. Magistrates of Edinburgh. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. a whole convinces me that three things are established: First, that upon the occasions in question the water of the sewage burn was dammed back by reason of the insufficiency of the culvert, and reached at least to the top of the arch thereof. Secondly, that a considerable volume of water flowed through the pursuer's garden gate at a depth at that point of about one foot. Thirdly, that any overflow from the burn below the culvert was of the most trifling character. The Lord Ordinary is of this opinion on all these three points, and I hold each of them to be well and satisfactorily proved. They furnish the data, in fact, upon which the case must be decided.

It is necessary, however, to consider whether there is any substantial ground for rejecting these facts because of skilled evidence given that they were "scientifically impossible."—[His Lordship examined the skilled evidence.] I need not give further instances of such things which occur in the course of the defenders' skilled evidence. I would say of it in short what unhappily has to be said of similar evidence very often, that it is not scientific evidence. It is not evidence; it is hearsay, and hearsay of error. It is not scientific; it is simply the arithmetical development of mistake. In the present case it affords no answer to the case in fact, which the pursuer has proved.

There remains the defence which is put forward in law. It being established that the town sewage has thus been emptied upon the pursuer's lands by reason of the insufficiency of the culvert, which, instead of accommodating it, dammed it back, there would seem to me to be little doubt that the pursuer is entitled to recover damages in respect of the loss caused by this nuisance, and that at common law. Suppose there had been no statutory provisions upon the subject, it could hardly be doubted that the construction of such an obstacle, necessarily followed by the creation of such a nuisance, were things for which the person injured thereby had a good right of action. There is nothing peculiar by the law of Scotland in the situation of a corporation in this regard. They have no title at common law to divert the course of a sewage drain so as to make it overflow the property of any citizen. The common law remedies remain both for the purposes of interdict and reparation unless they be excluded or impaired by statute.

The case upon its facts is fairly analogous to that of Hawthorn Corporation v. Kannuluik,¹ in which, as in the present case, there had been more than once an overflow of sewage into the plaintiff's lands. "As for negligence," said Lord Macnaghten, "it is difficult to imagine a more conspicuous example of negligence than is shown by repeatedly pouring offensive stuff into a receptacle or channel proved over and over again to be insufficient to hold it and pass it on. The municipal authorities might just as well pour this stuff directly on the plaintiff's land. The damage to the plaintiff cannot be denied. It is nothing to the purpose, even if it be true, to say that the property in the plaintiff's hands, and in the hands of his predecessors in title, was often flooded before the municipal authorities turned the watercourse into a public drain. Nor is it enough to prove that the work done in 1889 was sufficient at the time. It is insufficient now. April 4, 1918. It has been insufficient for some time past. The mischief grows as building increases, as new roads are made, new channels formed, and more and more of the surface becomes impervious to rainfall.”

Hanley v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

There being thus no defence at common law, the question that remains is whether the statutes founded upon by the respondents have relieved them of their common law obligations. It would have been somewhat surprising if they had, although Parliament might possibly, for some supereminent reason of necessity, have thus interfered with the protection of the subject. But a perusal of the statutes removes all real difficulty and establishes that such a defence is not well founded. By the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, it is provided by section 179 as follows:—“The magistrates and council shall from time to time cause to be made and maintained, under streets or courts, or elsewhere within the burgh, such sewers and drains as shall be necessary for the effectual draining of any portion of the burgh, and shall also cause to be made and maintained all such reservoirs, sluices, engines, and other works as shall be necessary for cleansing such sewers and drains, and, if needful, they may carry such sewers and drains through and across any enclosed or other lands, and through any underground cellars and vaults, making full compensation for any damage done, which compensation shall be ascertained in the same manner as compensation for land to be taken under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts, and the magistrates and council shall have right of access for maintenance of all such sewers and drains.”

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

The effect of this section appears to be to impose an imperative obligation upon the respondents to make and maintain all such sewers and drains as shall be necessary for effectually draining any portion of the burgh. It is not a case of giving the city an option. Parliament has imposed this obligation, and in order to secure that it shall be fulfilled without impediment it gives a statutory power to carry, if needful, sewers and drains through any enclosed or other lands on making compensation. In short, the word of Parliament is a word of command, and the command is to make the drainage effective, with a power compulsorily to achieve that object. So far from there being any disability upon the respondents from avoiding nuisances, they have the obligation, by statute clearly imposed, to respect the common law rights of the citizens, and, turning—as they substantially do—a natural stream into a drain, to see to it that the drainage be effective and the polluting matter carried past to the sea.

Upon this latter point I cannot, with much respect to the learned Judges of the Second Division, draw any distinction between the obligations resting upon the Corporation with regard to the size of the culvert under the road, of which they have charge as road authority, and the continuation of the culvert eastward under what presumably is private property. What the statute has ordered is that the drainage shall be made effective, and the amplest power to make it effective by traversing private lands has been given. And it would seem to me an extraordinary result that the Corporation should be held as obliged, in the discharge of this duty, to make a fully accommodating culvert under its road, and yet to discard its obligation to continue that full accommodation of the culvert so as to allow the uninter-

April 4, 1913. rupted effluent of the drainage. This construction would render nugatory the very thing which Parliament has provided shall be made effective, and Hanley v. Magistrates of Edinburgh. would impliedly give a statutory warrant to block up the drainage and sluice it on to the riparian owner's lands instead of conveying it to the sea. I do Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. not think that such an abrogation of common law rights or of statutory duties can be contemplated as sanctioned by law.

I now come to that part of the case which the learned Dean of Faculty towards the close of the debate admitted to be the real strength of the city's defence. I refer to the provisions of the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, and in particular to section 28 of that statute. I am of opinion that that section was not intended by Parliament, and does not import by its terms, a licence, either express or implied, to the Corporation to flood the pursuer's lands. By its terms the section is for the protection of the proprietors of the estate of Craigentenny and their successors. It provides that the Corporation shall not interfere with the right of those proprietors to use the estate for irrigation purposes as has hitherto been done, nor injuriously affect or interfere with that irrigation, nor "diminish or intercept, or otherwise injuriously affect the supply of sewage or sewage water used for such irrigation," nor "deepen, divert, cover over, or otherwise interfere with" the sewage burn. The whole of these stipulations are subject to the important proviso that if in the public interest the Corporation deems it necessary to injuriously affect or interfere with the irrigation or the sewage burn, it shall be at liberty to do so upon giving to the proprietors twelve months' notice and obtaining an order from the Sheriff and giving compensation in respect of land acquired for or affected by the necessary works. It is unnecessary to refer to the further proviso that nothing in the section shall affect the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1897, for the Corporation, thus charged with its duties under the Municipal Act of 1897, would be protected and its powers preserved under the proviso for necessary works here made.

But in the second place I am humbly of opinion that no part of this section, which was a section for the protection of the proprietors of Craigentenny, imports any repeal of the right at common law that those lands should be protected against the inundation nuisances which have occurred, nor imports, either by implication or by its terms, any repeal of the imperative obligations resting upon the Corporation under the Municipal Act of 1879 to make the sewers of the burgh such as shall effectually drain every portion of it. It would no doubt be possible to figure a case in which a protection clause was so framed as to work out to the injury of the person assumed to be protected by Parliament, but nothing of the sort is in this case to be inferred. I do not doubt that all the protection afforded the Craigentenny irrigation works can be continued alongside of the proper and effectual draining of the burgh, and I should myself have had little doubt that Parliament would not, except by extreme inadvertence, have permitted the protection of one riparian owner's rights to operate as a title to stoppage of the general and effective drainage of the city of Edinburgh—a stoppage which might involve serious consequences in the production of disease or in patrimonial loss.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the statute founded upon is no defence in law against responsibility for what has occurred. Even if the obligation for effective drainage were not compulsory, as I have ventured to opine, but April 4, 1913. were permissive in the full sense of the proviso of section 28, there is abundance of authority to support the view which I have ventured to ex-presa. This will be found gathered together in the judgment of Lord Watson in the Canadian Pacific Railway v. Parke.¹ I may refer especially to the opinion of Lord Chancellor Selborne in the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill.² In the same case, on page 208, Lord Blackburn said, "It is clear that the burthen lies on those who seek to establish that the Legislature intended to take away the private rights of individuals, to show that by express words, or by necessary implication, such an intention appears."

Hanley v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

There are only two further points which I think it important to mention, in view of certain expressions of opinion in the Courts below.

In the first place, I am at a loss to understand any hostile criticism whatsoever upon the pleadings of the pursuer in this case. That criticism, especially in the judgment of Lord Guthrie, is directed to this, that the pursuer, grounding his case upon the action or inaction of the Corporation, has not by particular specification set forth what were the opera manufacta which the Corporation failed to undertake and which, if undertaken, would have avoided the injury which has been caused. The pursuer's case is very simple. He says, "You, the Corporation, are bound effectively to drain the city; you have not done so. You have permitted such a volume of spate water and sewage to accumulate because you have not accommodated its egress by a culvert of sufficient dimensions." Another way of putting it is,—either the volume was too great for the culvert or the culvert was too small for the volume. It is of no use distinguishing between the capacities of the Corporation as drainage authority and road authority, for they were both; and they should have managed both their powers as drainage authority and road authority in such a way as to produce accommodation for the sewage burn, which, in point of fact, was stopped up and so prevented from being effective. I am of opinion that the pursuer required to show nothing more than that in order to make a relevant case, and I wish to add that I would not view with equanimity any obstruction placed by the law on such simplicity of pleading. Nor would I consider it to be promotive of the rights of citizens if, in order to secure reparation for a wrong thus committed, they were forced to inquire into and enumerate the engineering and other works which the Corporation would have required to undertake. A person suffering wrong has nothing to do with that. It is for the Corporation, charged with its common law and statutory duties, to see that they are fulfilled and to take its own advice upon such a subject.

In the second place, I must venture respectfully to dissent from the view expressed in Lord Salvesen's judgment to the effect that responsibility would arise for the injury, disease, or loss caused by flooding and nuisance if, but only if, such flooding and nuisance had been periodical or frequent. The learned Judge puts the condition thus³: "If it is found that injury is being periodically done to his property." I agree with Lord Salvesen in his

April 4, 1913. declaration that "each ratepayer in the town is entitled to have his property efficiently drained; and it can never be the right of the town authorities to sacrifice the interest of the owners of houses situated on a lower level for the benefit of the upper districts." But his Lordship proceeds to make a serious limitation upon this wholesome doctrine, for he adds: "If, therefore, the owner of a house abutting on a street or road within the city boundaries finds himself frequently flooded with sewage because of the drains constructed by the Local Authority becoming gorged in times of heavy rainfall, I cannot doubt that, apart from damnum fatale, he would have a claim against such authority for failing to discharge one of their primary functions." I am of opinion that the citizens of Edinburgh are not subject to the serious peril which is thus suggested as defensible in law. If citizens must wait time after time, and suffer the incidence of flooding, with its dangers and possible loss, until the inundations can be characterised as periodical or frequent, I think the security aimed at, both by the common law of the land and by the statutes affecting the city of Edinburgh, would be largely and improperly impaired. The responsibility of the authorities is for each and every failure of their duty in effectual drainage. Unless this be secured a dangerous latitude would be allowed in effective local administration, and I do not think that such a latitude is permissible by law.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be reverted to by this House, and that the judgment of the Second Division should be reversed with costs.

Revenue—Duties on land values—Valuation—"Assessable site value"—Minus value—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. cap. 8), sec. 25 (4).

Held (rev. judgment of the Judges of the Court of Session named for the purpose of hearing appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts) that under section 25 (4) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, the "assessable site value" of land can be a minus quantity.

Ld. Chancellor (In the Court of Session, 18th April 1912—1912 S. C. 948.)
(Haldane). The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the respondents in the Ld. Atkinson. Court of Session, appealed to the House of Lords. The appeal was Lord Shaw of against an interlocutor of 18th April, which dealt with the merits, Dunfermline. and also against a subsequent interlocutor which found the appellants
Lord Moulton. liable in expenses.

The case was heard on 3rd, 4th, and 7th April 1913.

At delivering judgment on 2nd May 1913,—

May 2, 1913.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question which comes before the House for determination in this appeal is one of an entirely novel character. It is whether, in making the valuation of the site value of land required to be made by the provisions of the Finance Act of 1910, for the purposes of the new land taxes which the Act imposes, the original assessable site value which has to be ascertained may be shown as a minus quantity. The argument for the Crown, which was the appellant, is in substance that while it is admitted that the site value which is the subject of these taxes must always be a real element in the actual value of the land, the statutory calculations in which that real element appears may, with a view to the measurement of its subsequent increase, have to express it, in an appropriate valuation account, under the guise of a minus figure, just as might be the case in measuring with a Centigrade thermometer the rise from a temperature below the freezing point. It is therefore said that while this mode of measurement appears artificial, and may present the original site value under the form of a negative quantity, it is not really different from the procedure of a surveyor who measures the difference between quantities below and above a datum line arbitrarily selected for convenience in reckoning, and that it is a way occasioning no injustice of ascertaining a factor required for the measurement of the actual and positive value which is to be the subject of taxation.

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.

By the respondents, on the other hand, it is contended that, reading the statute as a whole, it appears that what is called in it original assessable site value must always, if it exists at all, be shown as an actual and positive amount. And it was pointed out that in one case, at all events, the statute in terms directs a reduction to be made of 10 per cent of the site value, a reduction which would be nugatory and impossible if that value could be shown as a minus amount.

In order to make clear the meaning of the question thus raised I turn to the scheme of levying duties on land values enacted by the Finance Act of 1910. Part I. of the Act, which contains this scheme, consists of forty-two sections. Of these sections, the first twenty-four relate to the levy of duties and the remainder to the machinery of valuation for the purpose of these duties and to other matters of a miscellaneous character. Part I. commences by enacting a charge of duty on what it calls the increment value of land, defined by section 2 to be the amount (if any) by which the site value of the land, on the occasion on which increment duty is to be collected, exceeds the original site value. The value to be taxed must have accrued since 30th April 1909.

The next duty imposed by Part I. is reversion duty, which is to be paid by the landlord on the value of the benefit accruing to him by the determination of a long lease. This value is to be the amount by which the total value, after deduction of so much as is attributable to works executed or expenditure made by him during the lease, exceeds the total value at the date of the lease.

The third duty imposed is undeveloped land duty at the rate of one half-penny per annum for every twenty shillings of the capital amount of the site value of undeveloped land of certain kinds, with a special provision that the duty is not to be charged where the site value does not exceed £50 per acre.

The fourth of the group of duties imposed under Part I. is the mineral rights duty, but this it is unnecessary to refer to for the purposes of the present case.

I now come to the sections which provide for the valuation required for the measurement of the values so to be taxed.

In approaching the controversy as to the meaning of these sections I think it worth while to recall a principle which must always be borne in mind in construing Acts of Parliament, and particularly legislation of a novel kind. The duty of a Court of law is simply to take the statute it has to construe as it stands, and to construe its words according to their natural significance. While reference may be made to the state of the law, and the material facts and events with which it is apparent that Parliament was dealing, it is not admissible to speculate on the probable opinions and motives of those who framed the legislation, excepting in so far as these appear from the language of the statute. That language must indeed be read as a whole. If the clearly expressed scheme of the Act requires it, particular expressions may have to be read in a sense which would not be the natural one if they could be taken by themselves. But subject to this the words used must be given their natural meaning, unless to do so would lead to a result which is so absurd that it cannot be supposed, in the absence of expressions which are wholly unambiguous, to have been contemplated.

I will now consider the valuation sections. Section 26 directs a valuation to be made of all land in the United Kingdom as on 30th April 1909. It is to show separately the total value and the site value of the land, and the definition of these terms is to be found in section 25, which is of cardinal importance for the purposes of this appeal. That section defines four separate kinds of value—gross value, full site value, total value, and assessable site value. The object is, by means of valuation based on these definitions and carried out in a fashion which is prescribed, to provide a standard by which assessable site value may be measured. Such a standard is necessary, for in the case of increment duty section 2, to which I have already referred, defines the increment value on which the duty is to be levied as the difference between the site value when the duty is to be collected and the original site value.

These two site values therefore appear as figures one of which is to be subtracted from the other; as terms the importance of which is that they bear a relation to each other which enables such a sum to be done. But on reference to the rest of section 25 it will be seen that while site value is regarded in the statute as signifying a real element in the value of land, it is an element which the statute separates from the rest of that value only notionally, and for the purposes of measurement. The method by which this is done is to begin by defining as gross value the estimated market value of the fee-simple of the land as it would stand if sold free from incumbrances, burdens, charges, or restrictions. The next step is to proceed to define the full site value, and this is declared to be the amount which remains after deducting from the gross value, estimated as above, the difference between that value and the amount which the fee-simple might be expected to realise if the land were sold divested of all buildings, structures, trees, &c. What is here directed to be deducted is the difference made to the selling price of the land by the presence of the buildings, structures, and trees on it, the result affording a measure of the value of the bare site. The next step is to measure what is called the total value, and this is defined to be the gross value after deducting the amount by which the sale price would be diminished if the land were sold subject to all qualifications of the absolute title, in the nature of fixed charges, public rights, easements, and covenants entered into in the public interest. It will be observed from the definition section that the expression "fixed charges" includes feu-duties and ground rents, but excludes mortgages and similar incumbrances. With the aid of these definitions the Act next proceeds to lay down how assessable site value is to be ascertained.

May 2, 1913.
Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.
Lord
Chancellor.

It is what remains of the total value after deducting the same amount as is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value. In the case of gross value and full site value the land is assumed to be sold with an absolutely clear title. In the case of total value that title is treated as subject to certain specified qualifications, but the land is assumed to be sold with all its buildings, structures, trees, &c., upon it. But before the figure for assessable site value can be reached there are other and additional items which, under the provisions of section 25, subsection 4, may have to be deducted from the total value. These are such parts of the total value as are attributable to works executed, expenditure of a capital nature for improving the land for building or business purposes, the appropriation for the use of the public of other land by the person interested, money spent on redemption of fixed charges, enfranchisement of copyholds, or obtaining release from restrictive agreements and other items mentioned. Moreover from the total value there is also to be deducted the amount which it would be necessary to spend in order to divest the land of the buildings, trees, and other things of which it is to be taken to be divested in order to arrive at the full site value.

It is obvious that the aggregate amount of these deductions may exceed the total value as the Act defines it. The value of the buildings and other structures and of the trees on the land may be great in proportion to the total value, and so may the amount of the expenditure which is directed to be allowed for. The result may easily be that the person making the calculation will have, after ascertaining this aggregate amount, to bring out the balance of assessable site value as a minus quantity. On this the language of section 25 appears to me to be imperative and quite clear and to afford no room for uncertainty.

And when I look back to section 2, which deals with increment value, it seems to me that this conclusion leads to no difficulty. For the increment value directed to be taxed is, as I have already pointed out, simply the difference between present and past site value, and this difference is as real and easily measured when one of the quantities is minus as when both are plus. Julius Caesar was born in 100 B.C and died in 44 B.C. The period of his lifetime is not on that account less real, nor does the circumstance that it commenced before the Christian era, in a time the lapse of which is consequently reckoned by minus numbers, make the aggregate of years between then and the present time the less real. The temperatures below the freezing point which is indicated by zero on the Centigrade thermometer are shown as minus figures, but a rise in such temperatures is not the less actual because it is measured negatively.

And so in the case of increment duty, the duty in relation to which the valuation called in question in the controversy before us becomes of practical importance, there is no difficulty. The growth in value which is marked out for taxation is not rendered the less real because of the method prescribed for its measurement. What the Act appears to contemplate is that the actual growth is to be taxed, and it lays down how the amount of this growth is to be expressed. If, as has been argued, it is wrong to enter a minus amount in the balance-sheet which the valuer has to make out, the consequence must be that notwithstanding that there has been an actual increase, measured by the difference between a minus figure and nothing, the starting point of this increase must be struck out, and the original site value entered in all cases as nothing.

Such a result would lead to great injustice. Suppose two houses side by side in a street where the site values were exactly the same originally, and had increased equally, and that in the case of one of them a lump sum price had been paid so that there was a small feu-duty or none at all, while in that of the other the feu-duty was substantial. The assessable site value might appear as a minus quantity in the latter case and as a positive quantity in the other. This would make no difference in the estimation of increment duty as chargeable on a rise in site value which was actually equal in both cases. But if in the latter case the original site value were entered as nothing, the result would be that the increase in the site value of the second house would be made to appear as less than in the case of the first, simply because there was a substantial feu-duty. And yet there was really no difference between the two cases excepting in the mere form in which the price was paid for the site and the building upon it. The seller gets his lump sum price, or an equivalent feu-duty in the second case, secured over both site and building. In either alternative his title is to a fixed sum and to nothing more. The buyer, on the other hand, gets his site and building, and an exclusive title to any rise in the value of either.

It appears to me that the Act of Parliament is definite in its directions, and that its scheme is not ambiguous. It was pointed out by Mr Clyde in the able argument which he addressed to us on its construction that subsection 5 of section 3 does not, if read literally, harmonise with the interpretation I have put on the rest of Part I. For it directs that on the first occasion of the collection of increment value duty the increment value is to be deemed to be reduced by an amount equal to 10 per cent of the original site value, which must therefore have been contemplated by the draftsman as being a positive quantity. That is true if the words are read literally and without reference to the context. But an isolated expression of this kind cannot alter the plain scheme and principle of the whole of the valuation sections. And I think the subsection in question becomes harmonious and intelligible if original site value is read in this particular case as meaning, not the artificially expressed figure to which the last paragraph of the general definition May 2, 1913. in section 25, subsection 4, refers, but original site value in the sense of what remains after deducting from the amount of the site value at the time of collection the amount which represents the increase since the original valuation of what at that time, however described in the valuer's balance-sheet, must have been contemplated by those who framed the statute as, taken by itself, an actual and therefore positive element in the value of the entire property. A similar observation may be made about section 17, subsection 1, which prescribes that undeveloped land duty is not to be charged in respect of any land where the site value of the land does not exceed £50 per acre. From the nature of the case and the very definition of undeveloped land, questions which may arise in the case of increment duty are excluded, and it was not necessary to provide for them.

As soon as it is realised that the deductions, which have to be made in order to state the account which the statute prescribes, have to be made equally when ascertaining present site value and when ascertaining original site value for the purposes of increment duty, the obscurity disappears. That these deductions have to be made in both cases is plain from the concluding words of section 2, subsection 2, which gives directions to that effect. Those who framed the Act have adopted a method of working out the account which appears artificial, but which when examined carefully turns out to be necessary if the injustice is to be avoided which a different procedure would bring about in such instances as that of the two adjacent houses to which I have referred. The true view appears to me to be that the intention is to levy the tax only on an actual increase of value, and that it is merely in order to measure this increase that an arithmetical method is used in which minus numbers may appear among other figures.

Having arrived at these conclusions as to the meaning of the valuation provisions of Part I., I now come to their bearing on the appeal before this House.

The appeal is brought against two interlocutors of the Judges of the Court of Session named for the purpose of hearing appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts. By the first of these interlocutors the learned Judges overruled the decision of a referee appointed under the Finance Act of 1910, by which decision the referee had entered the original assessable site value of certain property vested in the respondents as trustees of George Herbert, deceased, and being Nos. 57 to 69 Westend Park Street, in the city of Glasgow, as minus £545. The second of the interlocutors under appeal was consequential, and was a decree against the appellants for costs.

The referee decided that the original assessable site value was the minus sum I have mentioned, but he went on to say, in the case which he stated, that, if it should be held by a Court of law that such a minus value was illegal under the Finance Act, 1910, he alternatively determined that the original assessable site value was nothing, and that in the event of his first alternative finding being upheld there were to be no expenses, while if the second alternative was upheld the respondents were entitled to expenses.

The only controverted question related to the site value, and as to this the referee found as follows :—

Gross (original) value	£4828
Deductions from gross value :—Difference between gross value and value of the fee-simple of the land divested of buildings, trees, &c.	4320
Feu-duty, ground-annual, or tack-duty	1053
Original full site value	508
Original total value	3775

He went on in the case to state that it seemed to him that his duty under the Act was clear. By section 25, subsection 4, the assessable site value meant, he thought, the total value after deducting the same amount as was to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value. Applying these figures, the result he reached was this :—

Original total value	£3775
Deduct amount to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value	4320
Original assessable site value	minus 545

The Judges of the Court of Session who heard the case held that, reading the Act as a whole, an assessable value could not be a minus quantity, and on this ground they overruled the decision of the referee and gave judgment to the effect that the value in question must be entered as nothing. They seem to have been impressed with the idea that upon the principle adopted by the referee the owner of the site held it under burdens which prevented him from getting any benefit from it until it had appreciated to a positive quantity, and that until then the appreciation accrued for the benefit of the holder of the feu-duty or other fixed charge. The answer to this is that what will be taxed when increment duty is levied will be not the original site value, but the increase in site value, an increase which must always accrue for the benefit of the fiar, and can never increase the amount of the feu-duty or other fixed charge. The fallacy in the judgments of the learned Judges appears to me to be that they took original site value, which is nothing but a formula for measuring a real element of increase in value, as intended to be by itself a definition of an assessable value. With all deference to the learned Judges, I think they have misconceived the machinery of the statute, and that the referee, whose decision they disturbed, was right in the conclusion he came to.

For these reasons I move that the two interlocutors of the Court of Session be recalled, and that it be declared that the first or principal decision of the referee was right.

LORD ATKINSON.—This is in substance an appeal against an interlocutor dated 18th April 1912, of the Lords of the Court of Session named for the purpose of hearing appeals under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, on a case stated by way of appeal from a referee under section 33 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. It appears from the case that the referee had fixed the original assessable site value, as he styles it, of the proprietary estate and interest of the testamentary trustees of one George Herbert, deceased, in premises described as 57 to 69 Westend Park Street, Glasgow, May 2, 1913. at a minus quantity or sum, namely, minus £545, or in the alternative, if it should be held by a competent Court of law that the original assessable site value cannot under the Act be legally fixed at a minus sum, he fixed it at nil. By the interlocutor appealed from, it is, as I understand it, decided that it is illegal to fix this original assessable site value at a minus sum, and that the alternative decision to fix it at cypher would under the circumstances of the case have been right. The referee has set out in detail in figures the values in money necessary to be ascertained, and the deductions and calculations necessary to be made under the statute to arrive at the original site value of the land. These values are, or must for the purposes of this appeal be taken to be, accurate, and the deductions and calculations must be taken to have been properly made, so that the sole question for discussion is this: Is it lawful under the provisions of this Finance Act to fix the original assessable site value of land to which Part I. of the Act applies at a minus sum?

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland

Ld. Atkinson.

Part I. comprises forty-two sections. Of these sections 1 to 12 inclusive deal with increment value duty; sections 13 to 15, both inclusive, with reversion duty; sections 16 to 19, both inclusive, with undeveloped land duty; and sections 20 to 24, both inclusive, with mineral rights duty. By sections 25 to 34, both inclusive, machinery is set up for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the amounts of these several descriptions of duties. Section 41 is a definition clause, and section 42 contains provisions adapting the statute to Scotland.

The definitions are matters of importance. In the former of these two sections the word "land" is defined negatively, i.e., as not including any incorporeal hereditament issuing or granted out of the land. In section 42 it is defined, as to Scotland, as not including amongst other things "any servitude, superiority, casualty, feu-duty, or ground-annual, or any incorporeal heritable right." The expression "rent-charge" is defined in that section as including "feu-duty and ground-annual." The expression "interest" in relation to land is defined as not including, amongst other things, any teninds, servitudes, or superiorities. The expression "owner" is defined as the fiar of the land except where the land is let on lease for a term of which more than fifty years are unexpired, when the lessee is to be deemed the owner. It also includes an institute or heir of entail in possession. The expression "freeholder" is defined to include "fiar," "liferenter of land settled within the meaning of the Finance Act of 1894," and "institute or heir of entail in possession." The expression "fixed charge" is in section 41 defined to mean, among other things, a rent-charge, and as a rent-charge includes a feu-duty, the latter is, therefore, a fixed charge. It is a fixed charge upon the land and everything upon it, invariable in amount, though, of course, if capitalised, as it must be under section 32, its capital value may vary according as it is well or ill secured, but the superior to whom the feu-duty is payable is not an owner of land within the meaning of the Act. He has not by virtue of his superiority even an "interest" in the land within the meaning of the Act. He pays no taxes on any increment in value such as this case has in contemplation, and has no concern with the calculations by which the amount of that increment is determined.

Ld. Atkinson.

Now the general policy of Part I. of the statute (certainly as to all the subjects of property other than minerals), so far as revealed by its provisions, is in its main outline apparently this, to levy a heavy tax on the kind of increment in the value of land used, or suitable to be used, as a site or sites for buildings, which is not attributable to the expenditure of capital by or on behalf of the owner for the purpose of improving the value of the land as building land, or for the purpose of any business, trade, or industry other than agriculture. The increment in value arising from an increased demand for building land due to an increase in the wealth or numbers of the surrounding or adjacent population, to its progress in trade or manufacture, or to works carried out at the expense of the municipality within the limits of which the lands are situate, and such like things, the unearned increment as it is popularly called, it is alone designed to tax. Purely agricultural land and some other classes of land are expressly exempted from liability. Special provisions are introduced dealing with undeveloped land duty and reversion duty, and certain conditions and qualifications are prescribed as to the application of this principle in particular instances, but the above are, I think, the chief features of the policy. With the merits or demerits of this policy this House in its judicial capacity is, of course, in no way concerned. Its task is to ascertain from the provisions of the statute itself what the policy is, and, when ascertained, to apply that policy so far as those provisions will permit.

It was easy to select the punctum temporis from which the increment in value to be taxed should be taken to have commenced to accrue. This is done by section 26. It is 30th April 1909. The difficulty was to fix the particular value which was to be taken to have increased, and by the comparison of which with some other value the amount of the increment could be measured. Whether these two values be fictitious, or actual, positive, and real, is wholly immaterial, provided only that a comparison between them can be made, and that that comparison, if made, will furnish a true measure of the amount of the increment.

By two of the machinery sections, namely, sections 26 and 27, the Commissioners named in the Act are required, as soon as may be after its passing, to cause a valuation to be made of all the land in the United Kingdom, showing its estimated total value and site value respectively as on 30th April 1909.

They are also required to serve upon the owner of every piece of land with which they deal a copy of their valuation of that land. It is called a provisional valuation because the owner may object to it; machinery is set up for determining the validity of his objection, and, if need be, amending the valuation according to the result. If no objection be made, or if made be overruled, or if allowed and the valuation be amended accordingly, the values mentioned in this valuation as it was originally framed or as amended, as the case may be, are to be the original total value and the original site value of the land for the purpose of the Act.

Some rather fanciful estimates have to be made and elaborate calculations resorted to in order to fix, in conformity with the policy and provisions of the Act, this original site value, this datum line, as it were, from which the increment in value is to be measured.

Section 1 is the taxing section. It imposes a duty on the increment May 2, 1913.
 value of land at the rate of 20 per cent, and treats that value as accruing after 30th April 1909. It also specifies the occasions upon which the duty is to be collected. Section 2 shows what is the nature of the increment to be taxed, indicates how it is to be measured, its amount ascertained, and the occasions on which the duty is to be collected. By subsection 1 of this latter section it is provided that the increment value on any one of these occasions shall be deemed to be the amount, if any, by which the site value on that occasion exceeds the original site value. As far as this function of the site value is concerned it does not matter, it would appear to me, in the slightest whether the fixed starting point is indicated by a plus sum or symbol or by a minus sum or symbol, because the difference between minus £500 and minus £100 is £400, just as truly as the difference between plus £100 and plus £500 is £400. For instance, if the original site value be taken as minus £500, that is, £500 less than nothing, and the site value at the time when the duty falls to be deducted be taken at minus £100, that is, £100 less than nothing, there would still be as truly an increment of £400 in the value of the land as if the original site value had been fixed at plus £100 and the site value at the time the duty fell to be collected had been found to be plus £500. The increment in both cases would be precisely the same, and should be taxed in the one case as in the other.

Herbert's
 Trustees v.
 Inland
 Revenue.
 ———
 Ld. Atkinson.

Again, if the decision appealed from were right, and if, although the methods for ascertaining the original site value prescribed by the statute should bring out a minus sum, £500, its value should be fixed at cypher, the result would be that though the value of the property as building ground increased by £1000, the site value at the date of collection of the duty would only appear as plus £500. The true increment would not be taken as its undoubted amount, £1000, but only at half that amount, £500, since it would only exceed cypher by that sum. Subsection 1 of section 2 prescribes the mode and method by which the site value is to be ascertained upon the occasion when the duty falls to be collected. The words occurring at the end of subhead (d) of that subsection take one forward to the 25th section, as they provide that from the values mentioned in sub-heads (a), (b), (c), and (d) deductions are to be made like those to be made under the general provisions of the Act as to valuation for the purpose of arriving at the site value of land from the total value. These general provisions are contained in this 25th section. They must necessarily be applied by the Commissioners for the first time when these officials proceed under sections 26 and 27 to fix the original site value, and they must be again applied when the occasional site value has to be ascertained, namely, when the duty falls to be collected. The deductions thus authorised, indeed made imperative, are so many and so considerable that they must often produce, as they have produced in this case, a minus result; but as they are to be made at both ends of the scale, as it were, the upper and the lower, in ascertaining the two site values, the original and the occasional, the comparison between the amounts of the two values, even if over-reduced, will still furnish a true test and measure of the actual increment.

Now section 25 provides in effect (1) that the gross value of land means its market value if sold as it stands free from incumbrances; (2) that the full site value is what remains after the difference between this market price and the sum which the land would fetch in open market if sold divested of all buildings and other structures upon it, timber, fruit trees, &c., has been deducted from the gross value.

Then total value (subsection 3) means this gross value after certain deductions have been made from it. These deductions are of a peculiar nature. In the present case the only one of the things enumerated in subsection 3 which affects the land with which the case is conversant is the fixed charge, the feu-duty. The capitalised value of this duty has been found to be £1053.

The gross value of the premises has been estimated to be £4828, the deduction from which of this sum of £1053 leaves the sum of £3775 as the total value. Further deductions have, however, to be made under subsection 4 from this total value to obtain what is unhappily styled "the assessable site value of the land." That is a most misleading expression. It suggests the idea that site value itself is assessed with a duty, is taxed. Site value is neither assessed nor taxed. That is plain from section 1. What is taxed is the increment in the site value, starting from the original site value, and in my view it is clear that the "assessable site value" mentioned in section 25 is and must be the same thing as "the original site value" mentioned in section 2, subsection 1.

In the present case the only additional deduction to be made from the total value is that mentioned in subhead (a) of this subsection 4. It is formidable in amount. On referring to subsection 2 of this section it will be found to be the difference between the gross value and the market value of the fee of the land if sold, divested of all buildings, timber, &c. That has in this case been fixed at £4320, which, if deducted from the total value of £3775, leaves, of course, a minus balance of £545. This looks, no doubt, an absurd result, but if it be applied to an imaginary case, such as the figures in this case will enable one to deal with, as part of the machinery for measuring the amount of the increment to be taxed, it will, I think, be found to work out satisfactorily. Suppose, for instance, the owners in the present case had spent £1000 on improving the buildings on their land, and by reason of that expenditure, and that alone, had raised the market value of the premises, if sold free from incumbrances, by £1000, and had, in fact, sold the premises so improved for £5828, on the transfer of the property an occasion would arise for the collection of the increment value duty. The site value of the land should then be taken to be the purchase money, less the deductions authorised by section 25 (subsections 3 and 4 (a)). But these deductions would not then be confined to the capitalised value of the feu-duty, and the sum of £4320. If these alone were deducted it would show an increment in site value of £455, whereas, ex hypothesi, there has been no such increase. Another deduction would have to be made, that mentioned in subsection 4 (b) of section 25, namely, that part of the total value proved to be attributable to the expenditure by the owners of £1000 in rebuilding. This would presumably be £1000. When this sum is also deducted from the total value, it leaves the site value determined for the occasion at minus £545, the same as the original site value. This is quite as it should be, since, ex hypothesi, there is no increase in the site value.

The figures do not enable one to take a case where the gross value of the May 2, 1913. land as it stands is increased from causes other than capital expenditure, since the market value of the denuded land under such circumstances has not been found.

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.

Gross value, total value, full site value, are, no doubt, all real things, actual positive values. It does not necessarily follow, I think, that occasional site value must always be a real thing, an actual positive value. Circumstances might conceivably occur in the locality between the time the original site value was fixed and the time when the occasional value had to be fixed which would cause a great diminution in the value of the land, both in the state in which it stood and as a building site. The occasional site value would then be less than the original site value, and in such a case the former would properly and necessarily be indicated by a minus sum or quantity if the original site value was itself indicated by 0.

Ld. Atkinson.

With all respect to the learned Lords who have pronounced the interlocutors appealed from, it would appear to me that they have not steadily kept in view what is the true function of this original site value when ascertained, the particular purpose which it serves in Part I. of this statute. The main, if not the only, purpose which it serves is, as I have said, merely to fix the datum line from which the taxable increment in the value of the particular piece of land shall be measured on the occasion when the duty on that increment falls to be collected.

The fact that it is indicated by a minus sum or quantity cannot, I think, be held to prevent its serving this purpose, any more than it could be held that the increasing temperature of mercury from the freezing point upwards could not be measured by a Fahrenheit thermometer because the freezing point of mercury is, in that instrument, fixed at nine degrees below zero.

In my opinion the comparison between the original site value and the occasional site value where both are fixed in conformity with the statute will furnish, in this and every other case, a true measure of the amount of the increment value which is to be taxed, and I cannot find anything whatever in the statute to justify the fixing of the original site value at any figure different from that arrived at by following the methods expressly prescribed in the statute.

Mr Clyde in his most able and ingenious argument on behalf of the respondents relied much on the provision of section 3, subsection 5, to show that the original site value could not be a minus sum or quantity, inasmuch as that subsection directs that on the first occasion on which the so-called occasional site value is to be fixed 10 per cent of the original site value is to be deducted, and 10 per cent of a minus quantity could not be deducted, or if deducted, would result in an increase of the occasional site value. Well, though this last result would not follow from a deduction of 10 per cent of nothing if the original value was fixed at nil as it has been by the interlocutors appealed from, still the provisions of the subsection, I think, do indicate that the framers of the statute did not contemplate that the original site value should ever be reduced to a 0 or to a minus quantity; or it may be that the words "original site value" have been used in some sense different from that which they bear in section 2, subsection 1; or lastly, I suppose, that they have crept into the subsection by mistake. He suggested, as I

May 2, 1913. understood, that the words "full site value" should be substituted for "original site value."

Herbert's Trustees v. Inland Revenue. Speaking for myself, I may say that I do not, as at present advised, see my way to a satisfactory solution of the difficulty he has raised.

Ld. Atkinson. The House is not required, however, to construe section 3, subsection 5, on the present occasion. It is therefore unnecessary on this appeal to express any decided opinion as to its meaning. Upon the only question we have to decide, namely, whether it is legal to fix the original site value at a minus sum or quantity, I have formed a very definite opinion in the affirmative. I think it is lawful so to do, and if the provisions of the Act are to be carried out it is necessary to do so. And I am further of opinion, for the reasons already given, that this will in no way prevent the site value serving efficiently and justly the purpose it was designed by the Act to serve. I therefore think the decision appealed from was wrong and should be reversed, that the original site value should be fixed at minus £545, and this appeal be allowed.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—This appeal to your Lordships' House is regarded as of importance, not only because it is said to affect a principle upon which the entries with regard to land values are to be made by the officers charged with that duty under the Finance Act, 1910, but also on account of the large number of values throughout the kingdom which the principle affects.

Importance in various passages of the judgments of the Court below is rightly attached to the objects of the statute. One of the chief of these is that to be achieved under section 26. By that section—(1) it is provided that "the Commissioners shall, as soon as may be after the passing of this Act, cause a valuation to be made of all land in the United Kingdom, showing separately the total value and the site value respectively of the land." I exclude the reference to agricultural land, with which this case is not concerned; but the section goes on to provide that each piece of land under separate occupation shall be separately valued. And the estimate of value is to be made as on 30th April 1909.

To all intents and purposes this is a statutory requirement for the formation of a Domesday Book, and the object cannot be accomplished unless all land in the United Kingdom is included in that book. The two items which must appear with regard to every piece of land under separate occupation are the total value and the site value thereof respectively.

With regard to each and all of these terms the statute explains, and, in my opinion, clearly and sufficiently explains, their meaning. I think it right to say so, and, looking to the complexity of the subject, and having in mind the pressing conditions under which modern legislation is accomplished, to say so emphatically. Its drafting in subsequent cases will, no doubt, have to be as minutely analysed as it has been in the present; but upon the only point which your Lordships have to determine I do not myself see how language could have made it clearer.

That point is, What is site value? Mr Binnie, a skilled valuer, having reached his results by conforming simply to the provisions of the Act, is able to make his calculations with brevity and entire clearness; and he makes these two remarks. He says, "My duty under the Act is clear and unambiguous," and in a later portion of the stated case he says, "I do not see how, having regard to the directions in section 25, it is possible to arrive at any other conclusion." I think that Mr Binnie—addressing himself, as he manifestly did, to no other task than that of conforming to what the statute has laid down—was justified in both of these observations. The statute in no way confused him; his figures and calculation appear on half a sheet of paper. I think this result arose because the terms of the statute as well as of his duty were so plain.

May 2, 1913.
Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.
Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

Having in view accordingly this main object of the statute, namely, the formation of a Domesday Book, or a valuation of all land in the United Kingdom, showing separately the total value and site value of each separately occupied portion of it, I ask myself what, according to the Act, is the meaning of these terms? In the first place as to the meaning given to "land." Land has been already defined by the Interpretation Act of 1889,¹ and by section 42 of this Finance Act it is further declared that land does not include superiority, casualty, feu-duty, or ground-annual; nor does "interest" in relation to land include superiorities.

There was a considerable discussion and exposition at your Lordships' bar of the system of landed rights in Scotland. With regard to these I will only observe that the policy of this statute, as well as its provisions, appears to me to be fairly clear. It is no doubt true that the right of a superior—the dominium directum—is in law an estate in land under the feudal system just as much as under that system is the right of the vassal, whose estate in land is denominated the dominium utile. But the situation of parties must also be viewed from the standpoint of business, of possession, and of finance. One would not unnaturally expect that this last, and not the other, is the standpoint of the Act.

The subject being so viewed (and casualties and occasional payments being for the sake of simplicity discarded), the superior is the recipient from the vassal of a feu-duty. The vassal is the person holding the land by a permanent and substantially indefeasible tenure; and howsoever property may improve in value, the increment in that value is secured by the vassal alone. The rights of the superior are financially nothing more nor less than the right to draw a fixed sum secured upon the land from the vassal. Within the range of finance and actual management that is how the matter stands. In the region of feudal conveyancing it is true that the right of the superior, being a right in the land itself, can in certain circumstances be amplified or made effective, so far as practical result goes, by the remedy called an irritancy ob non solutum canonem, that is to say, the entire subject can be made to revert to the superior if the vassal is two years in arrear with his feu-duty.

I have purposely made these observations in the most general form because I desire to state broadly that I do not think a Finance Act in the United Kingdom ought to be—unless that be logically compelled—diverted from its plain financial object and meaning by considerations which do not touch general finance but affect merely the feudal conveyancing of land in

May 2, 1913. Scotland. As I have already mentioned, so far as finance is concerned, the true owner who will get the benefit of any rise in the value and who is in that sense the beneficial owner interested in the taxation upon land value, and also in the increment thereof, is the vassal, the owner of the dominium utile. And so far as the superior is concerned, he is placed by the statute exactly as what in the region of finance he is, namely, a person having a right to a fixed payment subject to no increment by change in economic or market conditions. Accordingly he and the bondholder or mortgagee are quoad finance upon the same footing. The superior drawing his feu-duty is treated like a mortgagee drawing his interest. He takes a fixed sum per annum. No doubt in one case, as in the other, were that fixed sum not paid certain drastic remedies and consequences might follow; and no doubt in the one case, as in the other, if the gross value of the subject goes up the feu-duty or the loan becomes better secured; but so far as the land is concerned the beneficial owner is the vassal, and the land dealt with by the Act is the vassal's land.

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

This, which would seem the natural and reasonable view to take of a financial statute, is entirely confirmed by its various terms. Under what clause, for instance, does feu-duty come? By section 25, subsection 3, there is a reference to fixed charges. What are these? By section 41 the expression "fixed charge" means "any rent charge." That term is also defined by the statute. In the application of the Act to Scotland by section 42 "the expression 'rent charge' includes feu-duty." Feu-duty accordingly is treated like any other fixed charge. In particular, because all feu-duty is drawn by a superior, and because a superior has an estate in the land itself under the feudal system—all this is wiped away in a financial statute. The vassal is the owner, and one of the fixed charges he pays is his feu-duty.

It is only in view of a protracted argument in your Lordships' house that I have ventured to state these things which are rescued from confusion and made so plain by the text of the statute itself. Having thus ascertained what the term "land" is, and disentangled it for the purposes of the Act from the superior's rights, the next thing, under section 26, is that all land must appear in the valuation. Therefore all land under contract of feu must there appear, and the land which there appears is the vassal's right, and the vassal's alone, the superior's right having fallen into the category of what financially it truly is, a fixed charge upon the vassal's land.

The second term applicable to the making of the Domesday Book, under section 26, is that, while all land is to appear, the valuation is to show separately the total value and the site value. What, then, is total value? That is made clear by section 25, subsection 3:—"The total value of land means the gross value after deducting the amount by which the gross value would be diminished if the land were sold subject to any fixed charges." By subsection 1 the gross value is explained to mean the open market value of the whole subject with all the buildings, &c., upon it, and free from incumbrances. So that to get the total value you have simply to deduct from the gross or market value the amount of the fixed charges. So far as total value is concerned, that is a very simple calculation. If the gross market value was £5000, and the fixed charges (in this case the feu-duty when capitalised) were £1500, the balance would be "the total value," namely, £3500. This separate entry in the Domesday Book is the result May 2, 1913. of a simple calculation.

The next statutory entry in the valuation is the site value. How is that to be arrived at? In section 25, subsection 4, it is said site value (I dismiss the reference to the parenthesis, which does not apply to the present occasion) "shall be deemed to be a reference to the assessable site value," and in the same subsection "the assessable site value of land means the total value, after deducting (a) the same amount as is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value." Various other deductions are to be made from total value, but they do not occur in the present case and need not be referred to. Now, gross value was the unincumbered market value of the whole subject, including the buildings, &c. The full site value of land means (section 25, subsection 2) the market value of the whole subject if divested of the buildings, &c. It may be called divested site value. In the case given, if the gross value were £5000 and the buildings were worth £4000, the full site or divested site value would be £1000.

Trustees v.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

I revert accordingly to, What is the assessable site value? It is to be the total value after deducting the buildings, &c. Now the total value was £3500. Accordingly, the assessable site value means that £3500, after deducting the buildings, and these were £4000. The result is demonstrably certain that there is produced a minus value of £500. As Mr Binnie says, if you proceed by the directions of section 25, it is not "possible to arrive at any other conclusion."

But I desire to state that, if the data prescribed by the statute for the calculation be employed, this minus value which is thus reached is exactly what would be reached, not in hundreds, but in thousands and tens of thousands of cases in Scotland. The system of feuing land is much prized, providing as it does perpetuity and security of tenure, and giving the beneficial increment to the vassal who erects the buildings or makes the improvements. But in the feu-charter it is, by the commonest words of style, a matter of express prescription that the vassal must make the superior also secure in the feu-duty by erecting and maintaining upon the lands buildings of sufficient value to afford a cover for that security. Land may be worth, in its agricultural condition, from £1 to £3 per acre, but, on account of its local situation and advantages, it may be feued for building purposes at from £10 to £30 or from £100 to £300 per acre. The buildings in such cases are often tenements erected upon the old Scotch system—with regard to which there is a convenient and familiar code of law; they are of several storeys in height; and they are owned, it may be, each storey, or even part of each storey, by a separate proprietor. Upon an acre of ground there thus grows up a group of proprietors, among whom the feu-duty is split up under arrangements which need not be here entered upon. Where buildings of the kind described have been erected, their value is large. But, upon the other hand, the heavy feu-duties, when capitalised and loaded upon the market value of the whole subject, very greatly reduce that, and so the "total value" (arrived at after this deduction) becomes relatively small in the very cases in which the value of the buildings becomes relatively high. In such cases the buildings and improvements far exceed in value the market value of a subject so heavily burdened with feu-duty. The case dealt with by Mr

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

Binnie shows figures which must be much within the mark in common experience; but, to use the round numbers I previously employed, the gross value of the whole subject burdened with the feu-duty is the total value under the statute, and is the figure of £3500. The buildings and improvements are £4000, and the minus figure is demonstrably £500.

I repeat these things because of this—that, unless this figure be so arrived at and the statute with regard to these calculations be loyally and strictly followed, one of the main objects of the statute under section 26 will be largely defeated. As I have mentioned, in thousands of cases of urban land in Scotland, the value of the buildings by themselves exceeds the value of the subject if loaded with a large feu-duty, and it would be to sterilise the action of the officials under the statute in making a valuation of all land if these instances had to be excluded. The land of Scotland would not be wholly valued, and numberless separate occupancies would disappear. It appears to me not difficult to affirm that such a result could never have been intended by the Legislature.

With much respect to the learned Judges of the Court below, I attach no importance whatsoever to the plan of setting down those instances in all cases with a value of nil. “Nil” is not in accordance with the arithmetical deductions which are expressly prescribed by the statute. It is a defiance of the statute. It is arrived at only after the mind has conceived the notion that there must be a positive value to start with and that the Legislature must have intended that. Once that notion is arrived at, of course, where no positive value, but only a minus value, appears, the statute cannot work unless the device is adopted of putting the figure 0. But this figure 0 is a figure of despair, indicating that no positive value can be found. It might have to be set down if the statute anywhere prescribed, with regard to the valuation as a whole, or in its details, that the value should be positive. But, after anxious consideration, I do not find that the statute does anything of the sort.

It would, indeed, be rather extraordinary if it did, because it would be making unworkable the very figures and calculations which it expressly prescribes; and, secondly, it would be a writing out of the valuation for all purposes of true and effective comparison of values at one date with values at another the practical datum or standard line—the foundation from which all subsequent variations in the value of the property could be measured.

This last consideration is important, for another main object of the statute is the imposition of an increment value duty; and a construction which would upset or remove the very foundation upon which increment could be truly reckoned does not accord with reason. And, moreover, such a construction might, in those numberless cases to which I have referred, postpone the ascertainment of any increment whatsoever until decades or centuries had passed, and such an enormous rise had taken place in value as to make that value, even though loaded with a heavy feu-duty, exceed that of the buildings and improvements upon the land. Not until that time would what is called “positive value” be reached, and not until that time could any figure actually representing the truth appear upon the valuation or become the measure for future increment.

The statute does not look at the matter in that light, for not only has it prescribed that the valuation shall be of all the land in Scotland, but it has stated that this valuation shall be as at 30th April 1909. May 2, 1913.

I incline, with reference to the view which has been presented, and which is alluded to in the judgments of the Valuation Court, that the operation of deduction of the two specified figures may result in a minus value mathematically, but that such a result is repugnant to reality—I incline to say that, in my humble opinion, the repugnancy is in the other direction. I will venture to give the illustration which I presented to the bar at the discussion. Assume that in ten years' time the gross market value has increased by £1000, the buildings and feu-duty remaining as before. The buildings are still £4000. The total value has come up to the figure of £4500. And so with regard to the assessable site value, the undoubted increase of £1000—an increase which in the circumstances is unquestionably due to the appreciation of the land—is plainly accounted for by the former minus value of £500 being now transmuted into a plus value of the same figure. To say that you would be entitled, notwithstanding the undoubted increment of £1000, to reduce that increment to £500, is simply to defend what was truly a fiction, of entering the original assessable value at nil instead of what it truly was, namely, minus £500. So far from mathematics having led the calculator away from actuality, it has entirely squared with the truth and history of the increment.

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

One element derived from the statute was introduced to show that the calculations made according to the rule set up in section 25 were impossible. The reference was to section 3, subsection 5, which provides that, "for the purpose of the collection of duty on the increment value of any land under this section, the increment value shall be deemed to be reduced on the first occasion for the collection of increment value duty by an amount equal to ten per cent of the original site value of the land." The argument was that with a minus value assessable site value could never thus be credited with its 10 per cent of allowance. The argument is illegitimate, because by section 25 that very subsection (namely, subsection 5 of section 3), which is for the purpose of the collection of duty on the increment value, is excluded from the definition of site value. By section 25, subsection 4, it is provided that "any reference in this Act to site value (other than the reference to the site value of land on an occasion when increment duty is to be collected) shall be deemed to be a reference to the assessable site value of the land." The parenthetical reference is precisely to the occasion on which increment duty is to be collected, and that is the occasion set forth in section 3, subsection 5, which is specifically "for the purpose of the collection of duty." It is accordingly, I think, pretty clear that it is not legitimate to treat the reference to the allowance of 10 per cent deduction under section 3, subsection 5, as a reference to assessable site value at all. It is a reference to a site value different from the assessable site value and called for the purposes of that subsection the original site value.

The argument was developed, however, by this: that it was stated that an actual duty was to be imposed by the statute on undeveloped land. This is true, and the duty is laid down by section 16, but section 17 clears all difficulty as to positive and negative values, or plus and minus quantities, out of the way, because by its first subsection it prescribes, "Undeveloped land duty shall not be charged in respect of any land where the site value of the land does not exceed £50 per acre." That is to say, that when land duty is imposed as such, it is upon a site value which is positive, namely, upon land worth £50 per acre and over; but when the statute is treating the problem and fact of increment, it is in the position of laying down, to begin with, the mode of settling a datum line from which in future years and on future occasions the increment shall be reckoned. There is no necessity whatsoever to make that datum line positive, any more than there would be for declaring—to use the illustration familiar in the discussion—that the actual fact of a rise of temperature should be differently dealt with or declared not to have occurred because the points of rise were both below zero on a Fahrenheit thermometer. The illustrations might be multiplied. The datum line for a railway system, for harbour works, for a mine, may differ (in the last-mentioned case the datum may be taken from the pithead or from the bottom of the mine), and may differ greatly, but the rise upwards is quite real and quite calculable in any of the cases mentioned, and any exclusion because of the location of the datum line and certain contours being below it would not be natural, but highly artificial. Or, in the region of history: Some Roman historians date events ab urbe condita, others ab anno Domini. But although the latter were to be set up as the correct datum, it would be strange to deny the flight of time from the founding of Rome till the year of our Lord.

For these reasons I do not entertain doubt that Mr Binnie's valuation and its entry of a minus value of £545 were properly arrived at and were correct. I do not find the statute anywhere to prescribe, with regard to the making of this valuation, that the datum from which increment is reckoned is to be positive. If it were—the materials for the calculation being what they are—the result would be to render void to all intents and purposes large portions of the Domesday Book, or rather to describe the entries as nil, which is not a statement but a misstatement of the truth. The Act of Parliament, if accepted according to the rules which it itself sets down, may, so far as we have seen, and so far as applicable to the question argued before this House, be very easily worked, its rules being so clear, and the completeness of the valuation be unchecked.

I humbly agree to the course proposed.

LORD MOULTON.—The only point raised in this case relates to the proper mode of performing the duty imposed upon the Commissioners under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, by section 26 of the Act, namely, the compilation of "the valuation to be made of all land in the United Kingdom showing separately the total value and the site value respectively of the land." It is clear from the provisions of the Act that by "site value" as here used "assessable site value" is to be understood. The point in issue is as to what is the site value, i.e., the assessable site value, of the land to which the case relates. There is no controversy as to the facts. The value of the land and buildings, the value of the bare site, and the amount of the charges thereon are all agreed. The sole issue is as to what is the "site value" of the land to be deduced from those facts.

Neither "total value" nor "site value" is a term of art. They are appellations coined for the purpose of the Act, and they bear the meanings which are statutorily given to them by section 25 of the Act and no other. It follows, May 2, 1913. therefore, that although the dispute between the parties is in form a dispute as to the duties of the Commissioners under section 26, it depends entirely upon the interpretation to be given to the definitions to be found in section 25, and our decision must therefore turn on our interpretation of that section.

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.

Lord Moulton.

Section 25 is the first of a fasciculus of clauses headed "Valuation for purposes of duties on land values." It substantially consists of four definitions, namely, definitions of (1) gross value of land, (2) full site value of land, (3) total value of land, and (4) assessable site value of land.

There is no difficulty in apprehending the meaning of "gross value of land" as there defined. It is described as meaning—

"The amount which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition, free from incumbrances and from any burden, charge, or restriction (other than rates or taxes), might be expected to realise."

It corresponds, therefore, to the full value of the land unincumbered. It is needless to say that the buildings on the land and all that goes with the land are here included in the term "land."

The "full site value of land" is equally easy to comprehend. It is the full market value of the cleared site. But the language of the statute, though leading to this result, does so in a very peculiar way. It defines the full site value of land as the amount which remains after deducting from the gross value of land the difference, if any, between that value and what I may shortly term the value of the unincumbered cleared site. The result of such a deduction is to give the value of the unincumbered cleared site. I do not think that it is obvious for what reason the draftsman chose to express the definition in so peculiar a fashion. It may be that he wished to familiarise the mind with a figure representing the difference between the gross value of the land and the full site value, i.e., a figure representing the amount which that which has been put upon the land, such as buildings, &c., has added to the full site value.

The "total value of land" also offers no difficulties. It is the value of the land subject to the actual fixed charges upon it and to public rights of way, easements, &c. It may broadly be defined as the full value of the incumbered land, and represents most closely the then value of the actual property which the owner of the land possesses in it. Here again the draftsman has adopted a circuitous mode of effecting his purpose. He defines the "total value of land" as the gross value after deducting the amount by which the gross value would be diminished if the land was sold subject to its charges, easements, &c. This, of course, leads mathematically to the same result as if it were defined as the full market value of the land taken as subject to the charges, easements, &c.

It is with regard to the "assessable site value of land," the fourth and last of the terms defined in the section, that the present difficulty arises. It is defined as meaning the total value of the land after making certain deductions which are set out in the section. For present purposes it will suffice to consider the first and principal deduction alone. This deduction is to be—"The same amount as is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value."

May 2, 1913.

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.

Lord Moulton.

The "total value of land" is the "gross value" after deducting the capital value of the actual charges upon it, and of the restrictions and easements, &c., which affect it. This may be shortly expressed by saying that it is the "gross value" less the burden of the incumbrances. The amount that "is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value" is of course the gross value less the full site value. Deducting the latter of these quantities from the former (an operation which by the definition gives us the "assessable site value") we arrive by a mathematical necessity at the same result as if we deducted the burden of the incumbrances from the full site value. It follows, therefore, that the "assessable site value of the land" is obtained by deducting the burden of the incumbrances from the value of the site. It is obvious to anyone acquainted with the customs which prevail in different parts of the country, as to creating burdens on land on which buildings already exist or are about to be erected, that it will often happen that the burden of the incumbrances will exceed the value of the site. Nothing is more common than to create charges upon land upon which there are buildings of a permanent character, or upon which the erection of such buildings is secured by covenant. In such cases the charges so created may well be greater than the site value of the land, and the result of the deduction prescribed in the section will be to obtain a minus quantity. This is so in the present case, and the Commissioners in making out the valuation have felt themselves bound to register as the assessable site value of the land in question the minus value thus arrived at. The respondents contend that it is impossible to conceive of a value that is less than nothing, and that, therefore, the Commissioners ought to have inserted "nil" as the assessable site value of the land in question.

So far as a priori considerations are concerned I cannot follow the contentions of the respondents on this point. The "assessable site value" is something which is defined by the section and does not pretend to correspond to anything known outside the statute. In order to see whether there is any absurdity in this being a negative quantity it is justifiable, and even necessary, to look to the way in which the "assessable site value" so arrived at is to be used for the purpose of assessment of taxes. When this is done it will be found that the principal assessment based upon it is that of the increment value duty, and that the amount of this duty does not depend upon the actual amount of the assessable site value, but upon its variations. For such a purpose there is no incongruity in the assessable site value being a negative quantity, because a negative quantity is capable of positive variations just as much as is a positive quantity. The thermometer may rise a certain number of degrees in the Arctic regions, though the temperature from which it starts is a minus one. A change from 60 degrees below zero to 20 degrees below zero is a positive rise of 40 degrees. Therefore the purpose for which the assessable site value is to be used, and for which it is necessary that a record of that value should be preserved, does not in any way indicate that it should be a positive rather than a negative quantity.

But when we look more closely into this purpose it will be seen that it is most essential that the actual result of the deduction should be recorded, whether that be positive or negative. For it is evident that the meaning and aim of the "increment value duty" is to tax any increase in the value of the site which is not due to expenditure of money on the land itself, but May 2, 1913. to surrounding circumstances, such as, for example, the development of neighbouring lands for town purposes. This will be deducible from the assessable site value provided that the actual result of the deduction directed by the statute be recorded, but it will not be deducible therefrom if negative values are not to be recorded. Take, for instance, the figures of the present case. The total value of the land is £3775. The difference between the gross value of the land and the full site value of the land is £4320. This latter figure must be deducted from the former in order to obtain the assessable site value of the land, and the result is minus £545. Now assume that from extraneous causes the full site value is increased by an amount, say £500, the burdens, &c., remaining the same. The assessable site value will then be minus £45, and the increment value duty will be proportionate to this rise in the assessable site value, i.e., to £500. But if the contention of the respondents be correct, the assessable site value in both cases would be nil. There would therefore be no change in the assessable site value of the land, and no increment duty would be chargeable, although there has been a rise of £500 in the value of the site.

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.
Lord Moulton.

The absurd inequalities which such an interpretation of the section would introduce is best shown by the illustration which was given by one of your Lordships in the course of the argument. Suppose that there are two precisely similar houses on adjoining plots of equal value in all respects—say two adjoining houses in a row of uniform houses—and suppose that the full site value in each case is £500. The owner of the one creates a charge upon it of the capital value of £1000. The owner of the other leaves it uncharged. Suppose that the development of the neighbourhood increases the site value in each case by a sum of £300. Each of the owners has had his wealth increased thereby to the same amount, i.e., £300. Yet according to the contention of the respondents the one would have to pay a proportion of this increment to the State and the other would pay nothing.

I am of opinion, therefore, that both the language of section 25 of the Act and the purpose of the valuation as shown by section 2 of the Act require that the true result of the deduction should be inserted in the valuation, whether that result be a plus or a minus quantity.

Against this conclusion two arguments have been put forward by counsel for the respondents based upon other parts of the Act. In the first place, it is pointed out that assessable site value is used for the calculation of undeveloped land duty as well as increment value duty, and that in the case of undeveloped land duty the duty depends on the actual assessable site value and not on its variations. This would no doubt be an argument of weight were it not that there is a special provision in section 17 that undeveloped land duty shall not be charged in respect of any land where the site value of the land does not exceed £50 per acre. Its incidence, therefore, is confined to cases in which the assessable site value is not only a positive quantity, but is actually greater than £50 per acre. No difficulty, therefore, arises in this case, nor does it throw any light upon the matter in issue.

The second argument appears at first sight to be a more formidable one. In subsection 5 of section 3 it is provided that for the purposes of the collection of duty on the increment value of any land the increment value shall be deemed to be reduced on the first occasion for the collection of increment value duty by an amount equal to 10 per cent of the original site value of the land, and on any subsequent occasion by an amount equal to 10 per cent of the site value on the last preceding occasion for the collection of increment value duty. Now it is pointed out that the Act provides that any reference in it to "site value" is to be deemed to be a reference to "assessable site value," and it is urged therefore that this provision is irreconcilable with the idea that "assessable site value" can be a negative quantity, because to reduce a sum by 10 per cent of a negative quantity would be to increase and not to diminish it.

The true answer to this argument is, in my opinion, to be found in the very provision as to the meaning of a reference to "site value" in the Act which is relied on for the purposes of this argument. It is contained in section 25, subsection 4, and reads as follows :—

"Any reference in this Act to site value (other than the reference to the site value of land on an occasion on which increment duty is to be collected) shall be deemed to be a reference to the assessable site value of the land as ascertained in accordance with this section."

In my opinion the words in brackets refer to section 3, subsection 5, and were inserted with the special object of obviating the difficulty which it is suggested is caused by its language. It follows from those words that in section 3, subsection 5, the phrase "site value" must not be understood as meaning "assessable site value," but as meaning actual or, as it is called in the Act, "full site value." This is always a positive quantity, and the difficulty therefore vanishes.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the Commissioners were right in inserting a minus quantity in the valuation as the assessable site value of the land, and that this appeal should therefore be allowed.

Counsel for the respondents asked that in the particular circumstances of this case, which was a test case raising an entirely novel point, costs should not be given against the respondents.

Counsel for the appellants stated that he left the matter in their Lordships' hands.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Under the very peculiar circumstances of this case their Lordships propose to make no order as to costs—that is to say, the parties will bear their costs here and in the Court of Session and before the referee. That is only done because the question is an entirely novel one, and because in order to give it the fullest consideration the hearing has been somewhat extended.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed, and decision of the referee in its first alternative restored. No costs in this House or in the Court below or before the referee.

Dick v.
Alston.

Agent and Client—Law-agent transacting with client—Transactions between law-agent and wife of client.

A law-agent acted for a client (who was a partner in a commercial firm) and also, as an individual, made advances to his client's firm. He was, besides, the agent for a branch bank where the firm's bank account was kept, and in that capacity made advances to the firm on overdraft. He also acted from time to time as law-agent for his client's wife with regard to certain investments and other matters. The client's wife, having become entitled to a legacy of £12,000, assisted her husband's business (1) by making direct advances to the firm, (2) by becoming surety for overdrafts from the bank, and (3) by transferring to the law-agent securities for advances made by him to the firm. During these transactions the wife had no separate legal advice.

The husband's firm having become insolvent, and the wife having thereby lost the whole of her fortune, she brought an action against the law-agent for recovery of damages for loss sustained by her through his alleged negligence and breach of duty as her law-agent, and for repayment of gain alleged to have been improperly made by him out of his transactions with her.

Circumstances in which the House of Lords (affirming judgment of First Division) assailed the defender, having regard in particular to the fact that he had not advised in favour of the transactions and that the pursuer had really acted on her own responsibility.

Bank of Montreal v. Stuart, [1911] A. C. 120, distinguished.

(Is the Court of Session, 18th June 1911—1911 S. C. 1248.)

The pursuer appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 16th, 17th, and 18th June 1913.

At the conclusion of the appellant's argument,—

Ld. Chancellor
(Haldane).
Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.
Lord de
Villiers.
Lord Moulton.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This case has been argued with great thoroughness by the learned counsel who led for the appellant, and he has said everything that could be said on behalf of his client; but we do not think it necessary to call upon counsel for the respondent.

The appeal arises in proceedings which were brought by the appellant as pursuer against a Mr Alston, and the nature of the action was shortly this: Mrs Dick, the appellant, claimed against Mr Alston, the defender, that Mr Alston, acting as her law-agent, had improperly advised her with regard to certain transactions whereby she had suffered damage by his breach of duty; and that, further, or alternatively, he, while occupying the position of law-agent, had made a profit which he was not entitled to retain.

Before adverting to the history of the case I wish to speak of the principles which govern these matters, and which have to be applied to transactions of this kind, for I should be sorry if anything that fell from me, or from any of your Lordships, should seem to throw the least doubt upon principles which are well settled. To begin with, a claim which may be made by a client against her solicitor in a case of this kind may fall under three heads. It may be a claim for negligence—that is to say, for damage arising from a breach of duty to give proper advice or to exercise proper

June 18, 1913. skill. If, in such a case, the solicitor has acted at the same time for two clients, the law readily presumes, if those clients had inconsistent interests, that he has been swayed in his advice unduly, and has not given to the client who is charging him with negligence assistance up to the standard which the client is entitled to have. I say the law presumes that readily, and it presumes it certainly not less readily when the solicitor is also acting in his own interest at the same time. Generally speaking, the proper course for the solicitor is to recommend, and, if necessary, to insist, that a separate law adviser should be called in. But while that is the broad principle, it is a principle which only applies when you have got the facts to which it is naturally applicable. It assumes that the solicitor is acting as the legal adviser of his client, and that the client is entitled to look to him as so acting. It is not a technical principle to be applied rigidly without any regard to the circumstances; it is a principle to be applied whenever the circumstances really admit its application.

Dick v.
Alston.

Lord
Chancellor.

Then I come to the second of the alternative heads under which a claim of this kind may be made, the head, namely, of a benefit taken by the solicitor from the client, which the law does not allow him to retain unless he shows that the client had shaken herself free from the relationship before conferring it upon him, either by obtaining independent advice or otherwise. That is a principle which the law applies with the greatest strictness. A solicitor is not allowed to take a gift from his client arising out of a transaction upon which he has been her confidential adviser unless under the conditions which I have just stated. The case of Rhodes v. Bate,¹ which was cited in the argument for the appellant, is an illustration of that class of case. *Rhodes v. Bate*¹ was in no sense an action of negligence. As I pointed out, an action of negligence would not have lain in the Court of Chancery at that time. *Rhodes v. Bate*¹ was simply a case in which the defendant was charged by the bill on the footing that a benefit had been obtained by him while in a confidential relationship, and for that benefit he was made to account, upon principles about which there can be, I think, no dispute.

Then the third head is well illustrated by the other case which was much relied upon in the argument, the case of the Bank of Montreal v. Stuart.² If a solicitor, acting as such, negotiates with his client, and the negotiation results in a bargain for himself, then the client may have a very easy task if he seeks to set aside the transaction, because the burden lies upon the solicitor to justify what he has done. But there again not only must the relationship extend to the transaction, but more than that, the condition of obtaining redress under that third head of rescission or reduction is the possibility of making restitutio in integrum. In the present case no question arises under that head; there is no question of reduction, because, for obvious reasons, the pursuer was not in a position to make restitutio in integrum. We have therefore to consider this case as falling under one or other of the first two heads, namely, that of negligence or that of benefit unduly taken.

married in 1885, and after they had been married some twelve years Mrs June 18, 1913.
 Dick succeeded to a fortune of from £10,000 to £12,000. Mr Dick was ^{Dick v.} an ironmaster in Coatbridge, where he and his father, and, I think, after-Alston.
 wards another brother, but I am not sure, had a business, which was not large as those businesses go, but was a small business. It was, however, ^{Lord} one which seemed to have been doing fairly well. In 1897 there was talk of his father retiring from the firm, and Mr Dick was very anxious to get the concern into his own hands, possibly with his brother, but at any rate to be the leading partner in the firm, and it occurred to him and Mrs Dick that her money might well be used for the purpose of putting fresh capital into the business and so giving her husband the preponderating interest. ^{Chancellor.}

Now I am satisfied that that was the root and origin of the transactions to which I am going to refer. There is a pregnant sentence in the judgment of the Lord President to the effect that the loss which has been occasioned in this case has not arisen from any bad bargain advised by the defender, but from the circumstance that the money was lost in the business of the appellant's husband. Right through this case Mrs Dick and her husband appear to have been acting with a common purpose firmly held by both of them. The case made in the condescendence and the case raised at the trial before the Lord Ordinary was to the effect that Mr Alston had given advice about, and induced, these very transactions in their earliest stages, but that case went to pieces on cross-examination when Mrs Dick was in the box. The result was that her testimony was rejected and that of Mr Alston accepted by the Lord Ordinary, who tried the case, and in the result we stand with the facts clearly proved. Mr Alston throughout figured in the case as a legal adviser, no doubt, who was called in to carry through conveyancing transactions and to give advice on such technical questions as arose, and to prepare deeds and instructions, but he was not the moving spirit or the adviser of Mrs Dick in the real transactions which are impeached in these proceedings.

Now what was the position of Mr Alston? Mr Alston was not only a law-agent, he was the agent of the Commercial Bank at Coatbridge, the bank with which Mr and Mrs Dick banked, and with which the firm banked. Everybody who is at all familiar with the customs which obtain in Scottish country towns knows that it is quite a common thing for a bank to have an agent who is also a local solicitor, and the customers of the bank very often transact legal business with the agent, and the agent's clients very often come and bank with the bank. Sometimes the writing chambers, as they are generally called, and the bank, are in one building, at any rate the offices are in close proximity, so that it is difficult at times to say whether you are dealing with the bank-agent or whether you are dealing with the lawyer. In this case at the beginning Mrs Dick's transactions with Mr Alston seem to have been with him as a bank-agent rather than as a solicitor, because she came to him at the suggestion of her husband to see what she had best do with this money to which she had succeeded, and Mr Alston advised her to realise it, and a number of deposit-receipts are given for it, and £10,500 is banked with the Commercial Bank at Coatbridge for which he was the agent, and with which she opened an account at his suggestion, in order that it might be seen how the money should be invested.

June 18, 1913.

Dick v.
Alston.

Lord
Chancellor.

The money having got in that way into the bank the next step is to see what was done with it. What was done with it is perfectly plain. There was a series of advances made to the business, to the firm of John Dick & Company, there was a series of promissory-notes which were given to her by the firm, with the result that at a certain stage by 1898 Mrs Dick had advanced as much as £5500 out of her fortune. One large sum was advanced at once in November 1897, soon after she succeeded to her property, and other sums were advanced in amounts varying from £500 and upwards, bringing the whole up to the sum of £5500, which I have mentioned. Then there were other sums of money that were invested in various securities; there was an investment in the stock of the Coatbridge Corporation; another in preference shares in Stewart & Lloyds; and there was a loan to a Mr Ross, a pawnbroker, as to which I will make no further reference than to say that nobody says that any loss occurred in connection with that investment as an investment, and in the case of one of the investments at least, that of Mr Ross, Mr Alston had nothing to do with suggesting the security.

Now, what is the next step? These advances to the firm having been made by Mrs Dick of her own motion, the only inducing agent being her own husband, there are then a series of transactions with reference to the firm which are really the transactions impeached in this case. The sequence of events may be divided into seven chapters, which I need do little more than mention, because I do not propose to go into the facts in detail. The first chapter in the story begins in 1897, when the position was that the firm owed Mr Alston £3250, and Mrs Dick came forward and paid off £3000, taking as her security a transfer of the security which Mr Alston had in the form of a bond and disposition over the works. There is no dispute that that was a good security at that time.

The next transaction was in April 1900. That is a transaction which has been much impeached. Mr Alston had been paid off the £3000, but there was still due to him, as I mentioned, another £250, and it was that balance which became the subject of part of the transaction in 1900. In 1900 the Coatbridge stock was dealt with in this way. The firm came to Mr Alston and said,—“We shall be glad if you will lend us £750,” and he said,—“I will do so on getting security, but the security will have to include the £250 which I have already advanced, and for which I have parted with the security which I once had.” Mr Alston may very well have thought that the further borrowing meant that his £250 was not in such a safe position as it had previously been; anyhow, the result was that Mr Alston bargained for this, and nothing less, that he should have security for the £750, plus the £250 which was already owing to him.

Now Mr Alston was not the inducing person bringing it into the mind of Mrs Dick to enter into these transactions; all he did was that he insisted to the firm on getting this security, and as security he, through the appellant and her husband, got possession of Mrs Dick's Coatbridge stock of the value of £1000. The transaction not only assumed that form but that was its substance. The £250 could, in my opinion, have been recovered only on the footing of rescission, and as there is no question of making restitution in this case, rescission is impossible, and it cannot be treated, as it was sought to be treated in the dissenting judgment of Lord Johnston, June 18, 1918. as a mere benefit accruing to Mr Alston while in the position of law-agent, ^{Dick v. Alston.} because it was part of a comprehensive contract which related, not only to the £250, but to the £750, and was not an unfair one. It must be remembered, too, that Mr Alston stood in the relation to the appellant and her husband of a banker, quite as much as of a solicitor. Then the next transaction I come to is one that begins in December 1900. At that time security was required for the bank overdraft and insisted upon by Mr Alston in the name of the bank, and further securities of Mrs Dick, her Stewart & Lloyds shares and her promissory-note from Mr Ross, appear from the evidence to have been given as the security. ^{Lord Chancellor.}

I think that is a transaction with regard to which it is very difficult to take exception now because no loss of any sort or kind has accrued in respect of it. The overdraft for which the security was given has long since been paid off and the securities dealt with in another fashion. I take it that it has been relied upon mainly as showing the footing upon which the parties dealt. It is sufficient for me to make this observation upon it: that as regards this money it stands upon the same footing as the other transactions, and I do not find that the transaction was in any way induced by Mr Alston; and the real gravamen of the complaint in regard to it is not anything done by Mr Alston as law-agent, but that the transaction was entered into at all. But this was due to Mr Dick himself and his wife, and not to this lady's legal adviser.

Then I come to June 1902. At that time there was an overdraft of £2315, and money was required further to meet a loss. The firm was not in difficulties but it required this money, and what happened was that on the 16th June 1902 a conveyance of the works, which your Lordships will remember had been acquired by Mrs Dick as security, was made to Mr Alston, the agent of the bank, as security for the overdraft, and two back-letters were given, the latter of which made it clear that the security covered not only these advances but any further advances of the bank. I think it is quite plain that the character of that transaction was quite understood by Mrs Dick. She knew what she was doing. It is said that it was the duty of Mr Alston to have advised her against it. It is quite true in this case that Mr Alston did in certain particulars act as the legal adviser of Mrs Dick, but there are other transactions in which, as I said, he did not act as her legal adviser at all, and these are the most important transactions in this case. It is true that in drawing deeds and so on he was the solicitor employed, and what is said is that because he was the person who drew the deeds, therefore he ought to have advised her not to go into this transaction at all.

Now that is perfectly sound as a general principle, and the only question is whether it is displaced by the circumstances. In my opinion Mr Alston has discharged the burden of proof of showing that Mrs Dick was well aware of what she was doing and judged for herself. It must be remembered that she was interested in the firm almost to the same extent as her husband. She had got a great deal of money in it, and her prospects in life depended upon his hopes of success being realised, and I am satisfied after considering the evidence that Mrs Dick fully understood what she

June 18, 1918. was about in these matters. That being so, I think the law-agent was justified in taking the view that he was asked, not for his opinion of the transaction, but simply what was the proper form in which to carry it out ; and of this, as of other things, which he and his firm did for Mrs Dick, I would observe that no criticism can be made upon what they did as conveyancers. In all the cases the transactions were carried out so far as I can see in a form which was appropriate to the circumstances ; the only point is one of substance—whether there should have been any transaction at all. That Mr Alston seems to have considered to have been outside his province altogether, and I think he was right in that conclusion for he made his view clear.

Dick v.
Alston.
Lord
Chancellor.

Then in 1903 the Dick business was converted into a joint stock company, and as the result Mrs Dick was induced, not by Mr Alston, who seems to have had nothing whatever to do with that matter, but by her husband with whom she was co-operating, to accept shares for his debt. That may or may not have been a wise proceeding looking at the circumstances. It may have been the only way of carrying through the business. Certainly at this stage I can conceive nothing more likely to have been distasteful to the parties concerned than calling in an outside solicitor who could have had no option but to tell Mrs Dick, You had better on general grounds get back all the money you can and leave your husband's affairs to go to ruin. Mrs Dick might well have replied : I prefer to take my chances with it, and I am hopeful and sanguine that this business will turn out a success and that I shall be better off thereby. I think that was her mind, and that it is almost certain that if such advice had been given it would have been rejected. Anyhow Mr Alston does not seem to have been concerned in this matter. There even is evidence that he did try to dissuade Mrs Dick from entering into the transaction. Then finally there was a further loan of £1500 which was made on the security of Mrs Dick's property in 1905. It is sufficient to say about that that Mr Alston appears to have had nothing substantial to do with inducing it, and to have advised against it.

Under these circumstances the question is what are the legal rights of the parties. As I have intimated to your Lordships, I desire to say emphatically that the rules which have been laid down for regulating the relations of people in these relations are sound rules, and that nothing that I desire to decide in this case in the slightest degree derogates from them, but they are rules which you must apply having regard to the circumstances, and when the circumstances are such as to show that the burden of proof has been discharged by the person charged with breach of duty, by showing that the client was not really acting on advice given by him, but was transacting with him as a banker and was acting practically independently of him, that she knew her own mind and was doing what she considered to be best for herself and did not consult him as solicitor, then I think it would be pedantry to say that because there is an abstract rule the case must fall within it. It is not that there is an exception to the rule, but that the circumstances do not admit of the application of this rule.

I have come to the conclusion with the Lord President that that is the true view of this case. It is a totally different one from that of the Bank of Montreal v. Stuart,¹ where Mr Bruce, the solicitor, took an active part June 18, 1913. in negotiating on behalf of the lady, and, apparently without instructions from her, for the surrender of her securities. Mr Bruce not only was acting on behalf of the bank but had an interest of his own, and he and the lady's husband took part in the transactions which led to the lady conveying away her property, the lady being an invalid with no power of forming a judgment of her own. In this case Mrs Dick appears to have taken an active part in the business transactions of her husband's firm, and she appears to have been a capable person exercising her own judgment, and consultation with Mr Alston was consultation with him as a banker mainly, and only to a very limited and technical extent consultation as solicitor. He acted, as far as I can see, honourably and straightforwardly, and did his duty under difficult circumstances.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that the judgments of the majority of the First Division were right, and that they took the proper course in arriving at the same conclusion as had the Lord Ordinary, and I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—In regard to the principles of the case I acquiesce in what has just been laid down from the woolsack. I took part in the decision in the case of the Bank of Montreal,¹ and I have read with interest and satisfaction as well as with assent the review of that case and the analysis of its principles by Lord Mackenzie in the Court below.

It is a trite observation that it is often extremely difficult to extract abstract principles from cases widely divergent in fact. As to the case of the Bank of Montreal,¹ so clear and vivid is the distinction between that case and the present that I think it necessary to cite only one passage from the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in regard to the conduct of the solicitor that was therein challenged. His Lordship said,² "Without communicating with Mrs Stuart Mr Bruce (whose actings were challenged) of his own motion extended the guarantee to past advances from the Chatham branch." Then follows this sentence: "More than that, he took upon himself to act on behalf of Mrs Stuart in procuring the transfer of shares to her by way of consideration for undertaking a risk which neither he nor any of his solvent associates were willing to accept." And in another passage²: "Mr Stuart had no money to risk. The game Mr Stuart was playing was desperate. It was the throw of a gambler with money not his own. No man in his senses with any regard to the interest of Mrs Stuart or the interest of Mr Stuart could have advised Mrs Stuart to act as her husband told her to do."

It is only necessary to refer to that passage to show how vitally different from those of the present were the circumstances in which the judgment of the Privy Council was delivered in that case.

That brings me to remark upon the state of matters involved in the performance by one man, as your Lordship has observed, of a variety of functions. It is not infrequent in Scotland to have a threefold function performed, as here. There is a gentleman who, being a solicitor, is the legal adviser of the husband; that being so, then, in the second place, I hope nothing pro-

June 18, 1913. nounced in this case will mitigate the view of Lord Davey that that gentleman is naturally regarded as being also the legal adviser of the wife. Prima facie that must be so. But in the third place it not infrequently happens in Scotland that the same gentleman is also in the position of a personal creditor of one or both of the spouses, either as representing himself or as representing a bank of which he is agent, and either or both of them are the customers. I do not hesitate to affirm that if that position obtains, if the transaction is on its merits an improvident one or such as would not have been entered into with independent advice, and if matters are still entire, such a transaction cannot stand. An action of rescission or, as in Scotland it would be known, reduction, would succeed.

Dick v.
Alston.

Dunfermline.

But in the present case matters are not entire, and the general situation otherwise is this. In the first place, between September 1897 and December 1898 Mrs Dick, the wife of a gentleman engaged in business in the west of Scotland, lent to him, upon promissory notes and for the purposes of that business, sums amounting to £5500. It is an admission at the bar throughout the case that the defender, Mr Alston, was not concerned in any way whatever with that investment.

Next, there are three transactions which are challenged, one of May 1900, the second of December 1900, and the third of June 1902. Now the case that was made in the Court below was that these transactions were entered into by reason of advice tendered by Mr Alston to the pursuer and by reason of that advice being bad. That case has completely failed. It produced a judgment of the Lord Ordinary which conclusively settled that it was without foundation, and it is now admitted at your Lordships' bar, as it was in the Inner House, that that case cannot be supported.

But although there might be other reasons for reducing or granting damages in respect of the three transactions to which I have last referred, I call attention to the fact that in February 1903 (and this is one of the objects of my addressing your Lordships' House) there occurred a transaction the strength of which has not even now, in my humble judgment, been sufficiently adverted to. This lady in that month took shares in the limited company into which her husband's business had then been formed. She could not have done so except upon the footing of allotments of shares in that concern having been made to her in respect of money or money's worth. By that transaction her debts were converted into shares and she thus was debarred entirely in my view from challenging those debts as having been debts in respect of which she had actions against other people, for she took the former debts as if they were converted into cash and as if with that cash she had become a shareholder of the concern. Accordingly, in my view, this transaction in February 1903 wipes out of view as a ground of any relevant action in law the antecedent transactions of 1900 and 1902.

I had at one period of the discussion some difficulty on this subject, but I have come clearly to be of opinion that Mr Alston, the defender, in no way advised this lady with regard to the merits of taking these shares. On the contrary, I hold it to be proved that all the advice coming from Mr Alston and his son to this lady was in an opposite direction; it was in the direction of warning her off an enterprise of this kind which had great financial peril attached to it. But my greatest doubt in the case, if I ever had great doubt, was with reference to a transaction of February 1905. June 18, 1913. Now in regard to that the position of Mrs Dick by this time was that she ^{Dick v. Alston.} was not lending money to her husband, that she was not conferring any benefit on her husband except indirectly, but that she was lending money ^{Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.} to and conferring benefit upon a limited concern in whose prospects she was deeply interested and in which she was herself a large shareholder. Under those circumstances she consulted Mr Alston. It is said that on the principle of the case of the *Bank of Montreal*¹ Mr Alston should have advised her to take independent advice. I am not concerned to dispute that proposition, but in the present case I hold that the respondent did so. He—the matter not being a legal one, not being a question, for instance, as to the validity or correctness of deeds to be granted, but being merely one with regard to expediency and finance—referred this lady deliberately to the auditor of the concern. She and the auditor met and discussed the situation, and it is clear from a perusal of the auditor's evidence that this lady was rightly advised of the perils of the position, but that she was as determined as before to risk her fortune still further in the limited company. That may have arisen partly from natural affection, partly from a sanguine disposition, and partly from a desire to speculate to this extent that she might save what she had already invested. But whatever it did arise from, it arose from nothing in respect of which the defender advised her, or is responsible for advising her. It arose from her own view, under the influence possibly of her husband and with the guidance of the auditor of the company—a view taken with regard to the future of that concern in which she herself had staked a considerable fortune.

That is an end of the case. I do not hold that any of the principles of the previous decisions cover the present situation. In a question of this kind on which I observe that the learned Judge, Lord Johnston, who dissented, agrees that there is nothing morally reprehensible to be suggested against the defender, I should myself be very slow to differ from concurring judgments of the Court below.

LORD DE VILLIERS.—I entirely concur with the observations which fell from the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, and I have nothing to add to them.

LORD MOULTON.—I concur.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58) sec. 13—"Dependants"—Persons not in receipt of support but with legal right and prospect of enforcing—Children deserted by their father and maintained chiefly by their brothers—Competence of appeal on question of dependency.

A person may be dependent upon a workman at the time of his death within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and so entitled to compensation, although he was in fact receiving no support from the workman, provided that he had a legal right to support, and that there was also a reasonable prospect of his being able to enforce, and of his enforcing, the right at some future period.

A workman deserted his wife and his four children in March 1907. Up to 1909, besides a few shillings given directly to the children, occasional small payments, amounting in all to £2, were made to the wife by her husband for the children's support. In September 1909 she obtained a decree against him for aliment of the two younger children who were in pupillarity, and recovered 17s. from his employers by arrestment used on the decree. The workman then disappeared, and was not traced until his death by accident in the course of his employment in April 1911. From the date of his desertion his wife and family were supported partly from small sums earned by the wife but mainly from the earnings of the two elder sons. After the workman's death the wages then due to him were paid to his wife.

Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that there was evidence to justify the finding of an arbitrator that the two children who were in pupillarity were wholly dependent on their father's earnings at the time of his death, and accordingly were entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

New Monckton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling, [1911] A. C. 648, distinguished.

Observed that the question of dependency is one of fact upon which the decision of the arbitrator is final, unless there is no evidence to support it, or unless he has misdirected himself upon a question of law.

(Haldane).

Villiers.
Lord Moulton.

The pursuer appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 17th June 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The question of dependency was a question of fact. Upon that question of fact the arbitrator had decided that the two pupil children were wholly dependent upon their father; and there being evidence to support that decision, and the arbitrator having arrived at his decision under no erroneous view of the law, the Court of Session were not entitled to interfere with it on appeal. In deciding this question of fact the legal obligation of the father to support his children was one of the most important elements which had to be taken into account, and the Lord Justice-Clerk was wrong in thinking that there could be no dependency unless the dependant was actually receiving support at the period of death. The necessary elements were a legal right to receive support and a reasonable prospect of the right being enforced in the future. Here there was always a reasonable prospect of the obligation being enforced, because the mother had obtained a decree against the father which she could execute as soon as she found him. With regard to the contributions of the elder brothers, they were made ex gratia, in the expectation that they would ultimately be recovered from the father, the brothers being under no obligation to maintain the younger children. The appellant relied on the statement of the law given by Fletcher Moulton, L.J., in *Lee v. Owner of Ship "Bessie."*¹ *New Monkton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling*² was distinguishable, because in that case there was no evidence to support the finding of the arbitrator, the facts there showing clearly that the wife had to all intents abandoned her rights long before the workman's death.

Young v.
Niddrie and Benhar Coal
Co., Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—To make a person a dependant within the meaning of the Act he must be (1) a member of the workman's family, (2) dependent on the earnings of the workman, (3) so dependent at the time of the workman's death. While the last condition must not be construed too literally, it was essential that the person should have suffered some actual loss at the date of the workman's death, i.e., either the cessation of support which was actually being given, or the loss of the reasonably certain prospect of support in the near future. The loss of a theoretical right or problematical prospect was not enough. In the present case there was nothing more than that: the decree held by the wife was merely the judicial expression of the father's liability, and no reliance was apparently placed on it by her or by the children. Had the mother been questioned, she would certainly have replied that she was living on her sons and, had they been accidentally killed, she would have had a good claim against their employers under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The case was governed by New Monkton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling,³ in which Lord Atkinson said that it was by the discharge of the obligation to maintain, not by its mere existence in law, that a husband maintained his wife. If compensation were awarded in the present case it would be an entirely new departure.

At delivering judgment on 1st July 1913,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In the judgment which I am about to read Lord de Villiers, who is unable to be present, asks me to express his concurrence.

In substance the facts as found by the Sheriff-substitute are that the two pupil children have been since 1907, when their father left the home, maintained by the mother out of the earnings of the two elder children, together with some small sums which the father gave to the younger children when he met them on the road. The mother's own earnings were so small that they were insufficient for her own maintenance. The contributions from the earnings of the two elder children were not gifts made ex pietate, but were sums advanced to meet the necessities of the situation, which they or their mother might have recovered from the father. In 1909 the father had failed to pay the aliment he had promised, and the mother raised an action in the Sheriff Court and obtained a decree against him for £15, 12s. per annum for each of the two pupil children. The decree was enforced in September 1909, by arrestment of a small sum due to the father from his then employers. After that he disappeared in order to avoid further diligence, and notwithstanding that the mother and her two elder sons made inquiries as to his whereabouts, they did not find out his address until they received the intimation of the accident which caused his death on 22nd April 1911. He had evaded them for a year and seven months, and meantime they had maintained the pupil children in the fashion I have indicated.

Under these circumstances, were the two younger children wholly dependent on the father's earnings within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? Acting on the view that they were in reality wholly so dependent, the Sheriff-substitute assessed the compensation payable by the employers on account of the accident which caused the father's death at £216, 9s.

The First Schedule to the Act prescribes that the compensation shall, when death results from the injury, and the workman leaves any dependants wholly dependent on his earnings, be a sum equal to his earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury or the sum of £150, whichever of these sums is the larger, but not exceeding in any case £300. The arbitrator has not, therefore, to calculate the amount of actual loss, but simply to ascertain whether there were left persons wholly dependent, and then to make the calculation which the statute directs. The only question is, therefore, whether the two younger children were wholly dependent. It is only if this question is answered in the negative that any question as to partial dependence can arise.

I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute could properly hold that these children were wholly dependent. They had the right to look to their father for maintenance, and it is plain that those in whose care they were did so look, and endeavoured as best they could to make the right effective. The children had no other means of support which could render their position one of partial dependence. It was only by assistance from their brothers, assistance which might have ceased at any moment, that they were saved from actual want. The father was under an obligation to maintain them which had already been enforced, and which might have been enforced again at any moment had he lived. Under these circumstances I think that the younger children could be held to be wholly dependent within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. The case is quite different from that of New Monkton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling,¹ recently decided by this House. There there had been what was tantamount to an abandonment of the wife's right. She had left her husband more than twenty years before his death, and had virtually given up looking to him for support for herself and her children. Here the wife had kept her right alive, and was apparently only waiting for the opportunity to enforce it. The obligation of the father remained in existence. It was a valuable asset, and she and the children had nothing else that was reliable to look to.

The Lord Justice-Clerk says in his judgment that the true question is not, July 1, 1913. Had the applicant a legal right to maintenance by the deceased? but, Was the applicant actually receiving support from one who was under an obligation to give support, and who was also the servant of the master whom it is proposed to make liable in compensation?

I cannot agree with this view of the true question. I agree that a mere legal right may not, in certain circumstances, be sufficient. It was held insufficient in the case before this House which I have quoted. The long period of desertion by the wife had so qualified it that, as Lord Atkinson pointed out, there was no evidence on which the arbitrator could properly find the fact of dependency.

Lord
Chancellor.

Here I think there was evidence on which he could find that fact, and if this be so the finding of fact is conclusive. The true question in the present case is, in my opinion, whether there was, as one of the facts to be taken into account, an effective and valuable legal right. If there was such a right, and there was no legal difficulty in the way of enforcing it, then the mere fact that a want of opportunity to resort to it, which might have proved only temporary, had reduced the mother and children for the time to living on charity cannot affect the conclusion that by the father's death they lost something on which they could depend.

I wish to add that I have, since the argument, examined the reported authorities. There has been a good deal of divergence in judicial opinion as to what dependency means. There has been a disposition to draw highly refined distinctions, and the decisions arrived at and the reasons for them have not been always consistent. I think that this tendency and its consequences will be lessened if it is borne firmly in mind that the question is always primarily one of fact, on which the conclusion of the arbitrator ought only to be set aside if it is apparent that there was no evidence to support it, or if error in law appears on the face of it. I am of opinion that this is what the Act of Parliament has laid down as the principle to be followed, and that the intention therefore was to confine the power of review by the Courts within the narrow limits I have indicated.

On the facts as found here I think that it was properly found that there was dependency within the meaning in which the word is used in the Workmen's Compensation Act, and I therefore move that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that the award of the Sheriff-substitute be restored.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—The appellant is the widow of a miner named Robert Young, who met his death by accident sustained in a Midlothian coalpit in April 1911. She sues for her two children, who are respectively eleven and eight years of age. The whole question in the case has reference to the Sheriff's third finding, to the effect "that the said two pupil children were wholly dependent on the earnings of the said Robert Young at the date of his death."

I apologise for repeating—one gets tired of repeating—that the matter of dependency—whether it exists, whether it is partial, and whether it is total—all these things are matters of fact, and that findings on them are findings in fact. It is accordingly impossible to disturb this verdict except

July 1, 1918. upon one of two grounds, either that the learned Sheriff misdirected himself in some point of law, or that there was no evidence upon which his findings could legally rest. I am of opinion that neither ground of attack on the finding is good.

Young v.
Niddrie and Benhar Coal
Co., Limited.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

The circumstances of the family were these: In March of 1907 Young deserted his wife and children, of whom there were four. The two elder children contributed to the family fund, the mother had occasional employment in charing and the like, and now and again the father gave his younger children two or three shillings when he met them on the road. After about two years Young went to Castlecary, and a decree was obtained against him for payment of £15, 12s. per annum for each of the two younger children. In September an arrestment was made of his wages, attaching 17s. He left the district to avoid further diligence, and in April 1911, being at the point of death, he sent for his eldest son. A balance of wages, amounting to £2, 18s., was due to him at his death, and the appellant received that sum.

Upon these facts the Sheriff made his finding. As he explains in the stated case, so far as the contributions by the two elder children were concerned, they were under no obligation to maintain the younger children, and were not doing so ex pietate, and the sum contributed by them would have been recoverable from their father under the decree. No doubt this is elliptically put, but it is substantially true.

The learned Judges of the Second Division have negatived the Sheriff's finding, and have found on the contrary that the pupil children were neither wholly nor partially dependent upon their father at the date of his death. Their Lordships appear to have been largely led to this conclusion by a construction of the case of Keeling.¹ That case, so far as the facts were concerned, was so widely different from the present as this, that for over twenty years the wife knew nothing of her husband, earned independently her own living, lived a completely separate life, and, as their Lordships in this House all thought, her independence either of her husband or anybody else was completely established in fact. And with regard to the law in Keeling's case,¹ it settled, and settled conclusively, that the mere fact of relationship will not raise such a presumption as by itself to establish dependency. But it certainly did not settle, nor purport to settle, that relationship (or legal liability arising in consequence of that relationship) was to be excluded from the view of the arbitrator as an element of fact in the case.

Lord Moulton, if I may say so, apprehended with complete correctness the true meaning of Keeling's case.¹ when he said, in *Lee v. Owner of Ship "Bessie,"*² "In my opinion the effect of this decision is that legal obligations to support must not be taken at their theoretic value, but at their practical value. For instance, the mere fact that a husband is bound to support his wife does not establish that she is totally or at all dependent upon him within the meaning of the Act if the circumstances are such that there is no reasonable probability that her rights would have been practically and effectually asserted. But if on the evidence there is any fair probability that the legal rights would at any future time have been actually and effectually asserted by the wife, then there is evidence of dependency, and July 1, 1913. the compensation must be regulated by an estimate of her practical loss subject to the provisions of the Act."

Young v.
Niddrie and Benhar Coal
Co., Limited.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

I feel loth to add anything to these words of Lord Moulton. But, out of respect to the Court below, I may point out that the opinions in *Keeling's case*¹ placed in a very high position of authority the judgment of Lord Moncreiff in the case of *Sneddon*²; and it may be well to quote the passage which I had fully in view when delivering judgment. Lord Moncreiff said: "There may be cases in which a husband's legal obligation to support his wife may be held to be sopited or suspended. But when that legal obligation, not discharged by his wife, concurs with total destitution on the part of the wife and inability to support herself, the bare fact that at the date of his death the husband was not implementing his obligation is not sufficient to prevent us from holding that the wife was wholly dependent on him. Neither, in my opinion, is the question affected by the fact that during the husband's absence and neglect the wife was kept from starvation by the casual charity of strangers, or even of relatives who might have been bound to support her if her husband had not been alive." If that be the law, as I think it is, it does not appear to me possible to affirm that the learned Sheriff-substitute has in any respect in this case misdirected himself.

With regard to the facts of a case of desertion, or refusal or omission to support dependants, these facts may be within a wide range. On the one hand, there may be a temporary absence of a husband or a father, with the expectancy of immediate aid on the part of those left behind. That is the one extreme. On the other hand, there may be a long absence entirely acquiesced in, and those left behind may live a separate and completely independent life, having no reliance whatsoever either upon support actually obtained or possible through the agency of the law. Between those two extremes there are many gradations, leaving room for the arbitrator to pronounce upon dependency—whether it is total or partial, or whether it exists. In the present case there was a resort to the law and a legal affirmation, through the decree, of dependency. Furthermore, there was evidence of a determination to vindicate the children's right to support. It was, as it were, proved that the wife was determined with regard to her children to show her and their dependence upon him. There were circumstances of occasional support prior to the decree, and by reason of it. I cannot, all this being so, see my way to reverse the Sheriff's finding pronounced in circumstances within the range of the extremes I have mentioned, and essentially upon a fact which a Court of law is not permitted to disturb.

I therefore concur in thinking that the appeal should be sustained.

Lord Moulton.—I concur. In my opinion the point of law to be decided in this case is complementary to that which was the subject of the decision in this House in the case of New Monkton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling.¹

² 6 F. 992, at p. 996.

July 1, 1913. In the latter case the Court of Appeal had decided that within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, a wife is presumed in law to be dependent on the earnings of a husband because he is under a legal obligation to maintain her, and that therefore she is entitled as a dependant to compensation on the death of her husband by accident, even though he was not in fact supporting her at the time, and there was no reasonable probability that he would ever do so either voluntarily or under compulsion. That decision was reversed by this House, and it was established that the sums to be awarded under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, are intended to be compensation for the pecuniary loss sustained by reason of the destruction of the deceased workman's power of earning. To put it in other words, this House decided that to establish a claim on the ground of dependency in the case of the death of a workman by accident it is necessary to show an actual damnum to the dependant flowing from the death, and that the termination of a mere legal liability of no present or prospective value is insufficient to constitute or establish the existence of such a damnum.

Young v.
Niddrie and Benhar Coal
Co., Limited.
Lord Moulton.

In Keeling's case¹ it was the widow of the deceased workman who put forward the claim for compensation as a dependant. In the present case the claim is on behalf of two infant children, aged eleven and eight years respectively. This difference is, in my opinion, immaterial, as the facts of the present case show that the deceased workman was under a legal liability to contribute to the support of the claimants, and where this is the case the law, as laid down in Keeling's case,¹ applies, and the question before the arbitrator is whether the right so possessed is of any actual or practical value. It follows, therefore, that if the claim of these infants upon their father to contribute to their support was not merely a theoretical claim, but one which might reasonably be expected to become effective to a greater or less extent, all the requisites of a valid claim under the statute are present.

This question is purely a question of fact, and the tribunal which in this case finally decides all questions of fact is the Sheriff Court. An appeal from it can only be upon questions of law. But it has long been unchallenged law that the question whether there is no evidence in favour of a finding of fact is itself a question of law, although if there be any such evidence the finding cannot be attacked on the ground that, in the opinion of the tribunal of appeal, the original tribunal should have come to a different conclusion on such evidence. In the present case the Sheriff-substitute has found in favour of the claimants, and has assessed the compensation at £216, 9s. It is common ground that the question of quantum was entirely within the competence of the Sheriff-substitute, whose jurisdiction in this respect was limited only by the provisions of the statute as to the maximum sum to be awarded. In his assessment of the compensation to be paid in this case he has not exceeded this maximum, which, as pointed out in the decision of this House in *Hodgson v. West Stanley Colliery*² applies both to the case of total and to that of partial dependency. It follows, therefore, that unless this House is prepared to decide, as a matter of law, that in the circumstances of the present case the claim of these July 1, 1913.

 infant children on their father for support possessed no actual or practical value, the decision of the Sheriff-substitute in their favour must stand.

Young v.
 Niddrie and Benhar Coal
 Co., Limited.

What, then, are the relevant circumstances in the present case? They are set out very clearly and tersely in the special case. The deceased workman deserted his wife in March 1907, and went to reside elsewhere in the neighbourhood. During the next two years small sums were given by him to the children and their mother which pro tanto were contributions to their aliment. He then obtained employment as a miner at Castlecary, and as he was contributing nothing for the children, the mother in June 1909 consulted a solicitor in Falkirk, and through him made a demand on the workman for aliment of the two younger children. He promised to pay aliment but did not keep his promise. The mother then brought an action against him, and thereby obtained a decree entitling her to the custody of the infant children and granting decerniture against her husband for payment of the sum of £15, 12s. per annum for each of the children, with legal interest until payment. The date of the decree was 6th September 1909, the first instalment being made payable on that date. The mother lost no time in enforcing the decree, and on 23rd September 1909 arrested 17s. in the hands of her husband's employers. To avoid further enforcement of the decree, the workman left his employment, and undoubtedly tried to conceal his whereabouts from his family, and succeeded in so doing until he met with the accident which led to his death, on 22nd April 1911. After the occurrence of the accident he himself sent for his eldest son, but died before his son could reach him.

Lord Moulton.

It will be seen, therefore, that, so far from the claim of the infants on their father for support having been allowed to remain in the position of a purely theoretical right, every step necessary to make it effective had been taken by the mother, and she had placed herself legally in a position where she possessed a summary remedy against the husband for the recovery of definite and substantial amounts in respect of each of the children. Moreover, she did not content herself with so doing, but, as the special case finds, she and her two sons, with the assistance of others, made all reasonable inquiries to ascertain the whereabouts of her husband for the purpose of enforcing the decree during the period of his final desertion of her. It is true that those inquiries had not yet been successful when the accident occurred from which he died. But it appears to me impossible for this House to decide that as a matter of law it was not open to the Sheriff-substitute as judge of fact to attribute a substantial value to the probability that sooner or later the decree against the husband would be made productive. In other words, I think it is impossible for this House to say that there was no evidence that the father's legal obligation to support the children was, under the circumstances of the case, of some practical value to them.

It is not uninteresting in this connection to contrast the facts in the present case with those before this House in Keeling's case.¹ There the wife had left her husband twenty-two years before his death, taking her children

July 1, 1918. directly or indirectly, never made any claim upon him, and never received anything from him. She reared her children until they were married and placed out in life entirely on the earnings of her own labour. It is no wonder, therefore, that this House decided that (to use the words of Lord Atkinson) it was "impossible to come to the conclusion that there was any reasonable probability that she would ever enforce her right against her husband, or look to the result for her subsistence to any extent."

Lord Moulton.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, and that the original award of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator should be restored.

INTERLOCUTOR of the Second Division reversed, together with the administrative interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute following thereon, and the award of the arbitrator thereby recalled restored.

Rubber
Estates,
Limited.

Company—Agreement to take shares—Rectification of register—Removal of shareholder's name on ground that shares had been taken through misrepresentation in prospectus—Quotation in prospectus of report by one of the directors—Responsibility of company for truth of statements in report—Fraud and misrepresentation—Contract.

A company, formed for the purpose of acquiring a rubber estate in the Philippines, issued a prospectus in which was quoted a report on the natural advantages of the estate by one of the directors, who was stated to be acquainted with the locality. The prospectus also bore that no portion of the price of the estate would be paid until the directors had received an independent report confirming the statements of the director.

A shareholder, who had received the prospectus and had applied for and been allotted shares, brought an action against the company for removal of his name from the register of shareholders and for repayment of the price of the shares, on the ground that he had been induced to apply for them by the statements in the report quoted in the prospectus, which statements he averred were false and fraudulent. The defenders maintained that the action was irrelevant, the directors having in the prospectus not only not vouched for, but expressly refrained from committing themselves to, the truth of the statements made in the report.

Held (rev. judgment of the First Division) that the pursuer had stated a relevant case, in respect that, the prospectus having been put forward by the Company as an inducement to take shares, the Company could not take benefit from the false and fraudulent statements of their agent which it contained.

Opinion (per Lord Shaw) that the pursuer would be entitled to succeed if the statements were merely false without being fraudulent.

(In the Court of Session, 21st November 1912—Infra (Court of July 18, 1913. Session Cases), p. 183.)

The pursuer appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 20th June 1913.¹

At delivering judgment on 18th July 1913,—

Mair v. Rio
Grande
Rubber
Estates,
Limited.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—If the question in this appeal were one simply of procedure I should hesitate much before coming to a conclusion different from that of the eminent Judges in the Court of Session. But the point which has been decided is a point of substance, and the interlocutor against which the appeal is brought purports to rest on principles which obtain equally in the jurisprudence of Scotland and of England.

Ld. Chancellor
(Haldane).
Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.
Lord Moulton.

The appellant raised an action for reduction of a contract to take shares in the respondent Company, and for repayment of the price and deletion of his name from the register of shareholders. In his condescendence he averred that he had applied for his shares in reliance on the statements contained in a prospectus sent to him by the Company, statements which were substantially to the following effect:—

That the company was formed to acquire a concession from the Government of the Philippine Islands of the exclusive right to the rubber in a certain territory; that Mr. C. A. Littler, who was one of the directors, was acquainted with this locality from long residence in the Philippines; that in a report addressed to the directors and made shortly before incorporation, and set out in the prospectus, he had said that the area was a great centre for the collection of wild rubber until five years previously, when the Government had cancelled the licences owing to damage done to rubber trees and vines; and further, that since then the area had been reserved with a view to the formation of a responsible organisation which would undertake a scheme of collection and re-planting; that, even with the crude methods of extraction which then prevailed, as much as 40,000 lbs. of rubber per month had been obtained, and that the rubber trees and vines were now ripe for tapping on a large scale; that under an organised system of collection it should be easy to maintain an average annual output of 120,000 lbs., which should give a net profit of not less than £12,000 a year, and that later on £64,000 a year might be obtained; that in his (Mr Littler's) experience the estates were unique in that, in addition to the enormous possibilities of such a large territory, if systematically developed, they contained wild rubber trees and vines in such quantities that immediate profits were assured, and that under efficient management they could not fail to yield large profits to the shareholders.

The pursuer in his condescendence charged that these statements were both false and fraudulent, and in particular that there was no wild rubber or any rubber in the territory, unless in quantities so insignificant that it would not pay to collect it.

It should be mentioned that the prospectus stated that no portion of the ¹ The following cases, which were not cited in the argument in the Court of Session, were referred to in the House of Lords:—Redgrave v. Hurd, (1881) 20 Ch. D. 1; Weir v. Bell, (1878) 3 Ex. D. 238, at p. 245; Derry v. Peek, (1889) 14 App. Cas. 337.

Mair v. Rio
Grande
Rubber
Estates,

Lord
Chancellor.

The first plea in law of the defenders was that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant to support the conclusions of his summons, and that they were insufficient in specification. The case went to the Procedure Roll, and the Lord Ordinary sustained this plea in law and dismissed the action as irrelevant. The appellant reclaimed to the First Division, but the Court—Lords Dunedin, Kinnear, and Mackenzie—adhered and dismissed the appeal.

The Lord President took the view that there was no statement put forward in the prospectus as a statement of the directors which could be said to be untrue. All that was stated was that Mr Littler had reported that there was a large amount of rubber in the territory. The Lord President pointed out that the prospectus particularly called attention to the fact that the statements were based on the report, and that the directors announced their policy of not paying the price until they had confirmation of its statements. This, he thought, showed that they did not themselves vouch the truth of what Mr Littler had said, and he held that there was no misrepresentation to anyone who read the prospectus fairly and as a whole.

I am unable to agree in the view taken by the Lord President. It appears to me to overlook that the appellant's averment in his condescendence is one not of mere misrepresentation, but of fraudulent misrepresentation. Of this charge the directors, including Mr Littler, may be able wholly to clear themselves on a proof. But for the present purpose we have to assume the averment against them to be true. Taken as true, it means that the company induced the appellant to subscribe on the faith of a report which contained statements known to at least one of the directors, Mr Littler, to be false and fraudulent. Can the Company retain the money which Mr Littler's statements, on the hypothesis that they were false and fraudulent, must be assumed to have induced the appellant to part with?

The report was made for the directors of the Company, and the Company placed it before the possible subscriber. To this extent, at all events, they adopted the statements it contained, but with what I will, for my present purpose, assume to be an important qualification to which I will refer presently. They invited the appellant to subscribe on the prospect these statements held out. They told him that they were made by one who was now a director, and who was acquainted with the locality from long residence in the Philippines, and that from what he reported large profits might be expected to be realised. They said that if anyone subscribed he would, if he subscribed at once, have their assurance that his money would not afterwards be applied in paying the price unless they had first obtained a further and independent and favourable report. They, however, qualified their statements, as I will assume, to an extent to which I will now refer. They quoted Mr Littler's report in the prospectus as one made to them before incorporation, and presumably before he became a director. I will assume that they thus made it clear that the statements of Mr Littler were his statements and not theirs. But none the less they put forward these statements, subject only to the qualification I have mentioned, in order to induce July 18, 1913. the appellant to subscribe. If the statements be falsely and fraudulently made, I do not think that they can keep the money subscribed on the assumption, which the appellant must be taken to have made and which he was entitled to make, that Mr Littler was reporting honestly. They appear to me to have adopted his action in making his report—to the extent, at least, of putting the report forward as one which possible subscribers might treat as a something worthy of consideration, as an opinion tendered to them, with the authority and concurrence of his colleagues, by a director, who might be assumed to be a person whose sincerity at all events was not in doubt.

In Weir v. Bell,¹ Bramwell, L.J., lays down as a general principle that “every person who authorizes another to act for him in the making of any contract, undertakes for the absence of fraud in that person in the execution of the authority given, as much as he undertakes for its absence in himself when he makes the contract.” This statement by Bramwell, L.J., was cited with approval by Lord Macnaghten in giving the judgment of this House in *Lloyd v. Grace, Smith, & Co.*² It is true that it was made as an explanation of the real foundation of the law on a different point, the principle laid down in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank,³ in which Willes, J., had decided that a corporation was liable for the fraud of its agent. But I think it embodies a broad proposition which is not now disputable, and which applies at all events in the absence of some much more extended and precise limitation of responsibility than was expressed in the present case. The representation here was a continuing one, and the Company authorised it to be put forward as made by Mr Littler, and if it was false and fraudulent on his part the Company which authorised it to be made can no more retain money subscribed on the faith of it than it could had the whole board of directors been guilty.

I think the Scottish procedure in deciding questions of relevancy a very valuable one. But I doubt whether this procedure can often be easy to apply satisfactorily when the issue is one of fraudulent misrepresentation. I express no opinion on whether the learned Judges of the First Division would have been right had there been no allegation of fraud. I am not, indeed, quite sure that in the case of a contract to take shares induced by a prospectus, a case in which the applicant is entitled to place full reliance on the impression which he can fairly derive from the various statements read together, the directors ought not to be held, on materials such as those before us, to have conveyed a view of the value of Mr Littler's report which, if it turns out to have been untrue in fact, would entitle the appellant to rescission. But it is unnecessary to discuss this hypothesis, for fraud is distinctly charged, and if the appellant can establish fraud he is, in my opinion, for the reasons I have given, entitled to succeed. The directors of the Company, including Mr Littler, may be absolutely innocent of the charge. There is nothing before us to lead us to believe that they are guilty. But the question is at this stage one of relevancy only, and on this question I think the Courts below have come to a wrong conclusion.

July 18, 1913. I therefore move that the interlocutors appealed against be reversed, and that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session with a declaration that the appellant is entitled to a proof of his averments. The respondent Company must pay the costs of these proceedings here and in the Courts below.

Mair v. Rio
Grande
Rubber
Estates,
Limited.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—[Read by Lord Parker of Waddington].—The respondent Company was incorporated on 28th February 1910. On 1st March it issued a prospectus. On 7th March the appellant having applied for 200 shares, these were allotted to him. He was put upon the register, and he made payments of instalments and calls to the amount of £100. He says that he became a shareholder “in reliance on the statements in the said prospectus and report therein incorporated, and in the belief that they were true.” He adds that “he has recently learned that the said statements were false and fraudulent.” In these circumstances he seeks for reduction or rescission of the contract, and he asks back his money.

For the purpose of a discussion on the relevancy of a Scotch case there are two elementary rules of procedure, namely, that (1) the pursuer's averments must be taken pro veritate, and (2) they must be sufficiently specific, so as to disclose to the defender, not the minute particulars, but the real substance of the facts making up the case against him. This being done, it is open to the defender, under the short and simple plea of “No relevant case,” to maintain that, even on the assumption that the pursuer had proved in evidence all that he has set forth, yet he would not be entitled in law to succeed. Upon that plea being sustained the action is dismissed.

It is difficult to overestimate the value of this procedure to Scotland. Under it the scandals which sometimes appear elsewhere are avoided—of a trial taking place involving a prolonged, harassing, and most costly inquiry upon an issue which, if it had been stated to begin with in plain words, and there and then adjudicated upon, would have been settled in the same sense for a fraction of the expense and in a fraction of the time. And, in view of what one of your Lordships has observed, I deem it right to add that I think this procedure has a special value in cases where fraud is alleged. For under the second branch of the rule persons charged with fraud know from the beginning the substance of what they have to meet, and they are not exposed to the hardships of a merely fishing or raking inquiry.

It remains, of course, true that the value of the procedure would, on the other hand, be lost if the Court made such a meticulous examination of the averments as to leave or deny the solid ground of a case because of the absence of technical formalities of expression. That does not happen in Scotland, and under the ample facilities for amendment there is less chance of it happening than ever. In the present case nothing of the kind has occurred, and one has only to read the judgment of the learned Lord President to see with what complete breadth and fairness the pursuer's averments have been construed. The case has been decided, not upon any narrow survey of these, but upon quite another ground. That ground is this—that the prospectus itself was neither false nor fraudulent; that although it did embody a report from a Mr Littler, it did not warrant or adopt the accuracy of that report, but, on the contrary, reserved it for confirmation, after the applicant had joined the Company, but before money had been paid over to the vendors.

To turn to the facts of this case as averred by the pursuer, it was denied at the bar that the case must be taken upon the footing that the pursuer was induced to apply for shares in the Company because of false and fraudulent statements, which at least appeared within and formed part of the contents of the prospectus. By that document it was stated that the Company had been formed for the purpose of acquiring from the vendors a concession from the Government of the Philippine Islands, giving the exclusive right for twenty years to gather rubber, &c., in about 100 square miles of territory in the Rio Grande Valley.

Dunfermline.

The prospectus then proceeds to embody a report, which is quoted textually. Two paragraphs from that report are here cited:—

“The area was a great centre for the collection of wild rubber until five years ago, when the Government cancelled all licences, owing to damage done to rubber trees and vines. Since then the area has been reserved with a view to the formation of a responsible organisation, which would undertake a scheme of collecting and re-planting. Even with the crude methods of extraction which then prevailed as much as 40,000 lbs. of rubber per month has paid royalty (only a little over one penny per lb.). In consequence of the Government not having allowed the rubber trees and vines to be tapped, they are now ripe for tapping on a large scale.

“Under an organised system of collection it should be easy to maintain an average annual output of wild rubber for the next seven years of at least 120,000 lbs., which, with rubber at only 4s. per lb., should give a net profit of not less than £12,000 per annum.”

The paragraph need not be further proceeded with. It narrates that these estates are unique in the reporter's experience, and that they contain wild rubber trees and vines in such quantities that immediate profits are assured. The prospectus then proceeds to quote other reports and pamphlets, and in a later passage it says this: “From the above report by Mr Littler, it will be seen that an immediate profit of not less than £12,000 per annum may be expected,” and it further sets out calculations showing the attractiveness of the investment. In a still subsequent passage it is stated: “No portion of the price will be paid until the directors have received an independent report from their manager, or other expert acting for them, substantially confirming the statements in Mr Littler's report, and until the title to the subjects purchased has been delivered.” And towards the conclusion of the prospectus this occurs: “The statements in this prospectus are based mainly on Mr Littler's report, on information furnished by him, and the publications above referred to.”

If the report which is quoted be treated as part of the prospectus itself and as part of the inducement to the investing public to take shares, there can be no doubt that this prospectus was not confined to setting out expectations or beliefs. The report makes broad averments of fact, that until five years ago the area was a great centre for the collection of wild rubber; that it has been reserved with a view to the formation of a responsible organisation; that the trees are now ripe for tapping on a large scale; and that while it was being worked five years ago 40,000 lbs. of rubber per

July 18, 1913. month had paid royalty. The representation of a future yield may be put on one side; but it is manifest from the statements quoted as to Mr Littler's report being the basis of the prospectus that the directors treated it as true, and founded upon its truth as the basis of attractive recommendations to the public.

Mair v. Rio
Grande
Rubber
Estates,
Limited.

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

The case of the pursuer is that these statements were false and fraudulent. He also says: "In particular, in the said prospectus it is, inter alia, stated that up to 1905 40,000 lbs. of wild rubber every month was got from the property which the Company was acquiring, and that from 1910 (the year of the Company's incorporation) onward there would be got from this property 120,000 lbs. of rubber annually. In point of fact, there was no wild rubber, or any rubber, on the said territory, or at all events such an insignificant quantity that it would not pay the cost of collection, and consequently there could be no income from this source from the property."

The learned Lord President puts this averment in a manner which I entirely adopt when he says of the pursuer, "He avers and offers to prove that there is really for commercial purposes no wild rubber at all in the territory, and that, therefore, the idea of getting 120,000 lbs. of rubber and £12,000 a year of profit is entirely chimerical." Put in a word, the pursuer's averments amount to this, that the whole story (and therefore the whole scheme) was a complete hoax.

In these circumstances it is necessary to inquire what was the position of the directors with reference to this report, or rather, to put the more elementary question, who was Mr Littler? It must be remembered that this is an action for rescission. Were it an action for compensation or damages, the liability of promoters, directors, or persons held out as about to become directors, for statements made in the prospectus, would be, no doubt, regulated by the rules set down in section 84 of the Companies Act of 1908, but in an action for rescission in which the Company stands defendant the cardinal rule as to the prospectus is very simple. Each and every director is the agent of the Company to make the representations which the prospectus contains, and to induce applications for shares on the basis of those representations.

The question, therefore, is again repeated (for I have a fear that the significance of the answer thereto has not been sufficiently regarded in the Inner House) who was Mr Littler?

In view of the decision of the Court below—that the pursuer is held to have no relevant case for reduction of this contract or refund of his money because the directors did not personally make the representations, but only quoted these as from a report made to them—it is somewhat startling to remember that Mr Littler was himself a director. He was the associate of the others on the board, and he was a signatory of the prospectus itself. I am of opinion that in these circumstances Mr Littler, in signing this prospectus, acted as the other directors did, namely, as the agent of the Company, and that the Company must answer for the truth of, and absence of fraud in, the representations made by him.

I do not deny that it would be possible for directors to apprise the public frankly in a prospectus that they dissociate themselves from one of their own number, and that with regard to him no warranty was given to the truth of what he represented or reported. This would make a peculiar document; but it might be done. Yet the doing of such a thing would require to be in the most clear and unambiguous terms, so as to constitute a specific warning to investors against doing that which otherwise anything under the hand of a director as such would warrant them in doing, namely, relying upon its accuracy and complete good faith. When such a prospectus comes, if ever, to be framed, Courts of law will no doubt scrutinize it.

Mair v. Rio
Grande
Rubber

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

In the present case there was no such dissociation, either of the Company or of the general body of directors, from the representations made by Mr Littler. On the contrary, the directors expressly based the prospectus upon his report, and they and the Company stood pledged to the position that they held it out to be true. When a board is formed and the public is approached with a prospectus holding out representations and inducements to take shares made by one director, the board stands together in making such representations and, with regard to the actual author of them, his fellow directors and the company back his word. If the case were otherwise, a prospectus might be filled with individual reports from individual directors, all of which would be false, and an action for rescission would fail, because the board as a whole was pledged to none. It would be impossible that financial concerns could be in such circumstances conducted on the principles of fair dealing, and there is no ratio or principle of law which could justify such a course. The representation of one, unless, as I have said, some repudiation of the position be clearly and unambiguously made, is the representation of all. The responsibility attaches to all, and to the company for whom the board and each director acts. According, therefore, to the principle to be applied to this case, this prospectus is the same as if it contained no quotation marks, but reported as facts emanating from the board what emanated from one of the directors individually.

With much respect to the Court below, I see no ground for the view there taken of treating Mr Littler as a person standing apart from his fellow directors or the Company, nor any ground for the Company endeavouring to get rid of those responsibilities which arise in respect of the acts or statements of one of its agents to make representations by the prospectus, and of one of the signatories of that document. I may add that it would be a singular result if a transaction for the taking of shares—a transaction induced by falsehoods or a hoax—could be upheld because the original author of these was not the entire body of directors, but only one of their number.

The representations accordingly being taken to emanate from the Company, and the whole body of directors or signatories of the prospectus, the case becomes a simple one. In the view which I take of it, it is sufficient in such circumstances that the material representations, or any of them, inducing the contract, were untrue, and it is not necessary separately and substantially to establish fraud in such a case. Fraud is averred on the record—and it is difficult to see how, if the averment as to Mr Littler's report be correct, fraud would not have accompanied the falsehood. For his fellow directors in the prospectus set out that he was "acquainted with the locality from long residence in the Philippines." But with regard to the other directors it might be true that they had themselves been deceived.

July 18, 1913. In law this would not matter, even although it applied to the whole body ;
 Mair v. Rio Grande Rubber Estates, Limited. for, to use the language of Turner, L.J., in the Reese River Silver Mining Company,¹—" If it can be shown that a material representation which is not true is contained in the prospectus, or in any document forming the foundation of the contract between the company and the shareholder, and the shareholder comes within a reasonable time, and under proper circumstances, to be released from that contract, the Courts are bound to relieve him from it, and to take his name off any list of shareholders or contributories on which it may have been put." In an action, in short, for rescission of a contract to take shares, on the ground of misrepresentation in the prospectus, it is not necessary to prove a knowledge by the directors or signatories of that document of its untruth. This is in entire accord with a whole body of case law on the subject in recent times, and is substantially the language of Lord Lindley in Karberg's case.²

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

Then, there is this further to be remembered. Fraud is not far away from—nay, indeed, it must be that it accompanies—a case of any defendant holding a plaintiff to a bargain which has been induced by representations which were untrue ; for it is contrary to good faith and it partakes of fraud to hold a person to a contract induced by an untruth for which you yourself stand responsible. It is elementary that a party cannot take advantage of a benefit derived from a contract sprung out of his own fraud, and I think it is equally sound that a party cannot take a benefit from a contract sprung out of a falsehood which he has placed before the other party as an inducing cause. And in applying this rule to a case of the inducing misrepresentation being made by one of a body of directors and used by his associates, the company, as a means of obtaining a contract or raising money, the principle at stake undergoes a legitimate and proper amplification.

But this record on the part of the pursuer alleges that the statements made were not only false but fraudulent. As I have explained, so far as Mr Littler is concerned, if, as the defenders allege, he was acquainted with the district, and if it were proved that the statements were, in fact, false, then they must have been fraudulent as well. And the same quality in him would attach to the representation itself as issuing from or through the board. On this head of fraud it must also be remembered that, so far as the accuracy of a statement by one director is concerned, his fellow directors signing the prospectus with him do, as I have already said, back his word. So also does the Company. But further, by the very fact of their association, these other directors introduce one of their number and each of their number to the investing public as a person of such reputation that his word can be relied upon. So far as they are concerned, they intimate and represent that the word they back is not only accurate but honest. And to such an intimation and representation the Company itself is also bound.

In this view of the case also (although, as I have explained, I am of opinion that this view does not require to be resorted to) the averments are amply relevant to be admitted to probation. For no one can peruse the prospectus as a whole without seeing that the whole body, and the Company, were representing to investors that the good faith as well as the July 18, 1913. accuracy of Mr Littler were worthy of trust.

I accordingly agree that the judgments appealed from should be reversed and that a proof of the pursuer's averments should be allowed.

Mair v. Rio

LORD MOULTON.—[Read by Lord Parker of Waddington]—I concur. The question in this action appears to me to depend on broad, general principles. The facts of the case, so far as they are relevant, raise the question almost in a typical form. So far as they are necessary for your Lordships' decision they may be stated as follows.

The pursuer applied for shares in the respondent Company on the faith of a prospectus issued by the Company for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions for shares. In that prospectus there is set out a report by Mr C. A. Littler, one of the directors of the Company, relating to the lands proposed to be acquired by the Company for the purpose of production of the rubber. To work a contract for the acquisition of these lands was the main object of the formation of the Company, and it was to carry out this contract that the issue of shares was made. The report is highly laudatory of the estates in question, and amongst other things it states that prior to 1895 as much as 40,000 lbs. of rubber per month had paid royalty from those estates. The pursuer alleges in his condescendence that these statements were false and fraudulent, and that he was induced to apply for shares in the Company because of these false and fraudulent statements, and that he is entitled to rescission of the contract to take shares.

The defenders allege as a plea in law that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant to support the conclusions of the summons, or, as one would have said in old times in England, they demur to the whole declaration, i.e., allege that it discloses no valid cause of action. This question of relevancy has been tried separately, and the Court of first instance and the First Division of the Court of Session have decided this point of law in favour of the defenders, and the matter is now brought on appeal before this House.

The contention on behalf of the defenders which has succeeded in the Courts below is that on the true construction of the prospectus the report of Mr Littler is put forward, not as a statement by the Company, but as a statement to the Company, the accuracy of which is not vouched for by the Company, but is, if I may use the phrase, one of the risks of the adventure in which the members of the public are asked to share. Now, I have no doubt that a prospectus may be couched in such terms that, when fairly construed, the public are warned that the Company does not vouch for the accuracy of the reports quoted or referred to therein, and that this may be so even although the report may be made by a person in the employment of the Company, or even by a director. It is needless to point out, however, that the more intimately the person from whom the report comes is connected with the Company, and in authority therein, the clearer must be the warning to the public that the accuracy of the statements is not vouched by the Company.

July 18, 1913. to me to have fallen is due to their having overlooked the fact that the pursuer alleges the statements in question to be fraudulent as well as false. Mair v. Rio Grande Rubber Estates, Limited. It is evident that the report was written by the director in question for the purpose of its being inserted in the prospectus. Even if this were not so, it is clear that it was used for such purpose, with his knowledge, consent, and participation. We have, therefore, an allegation of a fraudulent statement made by a director of the Company, used by the Company for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions, and effective in inducing the pursuer to take the shares. Now, it is elementary law that no person can take advantage of the fraud of his agent. It would, therefore, be contrary to good conscience that this Company should hold the pursuer to a bargain which (for the purposes of this argument) is admitted to have been obtained by the making of a fraudulent statement by a director of the Company, which fraudulent statement was used by the Company to the knowledge of their director for the purpose of bringing about the contract in question.

Lord Moulton.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the averments of the pursuer are relevant to support the conclusions of the summons, and that this appeal should be allowed. It is not necessary, therefore, for me to examine the prospectus in order to decide whether those averments would have been relevant had there been no allegation of fraud, and I abstain from expressing any opinion upon the point.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed; cause remitted to the Court of Session, with a declaration that the pursuer is entitled to a proof of his averments.

Ship—Affreightment—Bill of Lading—Exemptions—Condition exempting ship from responsibility for marking on goods—Liability for unmarked goods—Apportionment among consignees of unmarked goods not identifiable as part of any particular consignment—Commixtio.

Bales of jute, consigned to various consignees and specifically marked, were shipped under bills of lading bearing that the bales were received "marked and numbered as per margin," that the number of packages signed for was to be binding on the shipowners unless error or fraud were proved, but that "the weight, measure, quality, contents, and value" were unknown, and that the ship was not to be liable for "inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks."

On the discharge of the ship 14 bales were missing and 11 bales were found to be, through some unknown cause, without marks, and could not be identified as belonging to any particular consignment. It was not disputed that these 11 bales formed part of the jute shipped at the port of loading; but the consignees—four in number—who did not receive their full consignments refused to accept any of these bales.

In an action for freight brought by the shipowners against one of the four consignees, who had received 6 bales less than his full consignment, the pursuers, while expressing their willingness to account to the four consignees for the value of the 14 missing bales in proportion to their respective shortages, maintained that the 11 bales ought to be allocated among them in like proportion. The defender counter-claimed for the value of the 6 bales.

Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the terms of the bills of lading did not exonerate the pursuers from their obligation to deliver the identical goods consigned for shipment; and that, as they had failed to show that any of the 11 bales were part of the defender's consignment, the defender was not bound to accept any proportion of these bales, and accordingly that the pursuers were liable to him for the full value of the 6 bales.

The defenders appealed to the House of Lords.

The facts of the case are summarised in the opening paragraphs of the Lord Chancellor's opinion.

The case was heard on 19th and 23rd June 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—The respondents had contracted to deliver certain marked bales; they had not done so, and were accordingly liable under the bills of lading. It was idle to offer a portion of the eleven bales left in the harbour shed, there being nothing whatever to indicate that they were the appellants' bales, in fact the evidence was quite to the contrary. What the respondents contracted to deliver, and what the appellants were entitled to get, were the appellants' own bales and not bales belonging to someone else. The question was not a question as to the obliteration of marks, but as to the identity of the goods proffered with those shipped. The fallacy which underlay the decision of the Second Division was that they treated the cargo as having been shipped by one shipper. Had that been so the case would have been different, and the clause in the bills of lading relating to obliteration or absence of marks would have been applicable, and the consignee would have been bound to take the goods. In the present case however the clause had no application. In Jessel v. Bath,¹ Cox v. Bruce,² and Parsons v. New Zealand Shipping Company,³ the identity of the goods was either admitted or proved. *Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company*⁴ had no bearing on the present case, the whole circumstances being entirely different. That was a case of a claim against an insurance company as for a total loss, and the consignee who claimed in the action required, but failed, to establish the total loss. *Smurthwaite v. Hannay*⁵ was a decision upon practice, and the dictum of Lord Russell of Killowen was obiter and, if meant to apply to the case of a claim for delivery, erroneous. The principle of *commixtio*⁶ was inapplicable, because it was impossible to say who was originally the owner of any one of the eleven bales.

Argued for the respondents;—If there had been no conditions

July 18, 1913. attached to the bills of lading the respondents would have been bound to deliver the full number of bales with the proper markings, all as described in the bills of lading. If they failed to do this, then, in order to escape liability, they would have had to prove affirmatively that certain of the bales, when delivered for shipment, had no marks upon them and were different from the bales described in the bills. The exceptions, however, in the bills of lading entirely altered the matter and shifted the onus on to the consignees, who were in the same position as the shipper.¹ Under clause 7 of the bills the respondents were absolved from all responsibility as to markings and were in the same position as though there had been no markings on the bales. All that they undertook to do was to deliver the number of bales shipped, and, it being found as a fact that the eleven bales were in fact shipped, the appellants were bound to take their proportion of them unless they could prove that the lost bales were actually shipped bearing the marks set forth in the bills of lading, and that therefore they could not be among the unmarked eleven. The argument of the appellants would, if adopted by the other consignees, result in this, that the eleven bales would all be without an owner, although they were undoubtedly shipped on behalf of one or other of the consignees, and the respondents would be liable for all the eleven, notwithstanding the clause which exempted them from liability for the results of a confusion of the different parcels of goods. The cases of *Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company*² and *Smurthwaite v. Hannay*³ were precisely in point.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this appeal the House can deal with the questions of law that arise only on the footing that the facts have been conclusively found by the Court below. But I think that the facts have been so fully found that we are in a position to dispose of the case without difficulty.

The substance of what has been so found is shortly as follows:—The appellants, who are spinners and manufacturers in Dundee, were the indorsees of eleven bills of lading, representing eleven separate parcels of jute, amounting to 2476 bales. As regards nine of these parcels delivery was made in full, but in the case of the remaining two there was a shortage in delivery. The parcels as to which there was a shortage consisted of 246 bales which were shipped under a particular bill of lading, and of 254 bales which were shipped under another.

The cargo was put on board the respondents' steamer "Fulwell" at Calcutta in August 1909. Bills of lading for 28,002 bales of jute were given by the master of the vessel, and were indorsed to thirty-seven different consignees.

The "Fulwell" arrived at Dundee, which was the port of destination, in October 1909, and the discharge of the cargo commenced. It was completed before the end of the month, when it was found that on the out-turn of the ship there were missing fourteen bales, and that there also remained in the July 18, 1913. harbour shed eleven bales, forming part of the vessel's cargo, which none of the consignees would accept as shipped under their respective bills of lading. Besides the appellants there were three other consignees who would not accept delivery, and these claimed against the respondents for four, eight, and seven bales respectively. The appellants claimed for shortage of six bales, the total shortage claimed for being thus twenty-five bales. All the other consignees, being thirty-three out of the thirty-seven referred to, acknowledged receipt of the full quantities consigned to them.

The two bills of lading, indorsed to the appellants, over which the dispute has arisen, set forth that there had been shipped in good order and condition on board the respondents' steamer a specified number of bales of jute, "being marked and numbered as per margin." In both cases the markings in the margin were in the words "J. P. S. Naraingunge, 1909-10, on and in red R. B." The total number of bales specified in these two bills of lading was 500, but it is admitted that only 494 bales bearing the marks above mentioned were delivered to the appellants. The bills of lading contained two clauses which are material. Clause 4 declared that "the number of packages signed for in this bill of lading to be binding on steamer and owners unless errors or fraud be proved, and any excess of shippers' marks to be delivered." Clause 7 declared, "The ship is not liable for insufficient packing or reasonable wear and tear of packages; for inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks, numbers, or description of goods shipped," &c.

There having been, as above stated, a shortage in delivery at Dundee to the appellants of six bales, they refused to pay freight except on the footing of claiming to set off against the freight the value of the six bales not delivered to them. The respondents then raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee, claiming £175, 1s. 6d., being the balance of freight due in respect of the appellants' total consignment. The claim for freight was admitted by the appellants, but they counterclaimed for £15, 5s. 4d., being the value of the six bales which had not been delivered. The respondents in their pleadings offered to pay to the appellants and the other consignees, who complained of short delivery, the price of the missing fourteen bales already referred to, "in such proportions as they may be found to be entitled to the same," but they maintained that as the four consignees were, as they alleged, bound to allocate among themselves the eleven bales left in the harbour shed, they could not ascertain what part, if any, of the price of the fourteen bales would fall to the appellants.

The Sheriff-substitute decided that the appellants were entitled to deduct the value of the six bales not delivered from the sum sued for, and assessed their value at £15, 5s. 4d. The respondents appealed to the Court of Session, and the Second Division heard the case. In the course of the argument before that Court the respondents expressed their willingness to give the appellants credit for a proportion of the value of the fourteen bales irrespective of whether they would come to an agreement as to the allocation of the eleven bales remaining in the harbour shed.

The Second Division reversed the decision of the Sheriff-substitute. They held that the appellants were not entitled to any further deduction than the amount which the respondents were willing to concede, which amounted to

Tyzack &
Branfoot

Lord
Chancellor.

It is, in the view which I take of this case, important to define what was the nature of the claim made on each side. The respondents were suing for freight, and they had to show that they had performed their contract. That contract was to carry and deliver or tender at Dundee the bales put on board at Calcutta. Unless they fulfilled this contract they were not entitled to freight on any bales in respect of which they had not fulfilled it.

The appellants, on the other hand, were entitled to have the bales put on board delivered to them as put on board, unless the special stipulations in the bills of lading protected the respondents. As the bales in question had been signed for, and no error or fraud was shown within the meaning of clause 4, to which I have referred before, the respondents could not say that the whole twenty-five bales had not been shipped. Nor does clause 7 help them. For it can apply only if the goods are proved to have been delivered. If a number of packages were shipped, and that number was delivered to a single consignee, the shipowners, who would have satisfied clause 4 by delivering the proper number, might be protected from inaccuracy or obliteration of marks by clause 7. In the case before the House the Court below has found as a fact that there were eleven bales not marked as described in the bills of lading, and that it is impossible to identify these bales as forming part of any parcels marked as set forth in the bills of lading, and that there are marks on the ends of these bales which showed that some of them could not have been marked "on end in red R. B."

Now, fourteen bales have been lost altogether, and there are four consignees to whom the respondents seek to attribute the eleven bales. Why, then, should the appellants be bound to treat their six bales as included in the eleven which have arrived rather than in the fourteen which did not arrive? It appears to me that a fallacy underlies the reasoning of Mr Horne in the able argument he addressed to us on behalf of the respondents. He assumed that the six bales missing could be identified as forming part of the eleven which arrived. But they may have been among the fourteen which did not arrive. Your Lordships will observe that this being an action for freight, the respondents have to prove that they duly tendered the goods shipped at the termination of the voyage. But this is just what they cannot do. It follows, not only that they must fail in their action for freight in respect of the six bales, but that the appellants are entitled to say to them that, having failed to prove their delivery, a counter claim lies for the value of the goods shown to have been shipped but not delivered.

The learned counsel for the respondents relied on the case of Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company,¹ where part of a cargo of cotton arrived at Liverpool but could not be identified, and it was held that the property in the part of the cargo which arrived, but of which the marks had been obliterated, had not ceased to belong to the consignees, and that the various consignees had become tenants in common of the mass of cotton according to their respective interests. But that was a case of a claim against an insurance company as for a total loss, and the consignee who claimed in the July 18, 1913. action had to establish his total loss. He failed for obvious reasons. It is sufficient to say that such a claim presents no real analogy to that which is before us. In Smurthwaite v. Hannay,¹ which was an action for non-delivery like the present, there is a dictum in the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen which suggests that the doctrine applied in *Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company*² might be applied in a case resembling the present. But that dictum was unnecessary for the decision of the appeal, which turned on a point of procedure only, and the other noble and learned Lords who were parties to the judgment did not express concurrence in it.

v. Sandeman
& Sons.
Lord
Chancellor.

For the reasons I have given, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Second Division must be reversed, and that the decision of the Sheriff-substitute must be restored, with costs in this House and in the Courts below.

EARL LOREBURN.—The able arguments to which we have listened help to reduce within a narrow compass all the material points in this case. This ship received at Calcutta, and gave bills of lading, of which the appellants are indorsees, for 2476 bales of jute. When she arrived at Dundee she delivered only 2470 bales, and the question is whether or not there is a valid claim by the indorsees for the balance of six bales undelivered.

Now, the answer rests entirely upon the seventh condition or exception in the bills of lading. It is found, as a fact, that a great many other bales of jute were shipped in this vessel. On arrival all was in order except that fourteen bales out of the total shipped, in some unexplained way, were not forthcoming at all, and eleven bales could not be identified as belonging to any consignee, by reason of defective or obliterated marking. Upon this, the shipowners admitted their responsibility to make good the shortage of fourteen bales, but say that they are not liable at all in respect of the eleven bales, because the seventh exception relieves them. Their contention is that all the consignees of any jute in this cargo to whom short delivery was made must be settled with upon the basis that the fourteen lost bales belonged to them in proportion to their shortage, and that the eleven unidentifiable bales also belonged to them in the same proportion.

The seventh exception runs as follows: "The ship is not liable for insufficient packing or reasonable wear and tear of packages; for inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks, numbers, or description of goods shipped" The owners bind themselves to deliver the goods subject to the exceptions and conditions. In my opinion, each bill of lading evidenced or constituted a separate contract, by which the owners were bound to deliver the selfsame bales that they received, but would be excused from delivery if it was made impossible by obliteration or absence of marks on these particular bales.

Suppose that in this very case all the bales stowed in the ship at Calcutta had been forthcoming at Dundee, but that eleven of them had been found not capable of identification owing to obliteration or absence of marks, so

July 18, 1913. that no one could say to which bill of lading they belonged, there would have been no difficulty. All the bales incapable of identification in that case clearly belonged to one or more of the disappointed consignees in definite proportion to the shortage of which each complained, but which particular bale belonged to which particular consignee could not be proved. All the disappointed consignees were in that case disappointed because of absence or obliteration of marks on their own bales as well as upon the bales of the others complaining of shortage. And the shipowners could have said, "Our contract to deliver was conditional; the condition which excused us from delivering has arisen. The facts show that every single bale that each one of you shipped is on board, though its identity cannot be made out because of its defect in marking, for which we are not liable."

Ld. Loreburn.

But on the facts found in the case now before your Lordships no such protection is available to the shipowners, and for this simple reason. Apart from the eleven unidentifiable bales there were fourteen missing bales. It may be that the six which the appellants complain have not been delivered to them were among these fourteen. So the shipowners cannot prove, at least they have not proved, that the failure to deliver these six was due to any absence or obliteration of marking of such six bales. Clearly the burden of proving that the case comes within the exception lies upon the shipowners who set it up. They have failed in the proof, and stand in the position of men who contracted to deliver merchandise admittedly stowed in their vessel and have been unable to establish an excuse, however probable it may be that such an excuse really exists if the whole truth could be known.

I do not say anything in regard to the argument as to commixtio, because it seems to me quite beside the facts of this case. Owners of goods which have become so mixed as to be inseparable have rights among themselves, but those rights cannot override their contractual relations with other persons. I think this appeal should be allowed.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—[Read by Lord Parker of Waddington].—By the two bills of lading founded on, the respondents stood charged with the receipt at Calcutta of 500 bales of jute, and they became responsible for the delivery of the same number to the defenders at Dundee. They have only, however, delivered 494. Unless excused by the conditions of or exceptions in the contract they are liable in respect of the short delivery of six bales.

The defenders' goods had been shipped along with many other consignments of jute also destined for Dundee. Delivery of the cargo was made on the wharf en masse. In the reckoning eleven bales could not be identified, fourteen others had disappeared. Four merchants had short delivery,—one of these, the defenders' firm, to the extent of six bales. These bales have not been identified with any of the eleven whose marks have gone; on the contrary, Lord Salvesen does not doubt that the quality of the jute in the unmarked bales did not correspond with any of the consignments upon which there had been a shortage. The truth accordingly is, (1) that the respondents became charged with delivery of six bales; (2) that they have failed to deliver; (3) that no clause as to obliteration of marks applies to this case because the obliteration occurs on parcels of another quality of July 18, 1913. goods; and (4) that the failure either to deliver or to identify is thus complete.

On these facts I am of opinion that no case arises for the extrication of the rights of parties by applying any rule of distribution amongst co-owners. For the defenders are not co-owners with others of the remnant of this cargo. Their goods are not in it; and no principle of distribution, confusion, commixtio, or right in common, can apply to the case of a merchant whose goods have disappeared, and who is asked to accept in lieu of them, and in satisfaction pro tanto of his contract rights, a distributive share in something else no part of which ever belonged to him. I cannot read the opinion of Lord Russell in the case of *Smurthwaite*¹ as justifying any such proceeding. If it did, as was argued, I should respectfully disagree with an opinion to that effect.

Tyzack &
Branfoot
Steamship

v. Sandeman

Lord Shaw of
Dunfermline.

The respondents have unfortunately to face the total disappearance of fourteen bales. The defenders' six may all be among them. Had the ship-owners delivered the cargo in full, and had the qualities not been so disconform to those of the goods shipped, they might well have argued with force that all the shippers of goods (and all of them parties to bills of lading in similar terms) stood together to take the risk of confusion by the loss of identifying marks. But the cardinal fact of delivery fails and, with it swanting, the doctrine of distribution goes.

Having reached this point I need go no further. For the reasoning and the language of Lord Loreburn are such that I could not presume to add to them, and I venture to adopt in its entirety the judgment of the noble and learned Earl.

LORD MOULTON.—[Read by Lord Parker of Waddington].—In this case the pursuers, the present respondents, have brought an action against the appellants to recover freight upon 2476 bales of jute delivered to them at Calcutta, to be conveyed on the steamer "Fulwell" to the port of Dundee under the terms of certain bills of lading, eleven in number. The defenders admit the contracts, but allege that the pursuers have failed to perform two of them, in that of the 500 bales specified in those two bills of lading only 494 bales were delivered to them at the end of the voyage. They claim accordingly that the pursuers have not earned the freight on the six bales short-delivered; and further, that they are entitled to set against the freight of the bales actually carried and delivered to them the value of the bales short-delivered.

The case was originally heard in the Sheriff Court at Dundee. At the hearing the Sheriff-substitute found in favour of the contentions of the defenders, and assessed the value of the bales short-delivered at £15, 5s. 4d., which was the value claimed by the defenders in their pleadings, and on the basis of which they had made a proper tender for the sum due to the pursuers in respect of freight. Upon certain grounds presently to be noticed, the pursuers had in their pleadings expressed a willingness to allow to the defenders a credit of £8, 11s., and no more, against the full freight

July 18, 1913. due. The difference between these two sums, namely, £6, 14s. 4d., was therefore the amount which was really in issue between the parties. The Sheriff-substitute found in favour of the appellants in respect of such sum, but on appeal his decision was reversed by the Second Division of the Court of Session, and it is from their interlocutor that the present appeal is brought.

Lord Moulton. To appreciate the point in dispute (which is one of considerable commercial importance), it is necessary to state a few facts. The ship "Fulwell" carried on this occasion a general cargo of jute, shipped under a number of separate bills of lading. Of this cargo the defenders shipped eleven parcels, the numbers and marks on which were duly recorded on the margins of the respective bills of lading. The goods shipped under nine of these bills of lading were duly delivered, but of the goods shipped under the remaining two there was a shortage of six bales. It appears from the evidence that three other consignees also complained of short delivery to the extent of four, eight, and seven bales respectively, and the pursuers do not contest the allegation that the number of bales delivered to these consignees fell short of the number specified in the respective bills of lading by these amounts. On the other hand, upon the discharge of the ship eleven bales were found which corresponded to none of the bills of lading. The goods shipped by the defenders under the bills of lading in question purported to be of at least two different qualities, and the eleven bales found on the ship did not correspond in quality with any portion of those goods, and, in short, there is no evidence whatever to show that any of the eleven bales formed part of the parcels shipped by the defenders under the two bills of lading under which there was short delivery.

It will be seen, therefore, that inasmuch as there is no question that the pursuers are bound by the statements as to numbers in the bills of lading signed by the master, they are in the position of having to admit that fourteen bales were lost, and that none of the eleven bales remaining over can be identified by them as forming part of the goods shipped under the two bills of lading which formed the contracts under which they are suing the defenders.

The pursuers are, therefore, in the position of being unable to assert that they have delivered to the defenders the goods which they received on their account for carriage. Prima facie this is a condition of their right to demand the payment of freight. It remains, therefore, to consider how they excuse themselves from proving the performance of that condition.

In the first place, they set up that the bill of lading is not an absolute contract to deliver, but a contract subject to conditions, and they contend that those conditions provide them with the requisite excuse. The two conditions to which they refer are numbered 5 and 7 in the bills of lading. No 5 reads thus :

"Weight, measure, quality, contents, and value unknown."

I entirely fail to see what application this has to the circumstances of the present case. It in no wise affects the obligation of the shipowner to deliver the identical goods entrusted to him for transport. Its plain object and effect is to guard him from being supposed to warrant the accuracy of the representations as to weight, measure, quality, contents, and value that may be found in the description of the goods or their markings as appearing in July 18, 1913. the bill of lading, and to let it be known that these appear in the bill of lading only as representations made to the master on behalf of the shipper, for the accuracy of which he is in no wise responsible. It is in strong contrast with No. 4, which provides that:—

Tyzack &
Branfoot
Steamship
Co., Limited,
v. Sandeman
& Sons.

Lord Moulton.

Condition No. 7 (so far as material) reads as follows:—

Here again there is no qualification of the absolute obligation to deliver the identical goods consigned to the shipowner for transport. It merely provides that if those goods should be injured in certain ways (one of which is the obliteration of marks) or should have been accepted by the ship without being marked in the way described in the bill of lading, the shipowner shall not be liable for their having been so injured or for their not corresponding to the marking described in the bill of lading. Considering that bills of lading pass into other hands, such a provision is an important protection to the shipowner. The presence of a mark indicating that the goods are the manufacture of some firm of high repute, or otherwise take high rank in the market by reason of their origin, may greatly influence their value, and but for the presence of such a provision in the bill of lading a shipowner might be involved in liability if the goods on delivery were found to be without the marking stated to be in the bill of lading. I can see no ground for attributing to condition No. 7 any other or different effect to this, which is the plain meaning of its words. But for the purposes of this case it suffices to point out that it cannot possibly qualify the obligation to deliver the identical goods consigned for shipment, nor can it refer to the absence or obliteration of marks on any goods other than those to which the bill of lading refers.

But although these points were made the subject of argument on behalf of the respondents, they do not represent the contention upon which they principally relied, and which was the ground of the decision in their favour by the Second Division of the Court of Session. Their main defence was an alleged principle of our law to the effect that, in such a case as the present, where there is a residue of unidentified goods and a shortage in delivery, the shipowner can compel the consignees to take the unidentified goods as a pro tanto fulfilment of the contract to deliver. To prove the existence of such a principle they cited the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in *Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company*¹ and certain expressions appearing in the opinion of Lord Russell of Killowen in the case of *Smarthwaite v. Hannay*² in this House. These cases I shall presently examine, but I think it convenient in the first place to submit to an independent examination the doctrines of our law in cases where goods belonging

July 18, 1913. to different owners have become mixed, so as to be incapable either of being distinguished or separated.

Tyzack &
Branfoot
Steamship
Co., Limited,
v. Sandeman
& Sons.

If we proceed upon the principles of English law, I do not think it a matter of difficulty to define the legal consequences of the goods of "A" becoming indistinguishably and inseparably mixed with the goods of "B."

If the mixing has arisen from the fault of "B," "A" can claim the goods. Lord Moulton. He is guilty of no wrongful act, and therefore the possession by him of his own goods cannot be interfered with, and if by the wrongful act of "B" that possession necessarily implies the possession of the intruding goods of "B," he is entitled to it.¹ But if the mixing has taken place by accident or other cause, for which neither of the owners is responsible, a different state of things arises. Neither owner has done anything to forfeit his right to the possession of his own property, and if neither party is willing to abandon that right the only equitable solution of the difficulty, and the one accepted by the law, is that "A" and "B" become owners in common of the mixed property.

Farther than this I do not think that it is safe to go. That the whole matter is far from being within the domain of settled law is shown by the divergence of opinions as to the relative shares of the participating parties in the case of an accidental commixtio. Blackburn, J., in *Buckley v. Gross*² (following Kent's Commentaries), considers that they would be tenants in common in equal shares. In *Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company*³ they were judged to possess the mixed mass in proportion to the probable amounts of their contributions to it. The fact is that the conclusions of the Courts in such cases, though influenced by certain fundamental principles, have been little more than instances of cutting the Gordian knot—reasonable adjustments of the rights of parties in cases where complete justice was impracticable of attainment. I doubt whether even the fundamental principles enunciated above would be strictly adhered to in extreme cases where they would lead to substantial injustice. For instance, if a small portion of the goods of "B" became mixed with the goods of "A" by a negligent act for which "A" alone was liable, I think it quite possible that the law would prefer to view it as a conversion by "A" of this small amount of "B's" goods rather than do the substantial injustice of treating "B" as the owner of the whole of the mixed mass.

It is from these propositions of law that the pursuers in this case attempt to spell out a right to compel the defenders to accept a proportion of the unidentified bales as a good delivery under the bills of lading. There are, to my mind, two fatal objections to this—the one of fact and the other of law. In the first place, before any such principles can be applied it is necessary that it should be proved or admitted that the goods of the owners in question have in fact contributed to form the mixed mass. If the goods of "A" and "B" have become mixed, and it is possible, but not proved or admitted, that some of "C's" goods are in the mixture, there cannot possibly be a presumption of law that they are or are not to be found there, and accordingly "C" cannot be compelled to take up the position of being a co-owner with "A" and "B," nor is he entitled to insist on being regarded July 18, 1913.

 as such co-owner if "A" or "B" objects thereto. Whether his goods are to be found therein is a question of fact, which must be proved by the party asserting it. Now, in the present case there is not the slightest proof that any of the goods shipped under the bills of lading issued to the defendants are to be found in the unidentifiable bales. Everything, indeed, points the other way, because they are of a wholly different quality to any of the jute purported to be shipped by the defendants. But it is not necessary to discuss this question, or to do more than say that it is admitted that fourteen bales must be taken to have been lost, and there is no evidence, and there can be no presumption of fact, that the six bales belonging to the defendants were not among these missing bales. It follows, therefore, that, accepting to the full the above doctrines as to the effect of a confusion of goods, they afford no ground for requiring the defendants to accept the position of co-owners of the unidentifiable bales.

But there is, in my opinion, an objection of law which is equally serious.
 The doctrines to which I have referred deal with property, and not with contract. To illustrate my meaning, let me take a case where the circumstances are such as would justify in the strongest manner the application of these doctrines in the case of goods shipped under bills of lading. Let me assume that "A" and "B" were the owners of two separate parcels of cargo which have become inseparably and indistinguishably mixed, without loss and without deterioration. It may well be that they could assert the position of joint owners in the mixed cargo, and as such take action against any person who sought to get possession of it or convert it to his own use. But it does not follow that the shipowners would have performed their contract of carriage. Their duty is to deliver the goods entrusted to them for carriage, and they do not perform that duty if all that the consignee obtains is a right to claim as tenant in a common mixture of those goods with the goods of other people. No doubt if such a right is of some value, and the consignee avails himself of it, the shipowners are entitled to the benefit of what he receives in reduction of damages for their breach of contract, just in the same way as they would be entitled to credit for whatever value the goods possessed if they were delivered mixed up with some extraneous substance which lessened their value or compelled the consignee to go to expense in separating it out. In the present instance, therefore, the defendants were, under the bills of lading, entitled to the delivery of their goods, and even if the pursuers could compel them to take up the position of co-owners of the mixed mass, it would not be a defence to their claim for breach of contract to deliver, nor would it affect the damages recoverable thereunder, except so far as they had received or could receive payment representing the value of that co-ownership. The pursuers would have no right to claim that the right of the shippers to the proceeds of the goods as co-owners was a fulfilment of their own contract of carriage. They could only claim that any payment so received or receivable would be pro tanto a reduction of their liability in damages by reason of the defendants having received or being in a position to receive payment to that extent, so that the damages which they would suffer from the breach of contract would be diminished by a like amount. In the present case the defendants have received no payment

Lord Moulton.

July 18, 1913. of this kind, and for all that appears in the case the unidentifiable bales may possess no appreciable value, so that (apart from all other grounds) the pursuers are not on this account in a position to claim any reduction of the damages prima facie due from them to the defenders for their breach of contract to deliver.

Tyzack &
Branfoot
Steamship
Co., Limited,
v. Sandeman
& Sons.

The nature and consequences of the contention of the pursuers are well illustrated by considering the manner in which they have arrived at the sum of £8, 11s. for which they express their willingness to credit the defenders. The number of bales short-delivered was twenty-five, of which fourteen are admitted to have been lost. The value of the six bales short-delivered to the defenders is fixed at £15, 5s. 4d., and £8, 11s. is arrived at by taking fourteen twenty-fifths of that sum. The pursuers therefore contend that they have specifically performed their contract with respect to the remaining eleven twenty-fifths of the missing six bales (i.e., two and sixteen twenty-fifth bales) by telling the defenders to take their share of eleven unclaimed bales which are not shown to be identical with or to correspond in any particular with the bales which they undertook to deliver.

I now turn to the decisions which it is contended establish doctrines inconsistent with the above conclusions. The chief, and in fact the only decision to which we are referred, is that of Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company.¹ The facts of that case were as follows: Cotton belonging to different owners was shipped for Liverpool in bales specifically marked. On her voyage the ship was wrecked, all the cotton was more or less damaged, some of it was lost, and some was so damaged that it had to be sold at an intermediate port. The rest was sent on to Liverpool. By reason of the ship being wrecked the marks on all but a portion of that sent on to Liverpool were obliterated. The plaintiffs were the holders of a bill of lading for forty-three bales, and of these two only were identifiable at Liverpool, and were duly received by them. They had insured the whole parcel, and the action was an action by them against the underwriters, as for a total loss of the forty-one bales. I should add that the unidentifiable portion of the cargo had all been sold (under an arrangement whereby the sale was to be without prejudice to the rights of the parties), and the proceeds divided among the owners who had not received their goods, in proportion to the number of bales short-delivered.

In these facts there are three matters worthy of special notice. In the first place, it was not disputed that all the goods had been duly shipped, and that the loss had been occasioned entirely by the ship being wrecked. In the second place, the goods appear to have been all of the same character, so that it was only a question of the number of bales belonging to each particular owner. In the third place, the action was one of insurance, and the sole question was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to say that there had been a total loss of the forty-one missing bales. There was no question of breach of contract to deliver. It was, therefore, open to the Court to regard the case as one in which, by reason of the perils of the sea and from no other cause, it came about, first, that the goods became indistinguishably mixed, and, secondly, that a portion of this mixed mass was lost. Under July 18, 1913, those circumstances the owners of the goods were clearly entitled to take up the position of having become co-owners of the mixed mass, and of every part of it, and therefore of the surviving portion of it, and seeing that the goods were all of the same quality, this was the only position they could take up in fairness to the underwriters. Everything had been done consistently with this view, and all that the Court decided was that this was the proper view to take of the matter; and if the judgment be carefully read, it will, in my opinion, appear that the Court arrived at its decision from the considerations that I have enumerated above, and did not purport or intend to make any addition to the law as to the effect of commixtio as previously enunciated by recognized authority.

The case of *Smurthwaite v. Hannay*¹ is of a different character. In that case bales of cotton were shipped by several shippers upon a general ship for carriage to Liverpool, and upon arrival it was found that the number of bales landed fell short of those shipped, and that the marks upon some of the bales so landed had become obliterated, so that identification was impossible. These latter bales were sold and their proceeds distributed proportionately among the several consignees who had received short delivery. It would seem that all the bales were treated as being similar.

Under these circumstances sixteen holders of bills of lading joined in one action against the shipowners, claiming damages for non-delivery of the specified number of bales. The defendants applied to stay the action on the ground that neither Order XVI., rule 1, nor Order XVIII., rule 1, justified the joinder of such causes of action. The sole question before the Court, therefore, was as to the construction of these rules. The Court of Appeal had decided in favour of the plaintiffs, and from that judgment the defendants appealed to this House. In the result the appeal was allowed, and it was decided that on the true construction of the rules in question the various holders of the bills of lading could not combine as co-plaintiffs in one and the same action.

In the course of the argument counsel for the appellants suggested that unless holders of bills of lading could thus join in one action, they would be placed in a position of some difficulty, because the defendants might attribute a sufficient number of the unmarked bales to the particular plaintiff suing, and so meet his claim. I have some difficulty in appreciating the legitimacy of such an argument, when the sole point before the Court was as to the construction of the language of certain rules. There is certainly no presumption that such rules are sufficient to prevent difficulties arising in practice, and it is evident that Lord Russell did not base his opinion on any such ground, for he says: "The argument of convenience was strongly pressed upon your Lordships. I am by no means certain that that argument has in the facts of this case much weight, but whether it has or has not, it cannot be regarded, if, as I think, the Orders and Rules do not authorize that joinder of plaintiffs which has here been attempted."

Nevertheless, it is true that he does say in his judgment that the difficulty suggested by the plaintiffs is not a real one, because the defendants

July 18, 1913. could only attribute to each single owner of a bill of lading a proportion of the unidentified bales in answer to their claim for non-delivery. Under the circumstances of the case this could be nothing other than obiter dictum. It was doubtless justified in that particular case by the fact that it was common ground that all the bales were similar, and that the parties had been acting on the basis of their being owners in common of the unidentified bales, seeing that the proceeds of the sale of those bales had been divided amongst them proportionately. Under these circumstances no objection could be made to the statement that they were owners of the unidentifiable bales in proportion to their respective interests. But if the noble and learned Lord intended to go further than the circumstances of that case, and to say that a tender of a proportion of unidentifiable bales is to the extent of that number of bales an answer to a claim of the holder of a bill of lading for short delivery, I am of opinion that the dictum was erroneous and cannot be justified. But I see no reason for thinking that his Lordship intended to lay down any such principle, or that he had before his mind the general case of short delivery under bills of lading.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be allowed.

M'Lean v. Johnston.

Held that prosecutions for dealing in game without a licence in contravention of the Game Licences Act, 1860, and for the recovery of the penalties imposed by the Act, are timeously brought if instituted within six months of the alleged offences.

JAMES JOHNSTON, rabbit trapper, Creebridge, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Wigtown on a summary complaint at the instance of John T. M'Lean, officer of customs and excise at Newton-Stewart, prosecuting by order of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise. The charge against the accused was that he had purchased and sold, or otherwise dealt in game without the licence required by the Game Licences Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. cap. 90), sec. 14, contrary to the said Act, as amended by the Revenue (No. 2) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 91), sec. 17.* The dates of the alleged offences set forth in the complaint were 1st, 14th, and 20th September 1911.

The Game Licences Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. cap. 90), enacts:—

Sec. 3. "The duties by this Act granted shall be under the management of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and shall be deemed to be excise duties; and all the powers, provisions, clauses, regulations and directions contained in any Act relating to excise duties or to penalties under Excise Acts, and now or hereafter in force, shall respectively be of full force and effect with respect to the duties by this Act granted, and to the penalties hereby imposed, so far as the same are or may be applicable, and shall

Johnston.

In the Sheriff Court the respondent stated the following objection to the competency of the complaint viz. :—That under section 41 of the Game Act, 1831,¹ as incorporated into the Game Licences Act, 1860,² by section 13 of the latter Act, the complaint ought to have been brought within three months of the commission of the offences complained of and that, as that period had now expired, the complaint should be dismissed.

The complainer maintained that section 13 of the Game Licences Act of 1860² did not incorporate section 41 of the Game Act, 1831¹; that the procedure in connection with the recovery of penalties was regulated by section 3 of the Excise Act, 1848,³ and that the complaint was competent within six months of the commission of the offence.

The Sheriff-substitute (Watson) was of opinion that the Game Licences Act, 1860,² section 13, incorporated the Game Act, 1831,¹ section 41, without any recognition of the Excise Act, 1848,³ and that as the provision of section 3 of the last-mentioned Act was inconsisbe observed, applied, and enforced for and in the collecting, securing, and recovering of the said duties and penalties hereby granted and imposed respectively, and otherwise in relation thereto, so far as the same shall be consistent with and not superseded by the express provisions of this Act, as fully and effectually as if the same had been herein repeated and specially enacted in this Act, with reference to the said last-mentioned duties and penalties respectively."

Sec. 13. " . . . All the clauses, provisions, and penalties contained in" the Game Act, 1831, and the Act 2 and 3 Vict. cap. 35, or either of them, "relating to dealers in game, and to the selling of game, either by or to such dealers or others, shall, so far as the same are consistent with the express provisions of this Act, and as the same are altered or amended by this Act, extend to and be of full force and effect in and throughout the whole of the United Kingdom, and shall be observed, applied, and enforced as if the same, so altered or amended and made consistent with the express provisions of this Act, had been herein repeated and specially enacted. Provided always that no person shall be authorised to sell game to any licensed dealer unless he shall have taken out a three pound licence under this Act."

Sec. 14. "Every person who shall have obtained any licence to deal in game from the Justices of the Peace, under the provisions of the said two several Acts in the preceding clause mentioned, shall annually and during the continuance of such licence, and before he shall be empowered to deal in game under such licence, obtain a further licence to deal in game under this Act, on payment of the duty hereby charged thereon; and if any person shall purchase or sell or otherwise deal in game before he shall obtain a licence to deal in game under the provisions of this Act, he shall forfeit the sum of £20."

The Revenue (No. 2) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 91), enacts, sec. 17, that the penalty imposed by the Game Licences Act, 1860, sec. 14, "shall be incurred by every person who under the provisions of the said Acts" referred to in sec. 14 of the 1860 Act "ought to obtain a licence from the Justices of the Peace to deal in game, and who shall purchase or sell or otherwise deal in game before he shall obtain a proper excise licence under the provisions of the Game Licences Act, 1860, whether he shall have obtained a licence from the said Justices or not. . . ."

tent with the provision of section 41 of the Act of 1831 and therefore with the incorporating section of the Act of 1860, the more recent enactment must prevail; and accordingly sustained the objection and dismissed the complaint. Oct. 18, 1912.
M'Lean v. Johnston.

The complainer appealed on a stated case. The question of law was:—"Whether the said objection to the competency of the complaint was rightly sustained?"

The case was heard on 17th July 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute's decision was wrong. The Act of 1831 was originally confined in its operation to England, and was of force in Scotland only in so far as it was incorporated in the Act of 1860. Section 41 of the Act of 1831, however, did not fall within the description of clauses contained in the incorporating section—section 13—of the Act of 1860. On the other hand, section 3 of the latter Act had the effect of making section 3 of the Excise Act, 1848, applicable; and as the Act of 1860 could not be construed as containing two inconsistent limitations as to the time within which prosecutions might be brought, section 3 of the Act of 1848 must be held to be the ruling provision. If the Act of 1860 were held not to afford a clear time-limit for prosecutions, then section 26 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, would apply. The time-limit provided by that section was six months, and, therefore, on this view, the prosecution was timeous.

Argued for the respondent;—Section 3 of the Act of 1860 was in general terms and did not expressly refer to the Act of 1848. On the other hand, section 13 of the 1860 Act explicitly incorporated the clauses of the Act of 1831 except in so far as these were inconsistent with the provisions of the incorporating Act—which could not be affirmed of section 41. This section must be regarded, therefore, as one of the sections of the latter Act. This appeared also from the amending Act—Revenue (No. 2) Act, 1861,—for section 17 of that Act provided that in prosecutions it should be necessary to refer only to the Act of 1860, which indicated that all the regulations as to prosecutions were to be found in that Act. If this were so, then the time-limit in the Act of 1848 was superseded by that contained in the later Act.

At advising on 19th October 1912, the opinion of the Court (consisting of Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie) was delivered by LORD DUNDAS.—The only point we have here to decide is, within what period must a complaint be brought for alleged contraventions of the Game Licences Act, 1860, by dealing in game without a licence, in order to comply with the statutory limitation of time in that regard; and this question in its turn depends upon what is the ruling enactment concerning the limitation. If it is, as the respondent contends, and the Sheriff-substitute has held, section 41 of the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, the period limited is three months, and this complaint was brought too late. If, on the other hand, the Crown is right in maintaining that the point is governed by 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 118, section 3, then the complaint was timeously brought, being within six months of the alleged contraventions. The question is not an easy one to decide for there are difficulties in affirming either of the views contended for, but I have come to the conclusion that the Sheriff-substitute was wrong, and that the argument for the Crown must prevail.

Oct. 19, 1912. The respondent is charged with contravening the Game Licences Act, 1860, whereby he is liable to a penalty of £20. Section 3 of that Act provides, inter alia, that "all the powers, provisions, clauses, regulations, and directions contained in any Act relating to excise duties or to penalties under Excise Acts, and now or hereafter in force, shall respectively be of full force and effect with respect to the duties by this Act granted, and to the penalties hereby imposed, so far as the same are or may be applicable, and shall be observed, applied, and enforced for and in the collecting, securing, and recovering of the said duties and penalties hereby granted and imposed respectively, and otherwise in relation thereto, so far as the same shall be consistent with and not superseded by the express provisions of this Act, as fully and effectually as if the same had been herein repeated and specially enacted in this Act, with reference to the said last-mentioned duties and penalties respectively." These are wide words. Turning to 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 118 (the Excise Act, 1848), one finds that it enacts (section 3) that "every information exhibited by order of the Commissioners of Excise for the recovery of any penalty imposed, or for the condemnation of any seizure made as forfeited under or by virtue of any Act or Acts relating to any duties under the collection and management of the . . . Commissioners of Customs may be exhibited before the . . . Justice or Justices of the Peace at any time within six calendar months after the offence or offences alleged in such information have been committed, or the goods, commodities, chattels, or things therein alleged to have been forfeited, have been seized, and all such proceedings shall be afterwards had thereupon as by law directed, anything in any other Act or Acts of Parliament to the contrary thereof notwithstanding." The Sheriff Court—not the Justice of Peace Court—is now the tribunal for trial of cases like the present; but, subject to that alteration, I think this complaint falls within the scope of the section just quoted, which applies to Scotland, and has never been repealed, and which must, I consider, be held as covered (whether designedly or not) by the language of section 3 of the Act of 1860. The enactment of 1848 occurs, no doubt, in a somewhat curious collocation; and the history of the statute (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 118) is worth noting. It was originally entitled: "An Act to explain and amend the law as to the licence required for the letting of post-horses to hire in Ireland, and the law respecting proceedings for duties and penalties under the post-horse, stage, and hackney carriage Acts in the United Kingdom." The first branch of this title was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1891; and five years later the Act received the short title the Excise Act 1848 (Short Titles Act, 1896, 59 and 60 Vict. cap. 14). Section 1 was repealed by statute law revision in 1875; section 2, in part, in 1875 and 1891; and section 3, in part, in 1891; but the remainder of section 3, conceived in the terms above quoted, stands on the statute book as a subsisting enactment under the title of the Excise Act, 1848. It is remarkable that this Act seems to have escaped the notice of our text-writers upon the game laws. I can find no mention of it either in Sheriff Forbes Irvine's book, or in Mr Tait's later publication. But the existence of section 3 was expressly recognised by Parliament in 1896; and I think it must also be held to have been imported into the legislation of 1860 by section 3 of 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 90, already referred to. If this view is correct, the ruling provision as to time-limit for proceedings like the present is six months; and this complaint was timeously brought.

Oct. 19, 1912.
M'Lean v.
Johnston.

Lord Dundas.

The respondent's counsel urged that the time limitation here applicable is not six but three months, because the ruling enactment is section 41 of 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, incorporated (as he contended) by section 13 of the Game Licences Act, 1860. Section 41, so far as not repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1891, provides that "the prosecution for every offence punishable upon summary conviction by virtue of this Act shall be commenced within three calendar months after the commission of the offence." The statute 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, was originally a purely English Act; but by section 13 of the Game Licences Act, 1860, its provisions were to some extent made applicable to Scotland. That section provides, inter alia, that "all the clauses, provisions, and penalties contained in" 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, "relating to dealers in game, and to the selling of game, either by or to such dealers or others, shall, so far as the same are consistent with the express provisions of this Act, and as the same are altered or amended by this Act, extend to and be of full force and effect in and throughout the whole of the United Kingdom, and shall be observed, applied, and enforced as if the same, so altered or amended and made consistent with the express provisions of this Act, had been herein repeated and specially enacted." I am unable to read these words as importing an incorporation of section 41. In the first place, I think, as already explained, that upon a sound construction of section 3 of the Excise Act, 1848, and section 3 of the Game Licences Act, 1860, the subsisting limitation of time is that prescribed by the former of these sections. If that is so, one can hardly suppose that section 41 of 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32 was also incorporated in the Act of 1860, for it would be manifestly inconsistent with section 3 of the Excise Act, 1848. But I think, further, that the meaning and purpose of section 13 of the Game Licences Act, 1860, is amply satisfied without reference to section 41 at all; and I observe that neither of the learned text-writers already mentioned includes that section amongst those which, in their view, were incorporated by section 13 of the Act of 1860. Thus Mr Tait says: "The provisions of 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, referred to in section 13 are sections 17, 18, 21, 22, and 25 to 29 inclusive." It seems to me that section 41 cannot reasonably be described as falling among the "clauses, provisions, and penalties contained in" 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, "relating to dealers in game and to the selling of game."

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the limit of time within which complaints like the present must be brought is six months, and that we ought to answer the question put to us in the negative. The same result would be reached, looking to the terms of section 26 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908, if we were to hold that neither section 41 of 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, nor section 3 of the Excise Act, 1848, had ruling force; but, as already stated, I consider that this cannot be affirmed of the last-mentioned section.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

M'Court v.
H. M. Advocate.JOHN M'COURT, Appellant.—Latta.HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Anderson
—Morton, A.-D.Crime—Habitual Criminality—Proof of age—Prevention of Crime Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 59), sec. 10 (2).

The Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, enacts :—Sec. 10 (2). "A person shall not be found to be a habitual criminal unless the jury finds on evidence (a) that since attaining the age of sixteen years he has at least three times previously to the conviction of the crime charged in the said indictment been convicted of a crime . . . and that he is leading persistently a dishonest or criminal life."

Held that in proceedings under this Act the evidence of a police officer that an accused person had, after his apprehension, stated his age to be forty-four, was not, without corroboration, sufficient proof of the accused's age; and a verdict of habitual criminality obtained on that evidence alone as to age recalled.

COURT OF
APPEAL.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Guthrie.

JOHN M'COURT was tried at the Circuit Court at Glasgow on 25th June 1912 on an indictment charging him with assault and robbery and with being a habitual criminal. The jury having returned a verdict of guilty as to the charge of assault and robbery, evidence was led as to his habitual criminality. Five previous convictions of crime, one in each of the years 1896, 1898, 1905, and two in 1911, were proved. The only evidence as to the accused's age was that of a police-constable who deposed that the accused after apprehension gave his age as forty-four at the police-office.

The jury having found the accused guilty on the charge of habitual criminality, sentence of seven years' preventive detention was passed. The accused presented a note of appeal in which he craved the Court to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was not proved at the trial that he was sixteen years of age at the date of the earliest of the three last convictions.

The appeal was heard before the Court of Appeal on 19th November 1912.

At the hearing the undernoted authorities were cited.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This statute is a highly penal one; it adds considerably to the period of confinement, to which a person is exposed upon conviction of a particular crime, on its being shown that he has been at least three times previously convicted and that he was sixteen years of age at the time of the first of these previous convictions. That is a kind of inquiry which must be dealt with very carefully and strictly. I do not suppose that in nineteen cases out of twenty there will be any difficulty in proving conclusively that the prisoner's age, at the date of the first of the convictions, was more than sixteen years, but the proof must be conclusive. In this case I am obliged to say I do not think the proof was conclusive. It is one of the essential points to be found by the jury that the man was sixteen years of age at the time of the first of the previous convictions. In this particular case Nov. 19, 1912. there was no evidence as to the age of the prisoner except the statement of a police-constable that the prisoner told him that he was forty-four years of age. That kind of evidence requires corroboration. It is quite plain that some very slight circumstance might cause the constable to mistake what the prisoner said. It seems that there was another witness who was expected to give corroborative evidence, but he failed to do so. In these circumstances it cannot be maintained that there was sufficient evidence to entitle the jury to find that the prisoner was sixteen years of age at the time of the first previous conviction. It was suggested that a jury by looking at the prisoner's appearance might be satisfied that he was forty-four years of age. While it is obvious that, by looking at the prisoner's appearance, one might come to be of opinion that he was forty-four years of age, I cannot hold that it has been proved that he was that age, and the burden of proving it was upon the public prosecutor. I am of opinion that the appeal should be sustained.

LORD DUNDAS.—I have come with regret, but without difficulty, to the same conclusion. Section 10 (2) of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, provides that a person shall not be found to be a habitual criminal unless the jury "finds on evidence" that since attaining the age of sixteen he has had a certain number of previous convictions, and that he is leading persistently a dishonest or criminal life. There is no dispute that a sufficient number of previous convictions is here proved; nor that the prisoner was leading persistently a dishonest or criminal life. But it is said that it is not proved that he was sixteen years of age at the date of the first of the three previous convictions. What proof is there? We have only the evidence of one police-officer proceeding on a statement by the panel. That will not do by itself; but it is suggested that the jury might supplement that evidence by their own impression derived from the appearance of the panel. I do not think the jury's impression could be taken as corroborative evidence. In a very recent case in this Court,¹ where the important age was not that of the prisoner but of the victim, it was held that the Magistrate's opinion that the child looked like a child of eleven was no corroboration at all. Where the Legislature intends to permit physical appearance to be taken into account, it can say so. For example, the Criminal Lunatics Custody Act, 1800,² section 2, provides that, if "such person shall appear to the jury . . . to be insane," certain consequences shall follow. Here, however, the jury must "find on evidence"; and I do not think that in this case the evidence was sufficient to entitle the jury to find that the panel was sixteen years of age at the time of the first of the convictions.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite immaterial in this case that it was proved that the prisoner was three times previously convicted of a crime, unless it was also found that he was sixteen years of age at the time of the first of the three convictions. Now, there was no

² 39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 94.

Nov. 19, 1912. sufficient evidence to entitle the jury to come to that finding. I think this is a case, if ever there was one, for applying the general rule that an essential element in a case can only be proved by the evidence of two witnesses or of one witness supplemented by corroborative evidence, oral or documentary.

M'Court v. H. M. Advocate. —

Lord Guthrie. Appearances are always liable to be deceptive, and especially among the criminal classes where the constitution has been broken down by excess and hardship. Also the circumstances under which the statement of his age was made by the prisoner to the police-constable were peculiarly open to error. In my opinion the appeal ought to be sustained.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords of the Court of Appeal . . . Recall the verdict of the jury appealed against: Quash the order for preventive detention pronounced upon the appellant, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses which modify to seven guineas . . ."

Lockwood v. Chartered Institute of Patent Agents.

JOSEPH LOCKWOOD, Complainer (Appellant).—Paton.
THE CHARTERED INSTITUTE OF PATENT AGENTS AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Wilson, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Statutory Offences—Patents and Designs Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 29), sec. 84—Unregistered person describing himself as patent agent—Complaint—Instance—Private prosecutor—Title to prosecute—Expenses—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 52.

The Chartered Institute of Patent Agents has an interest, and therefore a title, to prosecute, with the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, a summary complaint charging an accused with contravening the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, sec. 84, by describing himself as a patent agent without being registered; and, as the Institute in such proceedings is not "prosecuting in the public interest," expenses may be awarded to it in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 52.

The Patents and Designs Act, 1907, sec. 84, prohibits under a penalty any person from describing himself as a patent agent unless he is registered as such agent in pursuance of the Act; and provides that "in this section 'patent agent' means exclusively an agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom."

Held that a person who, without being registered, had used the title of "British and Foreign" patent agent, had described himself as a patent agent within the meaning of the section; and accordingly was guilty of a contravention thereof.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Guthrie.

JOSEPH LOCKWOOD was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow on a summary complaint at the instance of the Chartered Institute of Patent Agents, incorporated by royal charter and having its head office at Staple Inn Buildings, London, and Henry H. Graham, its secretary and registrar, with the consent and concurrence of James N. Hart, Procurator-fiscal of Court. The charge against the accused was:—"That during the months of December 1911 and February Nov. 18, 1912. 1912, and at a time when you were not registered as a patent agent, in pursuance of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, you did describe Lockwood v. Chartered Institute of Patent Agents. yourself as a patent agent in a letter, dated 8th December 1911, bearing to be signed by you, which was addressed and posted in Glasgow to 'Messrs W. P. Thompson & Co., 6 Lord Street, Liverpool,' and which was received by the said Messrs W. P. Thompson & Co. on or about 9th December 1911, in which letter you designed yourself as 'Joseph Lockwood, Patent, Design, and Trade Mark Agent'"; and also in two other letters sent by the accused to other persons, dated respectively 23rd December 1911 and 27th February 1912, in which letters the accused designed himself as in the letter of 8th December 1911, "and all this you did contrary to the said Act, section 84, whereby you are liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, and in default in payment to imprisonment in terms of sections 47 and 48 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, and you are also liable to pay to the complainers the expenses of the present complaint and the proceedings therein."*

At the calling of the complaint the agent for the accused stated, inter alia, the following objections to the complaint:—" (1) That the complainers have no title or interest to prosecute; (2) that the complaint is irrelevant, in respect that accused is not charged as having acted as an agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom." The Sheriff-substitute (Taylor) having repelled these objections, the accused pleaded not guilty. At the trial the letters libelled in the complaint were lodged. These all bore printed at the head of them the words "British and Foreign.—Joseph Lockwood, Patent, Design, and Trade Mark Agent." No further designation of the accused appeared in the letters.

The accused was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of £7 of penalty, with £3 of expenses, and, in default of payment, to thirty days' imprisonment; and "in respect it appeared that the reasonable expenses of the complainers' witnesses, together with the other expenses, exceeded the sum of £3 in which accused was found liable, the Court, on the motion of the complainers' agent, directed the penalty to be paid to the complainers to be applied by them in payment pro tanto of the expenses of their witnesses."

The accused thereupon brought a bill of suspension in which he

"(1) A person shall not be entitled to describe himself as a patent agent, whether by advertisement, by description on his place of business, by any document issued by him, or otherwise, unless he is registered as a patent agent in pursuance of this Act or an Act repealed by this Act. (3) If any person knowingly describes himself as a patent agent in contravention of this section he shall be liable on conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds. (4) In this section 'patent agent' means exclusively an agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom."

The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), enacts:—Sec. 52. ". . . Expenses may be awarded to or against any private prosecutor, but shall not be awarded to or against any person prosecuting in the public interest, unless the statute or order under which proceedings may be taken directly or by implication authorises such award, but the Court may direct the expenses incurred by any prosecutor, public or private, to be met in whole or in part out of any penalty imposed. . . ."

The said conviction ought to be suspended, in respect (1) that the present respondents had no title to prosecute said complaint; and (2) that said complaint is irrelevant. 2. Said conviction ought to be suspended, in respect (a) that no evidence at all was adduced against the complainer that he described himself exclusively as an agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom; (b) that the documents produced by the complainer proved the contrary; and (c) the documents produced in support of the complaint do not bear out the charge; and (d) that the Sheriff-substitute refused to consider or look at the productions lodged by the complainer at the trial. 3. There being no warrant in the statute libelled in the complaint for the imposition of expenses, the sentence quoad the expenses should be quashed.

Lockwood v.
Chartered Institute of Patent
Agents.

The case was heard on 19th November 1912.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The Institute had no title to prosecute. It was not mentioned in the Patents and Designs Act, and no power to prosecute was conferred on it. The regulations made by the Board of Trade merely imposed certain duties on, and gave certain rights to, the Institute as to the keeping of the register of agents, and specified the qualification of persons for registration, and made no reference to prosecutions by the Institute. The Institute in reality was merely the depositary of the register. In this respect the Patents and Designs Act was entirely different from the statute considered in Bremridge v. Smith.¹ Nor could it be said that the Institute had any interest to prosecute.² The prosecution was clearly in the interest of the public. (2) The Institute should have sisted a mandatory, or found caution, as otherwise the complainer could not enforce a decree for expenses if he were successful. The Judgments Extension Act, 1868,³ did not apply to criminal cases, and the Inferior Courts Judgments Extension Act, 1882,⁴ would not apply as the present case did not fall within the class of actions described in section 10 thereof. (3) The complaint was irrelevant. From the terms of the definition of "patent agent" in section 84 (4) of the Act it appeared that the section would not be contravened unless the accused had held himself out as practising solely in the United Kingdom. But here the complainer had described himself in the documents libelled as practising both in Britain and abroad, and the complaint was therefore irrelevant. (4) The Sheriff-substitute was wrong in awarding expenses to the Institute. The Institute was prosecuting in the public interest and, therefore, could not get expenses, there being no provision in the Patents and Designs Act taking the case out of the ordinary rule.⁵

Argued for the respondents;—(1) As the statute did not exclude the Institute from prosecuting, it was entitled to prosecute if it had an interest to do so,⁶ and here it was plain that the Institute had an

 of a mandatary. (3) As the accused had held himself out as practising in Britain, and had no licence, he had contravened the Act. Lockwood v. Chartered Institute of Patent Agents.
 It was immaterial that he had held himself out as practising also in other countries. Accordingly the objection to the relevancy of the complaint could not be sustained. (4) Under section 52 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, it was within the power of the Sheriff-substitute to award expenses, and he had rightly exercised the power.

LORD DUNDAS.—This is a bill of suspension against a conviction following on a complaint at the instance of the Chartered Institute of Patent Agents in London, and Mr Graham, their secretary and registrar, with the consent of the Procurator-fiscal of Court. The appellant is charged that during certain months, which are specified, at a time when he was not registered as a patent agent in pursuance of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, he did describe himself as a patent agent. Then there are three letters libelled in which that is said to have been done; and that is all alleged to have been done contrary to the said Act, section 84. A conviction followed, and a fine was imposed, and now there is a bill of suspension.

Mr Paton for the suspender has stated several points which we must consider, but I have come to think that there is no real substance in any of them. It was urged that the Institute had no title, because no interest, to prosecute; and that this was really a prosecution which ought to have been instituted and conducted by the Procurator-fiscal as public prosecutor in the public interest. I do not think that is the case. I do not think this is a prosecution in the public interest in any proper sense. It is a prosecution by this Institute who have certain rights and interests which, I think, are certainly affected in this matter, and which they are entitled to protect. Their rights and interests, no doubt, may affect the well-being or interests of the public, but they are, none the less, the rights and interests of this association. It seems, from what we have heard, that this is really the sequel of a well-known litigation in this Court and in the House of Lords between the prosecutors on the one hand, and the appellant on the other hand, in time past, in which the present appellant was ultimately unsuccessful, and in which it was decided that the Institute were entitled to charge certain fees which he refused, and, as I understand, still refuses to pay. That matter of the fees we must take to have been settled by the ultimate tribunal of the land, and when one gets to fees one gets to money questions, and I think it is clear that the Institute have a sufficient interest to prosecute in this matter. If one supposes that the whole members of the Institute—everybody who is entered upon that register of which we have heard—were to complain of this matter, would they not have a title and an interest collectively? And if so, it is difficult to see why the Institute itself should not bring this prosecution. So much for the first point.

The second point, I think, was barely stateable. It simply was that the Institute, being an English company and domiciled in England, ought to have sisted a mandatary or found caution. But no such motion was made in the Court below, and there is nothing to suggest that, if it had been

Nov. 19, 1912. made, it might not have been acceded to by the Institute. I think there is nothing in that point.

Lockwood v.
Chartered Institute of Patent
Agents.

Lord Dundas.

The third point is based upon the alleged irrelevancy of the complaint. As I have said, the complaint is that, during a certain time, when he was not registered as a patent agent, Mr Lockwood described himself as a patent agent contrary to section 84. Mr Paton pointed out that the letters upon which the libel specially proceeds are headed, each and all of them, in print, with the words "British and Foreign—Joseph Lockwood, Patent, Design, and Trade Mark Agent," and he argued that that is sufficient to show that Mr Lockwood was not holding himself out as a patent agent within the meaning of section 84, because, by subsection 4 of that section, "patent agent" in this section is defined as meaning "exclusively an agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom." The contention was that if a man's practice is not confined exclusively to the United Kingdom, he is not liable to prosecution for describing himself as a patent agent. This will not do. The wording of the subsection is, I think, unfortunate, but I take its meaning to be that a man would not be within the section unless he was an agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom. If that reading of the subsection be right, as I think it is, this objection fails.

Lastly, there was a short question raised about expenses in the Court below. It was conceded that, if Mr Wilson was right in his contention upon the first point—that this was not truly a prosecution in the public interest—then this objection must fail. As I think Mr Wilson is right in that matter, this objection does fail.

I am therefore for refusing the bill of suspension.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. On the first question, Mr Paton made a very plausible case to start with. He pointed out that the Chartered Institute of Patent Agents—the prosecutors (through the agency of their secretary) here—are not named in the Act. He also pointed out that there is no express power to anybody in the Act to prosecute, not even the Board of Trade who are named. Then turning to the rules framed by the Board of Trade, in pursuance of the Act, he showed that, while the existence of the Chartered Institute is recognised and certain duties are assigned to them, they do not get any power to prosecute. The only power expressly given is in rule 5, where they are to have power to appoint a registrar who is to keep a register, and even in regard to that, he is to be subject not only to the Institute but also to the Board of Trade. But then they are not prevented from prosecuting; they are not limited to the duties imposed upon them by rule 5. And the question, therefore, comes to be, is there anything to prevent them from coming forward as private prosecutors for any interest they may have?

It is admitted that, if the only interest is that of the public, if there is no private interest, then you cannot have a private prosecution, the prosecution must be by the public prosecutor—the fiscal—who alone can bring a complaint. But, in this case, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the result of the statute and the rules is to create in the Chartered Institute an interest in connection with the register which they make and keep. It is not disputed that section 84 cannot be construed as based merely in the public interest, because, if the public interest alone had been Nov. 19, 1912.

 in view, you would have expected the section to prevent anyone from practising as a patent agent except under the restriction of the statute, but the Lockwood v.
 section does not do so, it merely prevents people who practise as patent agents the Chartered from advertising themselves in a particular way unless they are registered. Patent Institute of Agents.

I therefore concur in thinking that the interest of the Chartered Institute Lord Guthrie.
 is sufficient and is of a private nature, and, therefore, that they were entitled to bring the prosecution. And it is not disputed by the appellant here that they would be, in that case, entitled to prosecute.

On the question of caution and the question arising under section 84 (4), I concur with your Lordship.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The views your Lordships have expressed have my entire concurrence.

THE COURT refused the bill.

Statutory Offences—Motor car—Charge of driving “recklessly or negligently” Connell v.
 —Motor Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), sec. 1—Complaint—Relevance—General conviction on alternative charges. Mitchell.

The Motor Car Act, 1903, sec. 1, enacts that any person driving a “motor car on a public highway recklessly or negligently, or at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public,” shall be guilty of an offence under the Act. Schedule C to the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, contains the following form of complaint:—“You did drive a motor car recklessly (or negligently), and knock down and injure C. D., contrary to the Motor Car Act, 1903, sec. 1.”

The driver of a motor car was charged on a summary complaint with driving his car “recklessly or negligently,” whereby it collided with another car, contrary to the Motor Car Act, 1903, sec. 1. The accused was found “guilty as libelled.”

Held that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that, not being in the form provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, it contained alternative charges without adequate specification; and that a general conviction following on such charges was bad.

Observed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that while it is open to a prosecutor to select one or other of the wrongous ways of driving mentioned in the Motor Car Act, or to charge more than one of them cumulatively, he cannot insert them disjunctively in a complaint and charge the accused generally with driving in one or other of these wrongous ways.

Procedure—Objections—Noting of objections in the record—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 41.

Held that failure to note objections taken in the course of proceedings under a summary complaint, as provided for by sec. 41 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, vitiates the whole proceedings following on the complaint.

Question whether objections can be competently noted, not in the minutes of procedure, but by a reference in the minutes to a paper apart.

Nov. 20, 1912. JAMES G. CONNELL was charged in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton on a summary complaint at the instance of R. P. Mitchell, Procurator-fiscal. The charge in the complaint was that, on 27th August 1912, on a public highway between Helensburgh and Luss, "you did drive a motor car recklessly or negligently, whereby said car collided with another car then being driven on said highway by John Guthrie, motor car driver, Clyde Street, Helensburgh aforesaid, whereby the said car was damaged, and the occupants thereof, viz., Frederick Nolan Baker, Captain in the Royal Garrison Artillery, Port-Glasgow, and Charles Stewart Sinclair, dentist, Lorne House, Helensburgh, were injured in their persons; contrary to the Motor Car Act, 1903, section 1."*

Connell v.
Mitchell.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Guthrie.

The minutes of procedure in the case bore that on 3rd October 1912 "compeared the accused, and the complaint being read over to him, the agent for accused stated objections per paper apart. The Court repelled the objections, and accused pled not guilty, and evidence was led. . . . Eo die.—The Court found the accused guilty as libelled." The Sheriff-substitute (Macdiarmid) imposed a fine of £2.

Connell brought a bill of suspension in which he averred that his law-agent took objection to the relevancy and want of specification of the complaint; that the Sheriff-substitute repelled the objection; and that he was requested to note the objection. Connell also averred:—"By section 41 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908,† it is provided that any objection to the relevancy of the complaint is to be noted in the record, if either party desires it. The complainer's law-agent asked that the objection taken by him should be noted. This has not been done, as appears from the record itself. . . . The said complaint charges the complainer alternatively with having driven the car recklessly or negligently. No specification is given of the circumstances of the case. No indication is given of the nature of the recklessness or negligence. The complainer was greatly prejudiced in his defence, as he did not know the nature of the charge he had to meet. Further, the form of complaint did not follow the form set forth in Schedule C of the said Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908.‡ The complainer was charged with alternative offences. The Sheriff-substitute found the accused guilty as libelled. The conviction was accordingly bad."

Answers were lodged for the respondent in which he averred that the only objection taken to the complaint was that it was lacking in specification. He admitted that the record contained no note of objections, and averred, inter alia:—"At no time during the proceedings did the complainer's law-agent ask the Sheriff-substitute to note his objection to the want of specification. He did intimate that in the event of his client being convicted he might appeal by asking for a stated case; but although handed a form by the Sheriff-clerk for note of any objection he might desire to take and for return thereafter, he never returned said form."

* Quoted in the rubric.

† The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), enacts:—Sec. 41. " . . . In the event of any objections being stated to the competency or relevancy of the complaint or proceedings, or to the competency or admissibility of evidence, such objections shall, if either party desires it, be noted in the record."

‡ Quoted in the rubric.

The complainer pleaded;—The warrant and sentence in question ought to be suspended in respect (1) that the complaint was irrelevant and wanting in specification; (2) that the Sheriff-substitute failed to note the objection taken in the record; (3) that the complaint libelled alternative offences, and that the said warrant and sentence found the complainer guilty of the offence charged; (4) that there was no evidence justifying the same.

The case was heard on 20th November 1912. At the hearing the undernoted authorities were referred to.¹ No paper apart containing the accused's objections was produced.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a bill of suspension in which the complainer seeks to suspend a sentence imposed on him in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton for a contravention of section 1 of the Motor Car Act, 1903. The charge in the complaint is that "you did drive a motor car recklessly or negligently" on a highway near Helensburgh whereby the car collided with another car; and one of the objections pleaded in the bill of suspension is "that the complaint libelled alternative offences, and that the said warrant and sentence found the complainer guilty of the offence charged."

Now, it was urged on behalf of the respondent that the charge was not alternative, but really constituted one charge. I cannot accept that view. The section of the Motor Car Act on which the complaint is based provides:—"If any person drives a motor car on a public highway recklessly or negligently, or at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the nature, condition, and use of the highway, and to the amount of traffic which actually is at the time or which might reasonably be expected to be on the highway, that person shall be guilty of an offence under this Act." Now, if the words "recklessly" and "negligently" are not alternative, it would follow that the other words used in the section are also not alternative; and, therefore, if the argument of the respondent is sound it would be quite competent to charge a person with driving a car "recklessly or negligently, or at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public," and a general conviction following on such a charge would be good.

A number of cases were cited in which, it was said, an alternative charge had been held good, but these cases are all distinguishable from the

Nov. 20, 1912. present. In one of the cases, for example, the accused was charged with Connell v. loitering in a street "for the purpose of bookmaking or betting or wagering Mitchell. or agreeing to bet or wager," and this charge was held to be unobjectionable. But plainly there the Act said to be contravened—the Street Lord Justice- Betting Act, 1906—made it an offence to loiter for any or all of these Clerk. purposes, and if the prosecutor proved that the accused had loitered for any or all of these purposes, it did not matter which, then the accused was guilty of an offence under the Act. In the same way if a person is charged with trespassing in pursuit of game it is quite immaterial if the prosecutor inserts in the complaint a description of various kinds of game, such as deer, grouse, partridge, &c., because the gist of the offence is the trespassing, and the words are descriptive merely of the accused's purpose in trespassing.

But that cannot be said to be the case here. The accused was driving his car along a public highway. That is a perfectly lawful act; the accused was not, therefore, versans in illicito. All that the Motor Car Act provides is that if a person drives his car in one or other of certain ways he shall be guilty of an offence. It is quite clear to my mind, therefore, that while it is open to a prosecutor to select one or other of the wrongous ways of driving mentioned in the Act, or to charge more than one of them cumulatively if he thinks he can prove more than one, he cannot insert them disjunctively in a complaint and charge the accused generally with driving in one or other of these wrongous manners.

I should have reached this conclusion apart altogether from the Summary Jurisdiction Act; but that Act appears to me to put the matter beyond question. It gives certain forms of complaint, and the form dealing with offences against the Motor Act is this:—"You did drive a motor car recklessly (or negligently) and knock down and injure C D, contrary to the Motor Car Act, 1903, section 1." Now the brackets, and the "or" being in italics, clearly indicate that either the word "recklessly" or the word "negligently" may be used; and to say that it is permissible to delete the brackets and cancel the italics, and use the phrase "recklessly or negligently," appears to me to be an extravagant proposition.

This is enough for the decision of the case, but I should like to refer to another objection which is taken here. It appears that an objection to the complaint was stated in the Court below. Of this objection, however, there is no record in the minutes of procedure, and there is nothing to show what it was. All that appears in the minutes is that "the agent for the accused stated objections per paper apart." Whether it is sufficient to record an objection in a paper apart I need not pause to consider—it is certainly not a practice to be commended. But here there is no paper apart, and that in itself is a fatal blot in the procedure. It is a simple enough thing to record an objection, and if this is not done then the procedure is altogether vitiated. But it is unnecessary to proceed on this objection, because, as I have stated, the other point is enough. It is impossible to read the Act without seeing that the words "recklessly" or "negligently" are alternative, and a charge which uses them both is bad. Further, I may add, that a general conviction following on a charge so framed could not be sustained.

LORD DUNDAS.—I entirely agree. I think that each and every one of Nov. 20, 1912. the three grounds of suspension would afford a sufficient basis for quashing ^{Connell v.} this conviction. The first is that the complaint is irrelevant and wanting ^{Mitchell.} in specification. The complainer is charged with driving his car “recklessly or negligently.” That complaint is certainly not in the form prescribed by the Act of 1908; because it is clear that the form of the Schedule contemplates driving “recklessly” and driving “negligently” as two distinct offences, one or other of which may be libelled according to circumstances. I shall not attempt to follow the lucubrations of Mr Gillon as to the distinction which (it appears) may or may not exist between the two adverbs in what I suppose he would call “the subjective mentality of the perpetrator,” or elsewhere. I do not at all say that a prosecutor may not competently libel an alternative charge of this sort; but if he does, I think that he would have to give ample specification of what he meant by each of the alternative charges libelled. In that event, the libel would be altogether outside of the form provided in the Schedule to the Act of 1908. Even when the charge is made of “negligent” driving only, it was suggested by Lord Ardwall in the case of Dunn v. Mitchell,¹ and I agree with the suggestion, that prosecutors should consider whether they ought not to give some specification as to what they mean to charge the accused with. But however that may be, I am clear, with your Lordship, that the complaint as here framed will not do, either under the Act of 1908 or the Motor Car Act, 1903.

On the second point it is enough to say that it sufficiently appears from the minutes of procedure that an objection was stated for the accused, and that that objection is not noted as it ought to have been in terms of section 41 of the Act. What exactly the objection was I am not certain, but I gather that it was an objection founded on want of specification, probably identical with that on which we heard argument.

Lastly, as I consider the form of the charge to be truly alternative, as already said, it follows that the conviction, being a general one, must, in my opinion, fail.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. I think Mr MacRobert's objections are good objections, and that they have substance in them—the objection as to the form of the complaint, the objection as to the form of conviction, and the objection as to the failure to note at the proper time in the proper way the objection taken to the charge. Mr Gillon's argument was directed to show that there was no difference in law between recklessness and negligence. Whatever be the view in England the distinction is certainly well recognised in Scottish practice. But however that may be, it is not the question. The question is one arising on the terms of two statutes, the statute of 1903 and the statute of 1908, and I agree with what your Lordship has said as to the clear distinction contemplated in both these statutes between recklessness and negligence. I also think that the general conviction cannot stand.

THE COURT passed the bill and suspended the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter.

The charge in the complaint was that the accused on 17th May 1912 in the day time trespassed on part of the glebe of Cortachy in search or pursuit of game or rabbits, and that without leave of the complainer, contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, section 1.*

The accused having been convicted, appealed on a stated case.

The facts were set forth by the Sheriff-substitute (Lee) in the stated case as follows:—"For the facts I accepted the appellant's own statement, finding it proved that while walking along the public road between a wood belonging to his employer and the respondent's glebe, he saw a rabbit, chased by the respondent's dog from the said wood, cross the road; that as it crossed he took a snap shot with his gun at it; that the rabbit succeeded in crossing the road, entered the glebe, and having run for some distance over a grass field in the glebe, fell; and that he then sent his retriever dog into the glebe to recover the rabbit. It appeared that the appellant's employer had for many years been permitted by the respondent to shoot over the glebe, either by himself or by his servants, but that that privilege had in recent years been withdrawn by the respondent. I held that the practice of retrieving wounded game over the march, which was alleged to be universally recognised, depends, where it exists, partly on courtesy extended by one proprietor to another, and partly on the recognition of the inhumanity of abandoning a wounded animal, but not on any legal right, and that as the rabbit in question had entered the respondent's land alive, the appellant was guilty of a trespass in thereafter pursuing it. I accordingly convicted."

The question of law was:—"Whether I was right in holding that in the circumstances stated the appellant was guilty of a trespass under the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, section 1?"

The case was heard on 21st November 1912. At the hearing the undernoted authorities were referred to.¹

* The Game (Scotland) Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68), which was known before the date of the Short Titles Act, 1896, as the Day Trespass Act, 1832, enacts:—Sec. 1. "If any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering or being in the daytime upon any land without leave of the proprietor in search or pursuit of game or of . . . conies, such person shall, on being summarily convicted thereof," forfeit and pay a penalty.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think that this case presents any serious difficulty. It is true that the Sheriff is final upon the facts, but it is of the essence of an appeal by stated case that the Sheriff states the facts and this Court decides whether upon the facts which he has found proved the Sheriff's finding in law is right, in other words, whether the Sheriff could, upon the facts found, legally pronounce the decision he has given. Nov. 21, 1912.
Nicoll v.
Strachan.

I am satisfied that the Sheriff has made a mistake here. It is clear that the appellant had a perfect right to shoot ground game, and while it might not be quite in accordance with sporting practice and, indeed was, strictly speaking, illegal to shoot at game upon, or in the immediate vicinity of, a public road, he nevertheless was otherwise doing nothing which in my opinion could be characterised as illegal.

In this case the accused shot at and hit a rabbit upon the public road. It ran through the hedge and dropped apparently dead in the respondent's field. Seeing this, the accused sent his dog to retrieve the rabbit, which was showing no signs of life. I think we must assume that the animal was dead; but whether that be so or not, in my opinion it makes no difference to the decision of the case. It is sufficient that the animal was wounded and no longer able to make its escape.

I cannot accept the proposition that, when a man shoots an animal which goes a few yards into neighbouring ground and then appears to fall helpless, he becomes a trespasser if he crosses the march or sends his dog to pick up the game and it turns out to be alive. It has not been so held in the decisions. There is nothing of the nature of pursuit of game when one only crosses the march to pick up an animal or bird which is helpless and apparently dead. I do not leave out of consideration the sound dictum of Lord Adam,¹ that "a person may have a right to be on lands and yet if, after entering upon them, he proceeds to commit illegal acts, he may be convicted of being on the lands for an illegal purpose." For example, he may be upon the land for the purpose of scaring crows or shooting rabbits. If partridges or pheasants get up and he shoots at them he in that moment becomes an offender by pursuing game.

In this case we are dealing with something quite distinct from these offences which I have figured. The Sheriff does not suggest that the appellant went on the lands with any intention of pursuing game. He was merely seeking by means of his dog to take possession of an animal which was apparently dead or moribund. And, in my opinion, he was committing no offence in so doing.

I have come to this conclusion independently of decided cases but consideration of these confirms me in my view. I leave out of account the class of case referred to by Lord Adam. The offence with which the appellant was charged is, in the words of Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff,² "that of committing a trespass by entering or being, in the daytime, upon any land without leave of the proprietor in search or pursuit of game, or of

A man who is on the land looking for something he has shot does not commit a trespass in pursuit of game unless by overt act he shoots at or otherwise tries to capture game there. In this connection I should refer to two important statements which I find in the opinions of Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle and Lord Mackenzie in the case of *Donald v. Boddan*¹ which was cited to us. The Lord Justice-Clerk says (p. 310): "In prosecutions for acts strictly penal, we must look narrowly to the facts which are proved in support of the charge, and in doing so in this case, we can find no grounds for holding that the defender was shooting or hunting on Danevale Park. The hare was severely wounded. He saw it dodge across into some whin bushes, forty or fifty yards over the march, and his going first to the farmer's house for a dog, takes away the possibility of his having entered with intention to hunt or hawk." Lord Mackenzie adds: "The presumption here is that he believed the hare to be dead, and that he entered, not to chase, but to find." All these words, with the exception of what is said about the dog, apply with equal force to the present case. Accordingly, I think that we should answer the question in the case in the negative.

Nicoll v.
Strachan.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree with your Lordship. The question is whether on the facts found proved by the Sheriff-substitute the appellant was guilty of a trespass under the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, section 1. The case is not stated with perfect clearness, but I think we must take it that the rabbit was shot at upon the public road—I do not pause to consider whether it was a proper thing for the appellant to fire at ground game on a public road—that it entered the respondent's land and there fell dead or moribund and helpless; and that the appellant's dog retrieved it.

The Act of 1832 was passed to prevent "trespasses upon property by persons in pursuit of game"; and section 1 enacts that "if any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering or being, in the daytime, upon any land, without leave of the proprietor, in search or pursuit of game," he shall, upon summary conviction, be liable to the penalties provided by the Act. According to the fair meaning of the words quoted, I do not think that a man who picks up a rabbit, shot in the manner described, and lying dead or helpless within someone else's private ground, should be held guilty of a "trespass in search or pursuit of game." The cases of *Kenyon*² and Macdonald,³ to which we have been referred, seem to corroborate this view, if authority is wanted.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The case is not very satisfactorily stated. It is said that the rabbit entered the glebe and fell; it is not stated whether it was dead. It is also said that the dog was sent for the rabbit; but it does not appear from the case that the rabbit was retrieved. It is stated that the rabbit entered the respondent's ground alive, and it is difficult to see how it could have done so in any other condition. I think, however, we must take it that the rabbit was actually retrieved, after it had fled into ground where the appellant had no right to Nov. 21, 1912.

 go. Mr Normand admitted, I think, that he would have no case if the rabbit was actually dead when the dog was sent to retrieve it. In my ^{Nicoll v.} ~~Strachan.~~ opinion he must also fail if the rabbit was moribund or apparently dead. ^{Lord Guthrie.}
 We were referred to a passage in Mr Rankine's Law of Land Ownership from which it would appear, according to Mr Normand's contention, that it was an offence to pursue across the boundary game which was only wounded, though shot on the sportsman's own side of the march. It is clear, however, from the passage quoted to us and from the case cited by Mr Rankine in support of his statement,¹ that what is meant is that an offence is committed by pursuing game which is plainly only slightly wounded and not otherwise. Accordingly, on the facts as they have been stated to us, I agree with your Lordships that the question should be answered in the negative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

Statutory Offences—Tramways—Refusal to pay tramway fare—Glasgow Corporation Tramways Acts—Breach of bye-laws of Glasgow Corporation—Complaint—Relevancy—Statute.

M'Intyre v.
 M'Pherson.

The bye-laws and regulations made by the Town-Council of Glasgow in terms of their Tramways Acts contain the following provisions :—
 Bye-law No. 3 provides that every passenger shall pay his legal fare to the tramway conductor, but imposes no penalty for failure to do so. Bye-law No. 4 provides that any person evading or attempting to evade payment of his fare shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in these bye-laws. Bye-law No. 26 provides that any person committing a breach of the bye-laws shall be liable to a specified fine.

A complaint charging the accused with failing or refusing to pay a tramway fare contrary to bye-law No. 3 was dismissed as irrelevant by the magistrate, on the ground that no offence was constituted by that bye-law the only offence as to fares being evasion of payment under bye-law No. 4.

Held that bye-law No. 3, read, as it must be, along with bye-law No. 26, constituted an offence, and that the complaint was relevant.

KENNETH E. M'PHERSON was charged in the Central Police Court of Glasgow on a summary complaint at the instance of John J. M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal. The charge in the complaint was that the accused did on 20th April 1912, while a passenger in a Glasgow Corporation tramway car, "fail or refuse to pay upon demand to" the car conductor "the legal fare for the distance so travelled" by him, "as specified in the table of fares exhibited in said tramway car, contrary to the bye-laws and regulations made by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Glasgow, under the powers con-

M'Intyre v.
M'Pherson.

The Stipendiary Magistrate (Neilson) having dismissed the complaint as irrelevant, the complainer obtained a stated case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"In my opinion the terms of bye-law 3 are not operative for a prosecution except through bye-law 4. There is no offence of failing to pay a fare on demand. The only offence constituted is that of evading payment, or attempting to evade payment, for which accordingly it is necessary to libel bye-law 4. The express offence under bye-law 4 (c) is inconsistent with and supercedes a general offence under bye-law 3. Their co-existence would infer two different offences, one under bye-law 3 of failing to pay not amounting to evasion of payment, and the other under bye-law 4 of the offence of evading payment. Bye-law 4, in my opinion, governs and restricts bye-law 3.

"Two duties of a passenger are dealt with in bye-law 3; they are (first) to pay the fare upon demand, and (second) to accept a ticket. But under bye-law 4 (b) it is clear that failure to accept a ticket under bye-law 3 is not per se an offence, as the case is provided for and a remedy furnished under bye-law 4 (b). Similarly, in my view, bye-law 4 (c) makes it clear that failure to pay the fare under bye-law 3 is not per se an offence in view of the express provision of a penalty for evading payment. Moreover, the power to detain a passenger expressly conferred by bye-law 4 (c) arises only in the case of a passenger evading payment of his fare. The distinction involved

* These bye-laws and regulations provide, inter alia :—" (3) Every passenger shall, upon demand, pay to the conductor, or other duly authorised officer of the Corporation, the legal fare for the journey, as specified in the table of fares exhibited in the car, and a ticket corresponding thereto shall be delivered to such passenger by the conductor, and such passenger shall accept such ticket. . . . (4) (a) Every passenger shall show his ticket to any duly authorised officer of the Corporation when required by him so to do. (b) Any passenger failing or refusing to accept or to show his ticket as aforesaid shall be required to pay the fare from the place whence the car by which such passenger is conveyed started to the end of his journey, and in default of payment of such fare shall be liable to the penalty prescribed by these bye-laws. (c) Any person travelling, or having travelled in any car who evades or attempts to evade payment of his fare, or any person who, having paid his fare for a certain distance, knowingly proceeds in any such car beyond that distance without paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to evade payment thereof, shall be liable to the penalty prescribed by these bye-laws. And it shall be lawful for any officer or servant of the Corporation, and all persons called by him to his assistance, to seize and detain any such passenger whose name or residence is unknown to such officer or servant, until such passenger can be conveniently taken before a magistrate, or until he be otherwise discharged in due course of law. . . . (26) Any person offending against, or committing a breach of, these bye-laws and regulations, or any part thereof, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings, provided always that the Judge or Judges before whom any penalty is sought to be recovered may order the whole or part only of the same to be paid, or may remit the whole."

is more than a technicality, and is of public concern. Temporary inability to pay a fare on demand is an occasional accident of common life when there is no desire whatever to evade payment. The bye-laws as I read them recognise this, and reserve penal consequences for cases of mens rea.

Nov. 21, 1912.

M'Intyre v.
M'Pherson.

"Holding that bye-law 4, both as regards the taking of a ticket and the payment of the fare, is the only provision applicable in a prosecution, and excludes proceedings solely libelled under bye-law 3, I dismissed the charge as irrelevant.

"The objection to want of specification of the amount of the fare I did not think necessary to consider."

The questions of law were :—" (1) Was the complaint relevant ? (2) Was the specification as regards the fare sufficient ? "

The appeal was heard on 21st November 1912. At the hearing the respondent did not appear.

LORD DUNDAS.—This is an appeal by way of stated case against a deliverance of the Stipendiary Magistrate in Glasgow, by which he found a certain complaint irrelevant, and dismissed it. The complaint that is brought against Mr M'Pherson is that, while a passenger in a Glasgow tramway car, he failed or refused to pay upon demand to the conductor of the car the legal fare for the distance travelled by him ; and that is said to have been in contravention of the bye-laws and regulations made by the Magistrates of Glasgow under their statutory powers, and particularly of bye-law 3. The bye-laws are produced, and we have them before us.

I think the result arrived at was wrong. The learned Stipendiary states that in his opinion the terms of bye-law 3 are not operative for a prosecution except through bye-law 4 ; and that there is no offence of failing to pay a fare on demand. I differ from the Magistrate. I think that bye-law 3 does constitute an offence if read along with bye-law 26, as, in my judgment, it must be. The scheme of the bye-laws, as it seems to me, is not to fence each bye-law as it is mentioned with the sanction of a penalty expressly and severally, but to group all the offences together under clause 26, with one common clause of penalty applicable to all. In bye-law 3 we read that every passenger shall, upon demand, pay to the conductor the legal fare. It is quite true that that bye-law by itself does not contain any sanction by way of penalty ; but when we come to bye-law 26 we find that any person offending against, or committing a breach of, these bye-laws and regulations, or any part thereof, shall be liable to a penalty. Certainly bye-law 3 is part of the bye-laws and regulations.

The Magistrate goes on to say that the only offence constituted is that of evading payment, or attempting to evade payment, for which accordingly it is necessary to libel bye-law 4. As I have already said, I do not agree with that, because I think there is a separate offence constituted by bye-law 3. The Magistrate proceeds to say that the co-existence of the two bye-laws would infer two different offences, one under bye-law 3 of failing to pay, not amounting to evasion of payment, and the other under bye-law 4 of the offence of evading payment. I think there are two offences, and I think they are quite distinct, the one, that which is struck at by bye-law 3, is refusal to pay on demand, and the other in bye-law 4 is evasion of payment, which seems to me to be quite a different thing, and which

Nov. 21, 1912. might be practised or attempted in a variety of manners, which it is unnecessary to specify but which might easily be conjectured. One can imagine, for example, that a person might stand upon the car, and delay making payment of his fare, and then might slip off the car, or attempt to do so, and thus evade, or attempt to evade, payment. That might be done although there had not been a demand. The two things are quite distinct the one from the other.

M'Intyre v.
M'Pherson.
Lord Dundas.

The Magistrate goes on to say that temporary inability to pay a fare on demand is an occasional accident of common life when there is no desire whatever to evade payment. That, I take it, may be true enough. But then he says: "The bye-laws, as I read them, recognise this, and reserve penal consequences for cases of mens rea." I think there is a non sequitur about that. It seems to me that, if there were a bona fide case of temporary inability to pay from some accidental cause, it is almost inconceivable that a prosecution would be brought at all. One cannot but suppose that the authorities would have too much sense to bring it, but if it were brought, I think one could rely on the good sense of the Glasgow Magistrates to throw the case out. It seems to me that the existence of mens rea is implied in bye-law 3 as in the other bye-laws. On the other hand, the result of the Stipendiary's decision would be, it appears to me, to read bye-law 3 out of the bye-laws altogether. I think that would be a misfortune, because it seems to be a useful enough and reasonable enough bye-law in itself. When one looks at the bye-laws as a whole, I think one can see that the basis of the decision of the Court below is wrong, because, as I have pointed out, there are a number of offences which have not specially attached to each of them the sanction of a penalty, and which, unless they can be read along with section 26, would be rendered futile, and might as well be struck out. Mr Mackenzie went through a number of them, but one may just instance by way of example bye-laws 2, 7, 11, and 14, to go no further. I think that way of putting the matter amounts almost to a reductio ad absurdum of the decision against which this appeal is taken. I am, therefore, for answering the first question in the affirmative.

With regard to the second question, I do not propose to say much. The objection to the specification of the complaint consisted in this, that while the respondent is charged with failing to pay his legal fare for the distance travelled by him as specified in the table of fares exhibited in the tramway car, the complaint does not specifically inform him of the amount of the fare—whether a penny or a halfpenny, or any other sum. The Stipendiary did not think it necessary to consider that point, and, of course, he had no need to do so because he thought the complaint was otherwise bad. I do not think it is the least necessary for us to consider it very closely or in detail; but, so far as I see, it is not a sufficient ground for holding this complaint irrelevant. I think, therefore, we may answer the second question also in the affirmative.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The Stipendiary, in one part of his statement, seems to put the matter as if, in addition to libelling bye-law 3, bye-law 4 should have been libelled. But I think that what he means is rather that, if there is an offence at all, it only arises under bye-law 4. The Stipendiary does not found on bye-law 26, but it is clear that Nov. 21, 1912. he cannot have ignored it altogether, because bye-law 4, subsection (c), to M'Intyre v. which he refers, leads necessarily to bye-law 26. It says that the offender M'Pherson. shall be liable to the penalty prescribed by these bye-laws; and it names Lord Guthrie. no special penalties, but throws you at once on bye-law 26.

The bye-laws are curiously framed. In bye-laws 4, 9, 17, 18, and 21 special penalties are prescribed, but it does not therefore follow that, where by other bye-laws a duty is put upon the passenger which he is bound to fulfil, they are not meant to be read along with bye-law 26. Bye-law 3 puts two duties on the passenger, first, to pay the fare, and, second, to accept a ticket. If the passenger does not perform these duties he offends against the bye-law, and bye-law 26 says that in that case he shall be liable to a particular penalty. I therefore agree that the Stipendiary, who seems to have been very properly anxious that this passenger, who had no legal advice, should not be prejudiced thereby, has been misled by a supposed difficulty, which, if the bye-laws be properly read, is no difficulty at all. On the matter of the specification, I concur.

Lord Justice-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is impossible to look at these bye-laws without seeing that bye-law 26 is intended to apply to a number of cases which are given in the previous bye-laws, and I am unable to conceive any reason why it should not apply to bye-law 3, in which the duty is imposed upon a passenger of paying his fare and accepting a ticket. It is the obvious duty of every person riding in a public carriage to pay the fare and to accept a ticket, which is necessary for the purpose of inspection. I have not the slightest doubt that bye-law 26 does apply.

The only thing which might lead one to a contrary opinion is that in certain of the bye-laws reference is expressly made to penalties prescribed by the bye-laws. For example, in bye-law 21 it is said the offender "shall be liable to the penalty hereinafter provided." But then that bye-law does not refer to people on a tramcar; it relates only to the orderly conduct of street traffic, the driver of a tramcar being entitled to order everybody out of the way of his car under penalty of punishment. Tramway traffic could not be carried on in any other way. Then in others of the bye-laws it is assumed that a breach of them is punishable under bye-law 26. For example, bye-law 16 provides that a person swearing or using obscene or offensive language "shall, in addition to incurring the penalty hereinafter provided, forfeit his fare, and be summarily removed from the car." And in bye-law 17 it is provided that any person who shall do any damage to a car "shall, in addition to the penalty prescribed by these bye-laws and regulations, be liable to pay the amount of damage done in consequence." It seems to me very plain that it is a necessary implication from these two bye-laws that in every case where a breach of a bye-law is committed a penalty is exigible in respect of the breach, whereas in these two particular cases you have not only the penalty to be exacted, but other penalties as well—in one case the forfeiture of the fare and removal from the car, and in the other liability to pay damage.

I agree with your Lordships that the Stipendiary Magistrate has erred

Nov. 21, 1912. in holding, as he does, that there is no offence in bye-law 3 without going to bye-law 4 (c). As regards the other matter, it is unnecessary to say anything further than what your Lordships have said already.

M'Intyre v.

Tighe v.
Wilson.

Statutory Offences—Revenue—Obstructing Revenue Officer—Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 11—Complaint—Relevancy—Specification of statutes.

The Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890, sec. 11, imposes a penalty on any person who obstructs an officer "employed in relation to Inland Revenue in the execution of his duty or of any of the powers or authorities by law given to the officer."

The Regulations made by the Commissioners of Custom and Excise under sec. 84 (6) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, apply to motor spirit the provisions of sec. 112 of the Spirits Act, 1880, under which every dealer in spirits is bound to keep a stock-book open to inspection by any officer of excise.

A licensed dealer in motor spirit was charged under a summary complaint which set forth that the accused did, contrary to the Inland Revenue Act, 1890, sec. 11, obstruct an officer of customs and excise in the execution of his duty by refusing to show him the motor spirit stock-book kept by the accused. The Sheriff-substitute having dismissed the complaint as irrelevant in respect that the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and relative regulations were not libelled—

Held that it was unnecessary to libel these; and that, as the section creating the offence and the manner in which the offence had been committed were set forth, the complaint was relevant.

HIGH COURT. JAMES HAY WILSON, licensed dealer in motor spirit, Glasgow, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow on a summary complaint at the instance of Benjamin Tighe, officer of customs and excise at Glasgow. The charge against the accused was "that on 12th June 1912, in your premises at 6 Nithsdale Street aforesaid, you did obstruct, molest, and hinder William Meldrum Smith, 8 Abbotsford Place, Glasgow, he being an officer of customs and excise, and a person employed in relation to the revenue of the United Kingdom, imposed as duties of excise, in the execution of his duty, by pushing him from near the counter towards the door of the premises, and by refusing to allow him to inspect the motor spirit stock-book kept by you, contrary to the Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890, section 11."

The Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) having dismissed the complaint, the complainer appealed on a stated case. The case set forth that, objections to the relevancy of the complaint having been stated and repelled, the accused pleaded not guilty, and that evidence was led. The case also stated:—"The first witness for the prosecution was the said William Meldrum Smith, and he deponed that the obligation to keep a motor spirit stock-book was contained in the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and the Regulations, dated 29th July 1910, made by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise under section 84 (6) of the said Act, which Regulations incorporated the 112th and 113th sections of the Spirits Act, 1880, and made them applicable to motor spirit.* He produced the said Regulations, a form of notice relative to motor spirit (a copy of which notice he deponed had been sent to the respondent), and a duplicate of the motor spirit dealer's licence issued to the respondent.

Tighe v. Wilson.

"After hearing this witness, I held that the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and relative Regulations should have been libelled, and dismissed the complaint in respect that, as framed, it did not constitute a contravention of the Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890, section 11."

The question of law was:—"Is the complaint relevant without specification of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and Regulations above referred to?"

The appeal was heard on 22nd November 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint was relevant. Under section 19 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, it was sufficient to set forth the offence in the words of the statute contravened; but the prosecutor here had done more for he had given the particulars desiderated in Renton v. Ramage.¹ The offence charged was obstruction of the officer in the discharge of his duty. That offence was created by the statute libelled; and the regulations and statutes which the Sheriff-substitute held should have been libelled were not essential to the charge.

Argued for the respondent;—But for the Act of 1910 and relative regulations the respondent's conduct could not be a contravention of the 1880 Act. The 1910 Act and relative regulations were, therefore, essential to the charge. There was no obstruction of the officer unless the respondent was under a duty to exhibit his stock-book,

* The Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 21), enacts:—Sec. 11. "If any person by himself or by any person in his employ obstructs, molests, or hinders—(a) an officer or any person employed in relation to inland revenue in the execution of his duty, or of any of the powers or authorities by law given to the officer or person; or (b) any person acting in the aid of an officer or any person so employed; he shall for every such offence incur a fine of one hundred pounds."

The Spirits Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 24), enacts:—

Sec. 112. "(1) Every rectifier, dealer, and retailer must provide himself with and keep a stock book according to a pattern to be obtained on application to the proper officer, and must, on receiving any spirits, and also on sending out or delivering any spirits required to be accompanied by a certificate, enter in his stock book the particulars specified in that behalf in the Fourth Schedule. . . . (3) He must keep the stock book in his premises, open to inspection by any officer, and must allow any officer to make any entry therein or take any extract therefrom."

Sec. 113. "If a rectifier, dealer, or retailer (a) fails to obtain, provide, keep, produce, or return a certificate book or a stock book as by this Act required . . . or (b) hinders or obstructs any officer in examining a certificate book or a stock book . . . he shall for each offence incur a fine of one hundred pounds."

This section is made applicable to motor spirit by Regulations, dated 29th July 1910, made by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise under sec 84 (6) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. cap. 8).

Nov. 22, 1912. and the proper mode of charging the respondent would have been to libel that he had refused to show a book which he was bound to keep and produce in terms of a specified statute or regulation. The case of *Macrorie v. Bird*¹ was precisely in point.

Tighe v.
Wilson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case at first sight presented a certain amount of complication, but I have come, and I think your Lordships have come, to the conclusion that it is much simpler than it appeared to be. In the Inland Revenue Regulation Act of 1890 it is made an offence to “obstruct, hinder, or molest” an officer of the revenue engaged in the execution of his duty, and if that is done a penalty is incurred.

Now, where a charge is made that A B, being an officer of the Customs and Revenue Department, was on a particular occasion, contrary to the Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890, section 11, obstructed or hindered or molested in the execution of his duty, then, if it is stated what that duty was, I think the prosecutor has done all that is required of him. I take it that that clause of the statute of 1890 must apply, not merely to the officer’s duties under the law as it stood at that date, but that it necessarily applies to such further duties as may subsequently be laid on him. The duties vary from time to time; some may be cancelled and others may be added; but if it is alleged by the prosecutor that an officer was engaged in the execution of his duty in doing an act which is specified and which is undoubtedly within his duties, then nothing more is required. I cannot see that it is necessary to do more than state what the act done was, and thereafter to add that the officer was obstructed in the execution of that act contrary to the Inland Revenue Regulation Act of 1890, section 11. The prosecutor is bound—not indeed necessarily at the first stage of the case, though he could do it quite well then, and it is the essence of the case he has got to prove—to state that what the accused is charged with is contrary to some specified Act and section. Well the prosecutor has done that here. He has set forth that the accused has committed a breach of an Act, and he states that in the very words of the Act, and, according to the recent Act of Parliament, that of itself would have been in the ordinary case quite sufficient. But here, most properly and almost necessarily, something more was set forth, because, of course, in the case of the obstruction of an officer of revenue in the execution of his duty, as in the case of a police officer in the execution of his duty, it is only fair to the accused to state how he obstructed the officer.

In this particular case the prosecutor gives the accused distinct intimation that it was by pushing the officer—which is, of course, obstructing him—and by refusing to allow him to examine a motor spirit book which he, as an officer of revenue, was entitled to examine. The accused was a person who had a licence to sell motor spirit, and if he had a licence to sell motor spirit, surely he must have known the conditions on which his licence rested. He gets the notice that he was obstructing by refusing to allow his motor spirit book to be inspected. That is quite a sufficient intimation to him of what he is charged with to entitle the prosecutor to ask for the penalty. Of course, if at the trial he can come forward and say that he never was a dealer in motor spirit, that he never took out a licence Nov. 22, 1912. which subjected him to the rules and regulations made under the Act of Parliament requiring him to keep such a book, then he would be acquitted on the merits. But I cannot see how it could be said that what he is charged with here is a breach of the regulations. The regulations required him to do certain things and to refrain from certain other things. But the accused did not commit any breach of the regulations as regards his motor spirit book, either by not producing it or by not keeping it in order, or so on. He may have kept his book in perfect order. He may have been in every respect free from blame regarding anything he was doing or had done. All that may well be; for the charge is not that the regulations were infringed, but that the Act of 1890 was contravened. Notice is clearly given that it is a contravention of the Act of 1890 that is charged. It seems to me that that is perfectly sufficient, and that we must hold here that the Sheriff erred in disposing of the case as he did.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. I agree in thinking that the complexity of this matter is more apparent than real. The charge is really one of obstructing an officer in the execution of his duty. The words of section 11 of the Act of 1890 are echoed, and the penalty imposed by that section is sought to be recovered. I see no need for more in the complaint. We have nothing here to do with the Finance Act of 1910 or the regulations made under it. Motor spirit is only introduced into the complaint in connection with the description of a book which it is alleged the officer was obstructed from examining or inspecting. That seems to me to end the matter. I should only like to add, since the case of *Macrorie*¹ has been so much commented upon, that I have no wish to alter or modify anything that I there said; but the present case is obviously different; and Macrorie's case¹ can be useful here only by way of contrast. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the question ought to be answered in the affirmative.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. I think the ground stated by your Lordships is sufficient, namely, that the Finance Act of 1910 and the regulations under it, which it is said should have been libelled as well as the Act, are not in question. The case of Macrorie,¹ to which we were referred, does not apply. There were two essential points there:—first, the section which had been libelled was limited to carriages as defined by the Act of 1869, and excluded the idea of motor cars altogether; and secondly, as Lord Dundas said in his judgment, “the sole section libelled, namely, section 22 of the Revenue Act of 1869, neither creates an offence nor imposes any penalty therefor.” It is clear that neither of these points arises in this case.

WILLIAM HOUSTON ROGER, Appellant.—Horne, K.C.—Fenton.

Nov. 23, 1912.

JAMES POLLOCK STEVENSON (Procurator-Fiscal, Kilmarnock).—

*Sol.-Gen. Anderson—Gillon, A.-D.*Roger v.
Stevenson.

Statutory Offences—Coal mine—Maximum period of consecutive underground employment—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 57), section 1 (1) (2) and (7)—Workmen working in shifts—Applicability of provisions to firemen.

The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, enacts, sec. 1, subsec. 1, that a workman shall not be below ground for more than eight hours during any consecutive twenty-four; subsec. 2, that there is no contravention of this provision in the case of a workman working in a shift, if the period between the times at which the last workman in the shift leaves the surface and the first workman in the shift returns to the surface does not exceed eight hours; subsec. 7, proviso (a) that in the case of a fireman the maximum period for which he may be below ground is nine hours and a half.

Held that the provisions of sec. 1, subsecs. 1 and 2, apply to firemen (with the modification that in their case nine and a half hours is to be substituted in each subsection for eight hours); and accordingly, that there had been no contravention of the Act in the case of two firemen, members of a shift, who had been underground for more than fifteen hours, in respect that less than nine and a half hours had elapsed between the time when the last member of the shift left the surface and the first member returned thereto.

Observed that the question whether men are working in shifts or not is a question of fact for the Judge who tries the case, and is to be determined on a strict view of the definition of a shift contained in sec. 1 of the Act.

HIGH COURT. ON 3rd January 1912 William Houston Roger, manager of the Lord Justice-General. Montgomeryfield Colliery, Ayrshire, was charged in the Sheriff Court Lord Kinneir. at Kilmarnock on a complaint at the instance of James Pollock Lord Mackenzie. Stevenson, Procurator-fiscal, with the concurrence of the Home Secretary, which set forth that being the manager of the mine, he "did on . . . (2) 24th October . . . (5) on 3rd November all in the year 1911, fail to cause a register to be kept at said colliery, being a mine within the meaning of the Act first hereinafter mentioned, in the form prescribed by the Secretary of State, containing the particulars prescribed by him, made and certified by the owner, agent, manager, or under manager of the said mine, with respect to the cases in which the persons named in column 1 of the schedule hereto annexed, all workmen employed in the said mine, were below ground therein for the purpose of their work, and of going to and from their work, during the period specified in column 2 of said schedule, and the cause thereof, contrary to the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, section 2 (1)." *

* The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 57), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "(1) . . . A workman shall not be below ground in a mine for the purpose of his work, and of going to and from his work, for more than eight hours during any consecutive twenty-four hours. (2) No contravention of the foregoing provisions shall be deemed to take place in the case of a workman working in a shift if the period between the times at which the last workman in the shift leaves the surface and the first work-

Roger v.
Stevenson

On 26th January 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (D. J. Mackenzie) found the accused guilty as libelled, so far as regarded the second and fifth charges, and sentenced him to a fine of £1, being 10s. for each contravention, and in default of payment to ten days' imprisonment.

The accused obtained a stated case for appeal, which set forth :—

"The following facts were found proved :—(Second Charge).—(1) That on 24th October 1911, a miner named Allan M'Murtrie was below ground for the time specified in the schedule to the complaint, namely, from 6.5 A.M. till 3.25 P.M.; that the same applies to the other three miners mentioned, namely, Jones, Hunter, and Matthews. . . . (3) That on 13th November 1911 Mr Masterton, Inspector of Mines, visited the said colliery and inspected the said register at which time no cause was entered in the register for these miners being below ground for the period specified. (Fifth Charge).—(4) That the men Clemenson and Scollick, both firemen mentioned in the schedule to the complaint under the 5th charge, on 3rd November 1911, left the surface not later than 4.15 A.M. and returned to the surface at 7.30 P.M., and were thus below ground for the period of 15½ hours, and that the cause of the detention of said men below ground for that man in the shift returns to the surface does not exceed eight hours . . .

(7) For the purposes of this Act the expression 'workman' means any person employed in a mine below ground, who is not an official of the mine (other than a fireman, examiner, or deputy), . . . and any number of workmen whose hours for beginning and terminating work in the mine are approximately the same shall be deemed to be a shift of workmen. Provided that—(a) In the case of a fireman . . . the maximum period for which he may be below ground under this Act shall be nine hours and a half; . . .

Sec. 2. "(1) The owner, agent, or manager of every mine . . . shall cause a register to be kept in the form prescribed by the Secretary of State, and containing the particulars prescribed by him with respect to the times at which men are lowered into and raised from the mine, and the cases in which any man is below ground for more than the time fixed by this Act, and the cause thereof, and the register shall be open to inspection by the inspector."

Nov. 23, 1912. period was not entered in the register at the date of the inspector's visit. (5) That on 24th October 1911 the men worked in a shift, the last man of which shift left the surface at 6.5 A.M. and the first man recorded as having returned to the surface did so at 8.30 A.M."

Roger v.
Stevenson.

The register kept under the Act at the pit was produced, and the parties were at variance as to whether it did or did not show that the firemen mentioned in the fifth charge were working in a shift.

The following question of law was put for the decision of the Court:—" (2) Whether the men mentioned in charges (2) and (5) should be held to have been below ground for more than the time fixed by the Act of 1908, so as to render it necessary that the cause of their being so should have been entered in the register in accordance with clause 2 (1) of the Act?"

The appeal was heard on 21st June 1912, when the Solicitor-General intimated that he could not support the conviction on the second charge, seeing that the workmen there mentioned were working in a shift, and that less than eight hours had elapsed between the last man leaving, and the first man returning to, the surface. The argument therefore was confined to the fifth charge.

Argued for the appellant;—It must be taken that the men in question were working in a shift, though there was no definite finding of the Sheriff-substitute to that effect. This was the reasonable inference from the register, and there was no finding by the Sheriff-substitute that they were not so working. The effect of section 1 (7) was to extend the maximum of hours allowed below ground, in the case of firemen, to nine and a half hours, and in their case, therefore, "nine and a half hours" must be read for "eight hours" in section 1 (1) and (2). In the present case it appeared from the register that the times of the completion of lowering and the commencement of raising of this shift were 4.15 A.M. and 1.5 P.M. respectively, the interval between these times being eight hours and fifty minutes. There was, therefore, no contravention of section 1, and the conviction should be quashed.

Argued for the respondent;—Under section 1 (7) firemen were in a class by themselves, and in no case, save that of life-saving, might they be detained below ground for longer than nine and a half hours. The provisions of section 1 (1) and (2) did not apply to firemen. They did not, as matter of fact, work in shifts, nor was there any finding in the case that they were so doing. The Sheriff was entitled to consider all evidence on this point, not only that of the register. Had it been proved to him that these men were working in a shift, he would have made a statement to that effect in the case, as he had done with regard to the miners mentioned in the second charge.

The Court remitted back to the Sheriff-substitute to find whether the two firemen in respect of whom the conviction was obtained on the fifth charge were working in a shift.

The Sheriff-substitute reported that the men in question were "members of a shift in the sense of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908." The register showed that the last member of the shift left the surface at 4.15 A.M. and the first returned at 1.5 P.M.

The appeal was further heard on 13th July, when the Court quashed the conviction and intimated that the opinions of the Judges would be delivered at a later date.

On 23rd November 1912 the opinion of the Court (consisting of the Lord Justice-General, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Mackenzie) was Nov. 23, 1912 delivered by Roger v.

Stevenson.

LORD MACKENZIE.—[After referring to section 2 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908]—This is a prosecution for a contravention of this subsection, the charge against the appellant, who is manager of the Montgomeryfield Colliery, being that there were on certain specified dates "workmen" employed in the mine who were below ground for more than the time fixed by the Act, and that no cause was entered in the register at the date of the inspector's visit for these miners being below ground for the periods specified. The Sheriff-substitute has found the appellant guilty of a contravention of the subsection in respect of charges two and five, the other charges being held not proven. The Act provides—[His Lordship quoted section 1 (1) and (2), and, with regard to the second charge, stated that, in view of the fact that less than eight hours had elapsed between the last member of the shift leaving the surface and the first member returning thereto, it was impossible to hold that the miners had been below ground for more than the time fixed by the Act].

The fifth charge deals with two firemen. On 3rd November 1911 they left the surface not later than 4.15 A.M., and returned to the surface at 7.30 P.M. They were thus below ground for fifteen and a quarter hours, and the Sheriff-substitute has found that the cause of the detention of these men below ground for that period was not entered in the register at the date of the inspector's visit.

Now section 1 (7) provides that the expression "workman" means "any person employed in a mine below ground, who is not an official of the mine (other than a fireman, examiner, or deputy), or a mechanic or horse-keeper, or a person engaged solely in surveying or measuring"; provided that "(a) in the case of a fireman . . . the maximum period for which he may be below ground under this Act shall be nine hours and a half." The effect of this subsection is that a fireman is a "workman" for the purposes of the Act. The provisions of section 1 (1) and (2) therefore apply to him, with the modification that nine and a half hours is to be read into these subsections when they are to be applied to the case of a fireman, instead of eight hours which is the period applicable to the ordinary workman. Accordingly, if firemen are working in a shift, then if the period between the times at which the last fireman leaves the surface and the first fireman returns to the surface does not exceed nine and a half hours, then there is no contravention of section 1 (1). The difficulty felt at the first hearing of this appeal was as to whether the two firemen in question were members of a shift or not. We now have the report from the Sheriff-substitute that they were members of a shift in the sense of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, and with reference to column 1 of the excerpt from the register which is headed, "name or description of shift and number going into the mine." It appears from the register that the number of firemen composing this shift was four; that the last fireman in the shift left the surface at 4.15 A.M., and that the first fireman in the shift to return to the surface did so at 1.5 P.M. The period between these is only eight hours and fifty minutes. The firemen in question were thus not below

Nov. 23, 1912. ground for more than the time fixed by the Act, and the conviction must be quashed.

Roger v.
Stevenson.

Lord Mackenzie.

It should be pointed out that the question whether these firemen were working in a shift or not is a question of fact for the Judge who tries the case, and in arriving at a conclusion on this point he must be guided by the provisions of section 1 (7), which enacts, "any number of workmen whose hours for beginning and terminating work in the mine are approximately the same shall be deemed to be a shift of workmen." It is obvious that unless a strict view is taken of the words "whose hours for beginning and terminating work in the mine are approximately the same," the Act may be made a dead letter, for by indefinitely prolonging the time of lowering the members of a shift, the time when the last workman leaves the surface and the first workman returns might never exceed eight hours.

THE COURT answered the second question in law in the negative, sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

THE SUMMERLEE IRON COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—

Macmillan, K.C.—Strain.

Dec. 21, 1912.

WILLIAM THOMSON (Procurator-Fiscal, Hamilton), Respondent.—

Sol.-Gen. Anderson—R. C. Henderson.

Summerlee
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Thomson.

Statutory Offences—Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 37), secs. 2, 3, and 23—Contract as to manner in which wages are to be "laid out or expended"—Payment of wages in coin—Deduction for rent—Contract authorising retention of wages for sums to become due for occupation of house after right of occupation ceases—Master and Servant.

The Truck Act, 1831, section 2, makes illegal any contract between an artificer and his employer containing provisions made directly or indirectly respecting "the manner in which" the artificer's wages "shall be laid out or expended." Section 3 enacts that "the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer" shall be actually paid "in the current coin of this realm, and not otherwise," and every payment in respect of wages "by the delivering to him of goods or otherwise than in the current coin aforesaid except as hereinafter mentioned," is declared illegal. Section 23 provides that nothing in the Act shall extend to prevent any employer "from making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction" from the wages of any artificer for the rent of any house demised to the artificer by the employer.

A company let to its employees houses for the period of their employment with the company. At each fortnightly pay-day the employees signed receipts for their wages, which contained a clause authorising the deduction of their house rent from their future wages, and also this clause:—"In the event of my leaving your employment I authorise you to retain whatever moneys are in your hands until I remove from your house."

On 1st March 1912 the employees left the employment owing to a strike, and from the wages payable on that day the company, in virtue of the authority granted in the receipts signed on the preceding pay-day (16th February), withheld in the case of each employee a sum as against what might thereafter become due for the occupation of his Dec. 21, 1912. house.

Held that the contract of 16th February, and the retention of part of the wages on 1st March, were both illegal, in respect (1) (following Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Limited, [1906] A. C. 136) that they were in contravention respectively of sections 2 and 3 of the Truck Act; and (2) (following M. Farlane v. Birrell, (1888) 16 R. (J.) 28, 2 White, 126) that they did not fall within the exception in section 23, seeing that, the tenancies having determined with the employment, any sums due after 1st March were not rent, but damages for illegal occupation.

THE SUMMERLEE IRON COMPANY, LIMITED, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton on a summary complaint at the instance of William Thomson, procurator-fiscal. The charge against the Company was:—"That on or about 16th February 1912, at the colliery office at your No. 3 Pit, Orbiston Colliery, otherwise known as Bells-hill Colliery, situated at Bellshill, in the parish of Bothwell, you did contract with each of John Balmer senior, miner, residing at 10 New Orbiston Rows, Thomas Dorans senior, oncostman, residing at 19 New Orbiston Rows, and Charles Greer, miner, residing at 5 New Orbiston Rows, all at Crossgates, Bellshill, aforesaid, and working the said John Balmer senior and Thomas Dorans senior at your said pit, and the said Charles Greer at your Old Orbiston Pit, Bellshill, during the fortnight ending 24th February 1912, that you should be entitled, in the event of their severally leaving your employment, to retain whatever moneys were then in your hands until they severally removed from the houses respectively occupied by them and belonging to you, and that for rent of, and obligations connected with and arising out of their occupation of, said houses for the period subsequent to their leaving your employment, and on 1st and 2nd March 1912, at your said colliery office, you did contract with each of the said John Balmer senior, Thomas Dorans senior, and Charles Greer that you should stop and deduct, and did stop and deduct, from the wages due on said 1st March 1912 to each of them for their work in your employment at your said pits as aforesaid during the fortnight ended on said 24th February 1912 the sum of £1 for rent and other obligations connected with and arising out of their occupation severally of said houses for the period subsequent to 29th February 1912, when they severally ceased to be employed by you, and did fail to pay in the current coin of the realm to each of them the entire amount of the wages earned by and then payable to them severally in respect of the labour done by them respectively at said pits during the fortnight ended on said 24th February 1912, all contrary to the Truck Act, 1831, sections 2 and 3, whereby you are liable to the penalties applicable to a first offence set forth in section 9 of said Act."*

Dec. 21, 1912.

Summerlee
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Thomson.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hay Shennan), after a proof, found the charge of contracting on 1st and 2nd March 1912 to stop and deduct from the wages then due not proven, and quoad ultra found the Company guilty as libelled, and imposed a fine of £3.

The Company appealed on a stated case. The case set forth :—

“The following facts were proved :—During the month of February 1912 John Balmer senior and Thomas Dorans were employed by the appellants as miner and oncostman respectively in their No. 3 Pit, Orbiston Colliery, and Charles Greer was employed by them as a miner at their Old Orbiston Pit.

“Each of them lived in a house which was the property of the Company, and they were bound to leave the houses when they left the Company’s employment. In each case the rent was 7s. 8d. per fortnight, the amount being deducted from the wages at the fortnightly pay. At each pay the men signed a receipt in the following terms :—‘Received payment of the above balance, being payment in full of all wages due to me up to this date; and I hereby authorise you to deduct from my future wages the amount of my house rent, and in the event of my leaving your employment, I authorise you to retain whatever moneys are in your hands until I remove from your house; also the sums paid by you for medicine and medical attendance to me; likewise the price of any coals, materials, tools, or implements to be furnished by you to me, the charge for sharpening or repairing tools, and any cash advanced to me.’

“On 1st March these men came out on strike in common with all the miners of the country. On that day (which was the next pay-day after 16th February) pay-slips were issued to each of these three men for the pay ending 24th February. Deduction was made for the rent due down to 24th February in accordance with the written authority given on the pay-slip of 16th February. But the appellants had instructed their cashier to retain on 1st March the full wages of workmen occupying Company houses as security for rent accruing after 24th February, and on the said date these workmen were informed by the manager of the pit that their wages were retained to any artificer . . . in respect of any labour by him done . . . shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of this realm, and not otherwise; and every payment made to any such artificer by his employer, of or in respect of any such wages, by the delivering to him of goods, or otherwise than in the current coin aforesaid, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be, and is hereby declared, illegal, null, and void.”

Sec. 23. “Nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prevent any employer of any artificer, or agent of any such employer, from . . . demising to any artificer . . . the whole or any part of any tenement at any rent to be thereon reserved; . . . nor from making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any such artificer for or in respect of any such rent . . . Provided always, that such stoppage or deduction . . . shall not be in any case made from the wages of such artificer, unless the agreement or contract for such stoppage or deduction shall be in writing, and signed by such artificer.”

for this purpose. Accordingly, before issuing the pay-slip the cashier wrote the word 'Rent' in pencil opposite the net amount of the wages due to Balmer, Dorans, and Greer respectively, and payment was refused on 1st March. On Balmer presenting his pay-slip at the pay-office the cashier put it back saying 'that is rent.' But, as the result of an interview between a deputation of the men and the appellants' manager, the appellants on 2nd March 1912 paid each of the men any surplus of wages over £1 each, intimating that they retained £1 for rent. The men did not consent to the money being so retained, but desired payment in full. Accordingly, on 2nd March Balmer received 4s., and the appellants retained £1, being the balance of the wages due to him. Similarly Dorans received 5s. 2d., and Greer received 10s. 10d., the appellants in each case retaining £1.

Dec. 21, 1912.
Summerlee
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Thomson.

"On 6th March 1912 each of the men got payment in full for the period from 24th February to 29th February, the last day on which they had been at work. No deduction was then made for rent, but a full fortnight since 24th February had not then elapsed.

"The custom in this district is that when a man proposes to leave his employment he gives notice to the foreman on the day he is leaving, lifts his graith, and returns his 'pins' (or tallies), receiving back the deposit of 1s. from the cashier. His right to remain in the house ceases, and he is not entitled to the further service of the colliery doctor. Neither Balmer nor Dorans nor Greer took any of the steps usually taken by men who are leaving. They gave no individual notice to the foreman, but it was common knowledge that the men were not to resume work on 1st March. Balmer and Greer, who were miners, left their graith in their working-places, and they did not return their 'pins.' All three men remained in occupancy of their houses, and Greer had the services of the colliery doctor for his wife. They did not expect the strike to last long, and they expected to be taken back to their old positions. But they did no work during the strike, and the appellants were under no obligation to reinstate them. These men received strike pay from the Union during the strike.

"They resumed work on 8th April 1912. The first pay was on 26th April for the period ending 20th April. The men then owed the appellants for the occupancy of their houses for the eight weeks from 24th February to 20th April, the amount calculated at 7s. 8d. per fortnight, being in each case £1, 10s. 8d. At the pay on 26th April 10s. 8d. was in each case deducted for rent, the appellants imputing the £1 retained on 2nd March in payment of the balance. The appellants in the first instance treated the £1 retained in each case in their books as 'unpaid wages,' and transferred it to the rent account after the men started work in April."

The question of law was:—"On the facts proved was I warranted in convicting the accused?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 19th and 20th November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The first charge libelled a contravention of section 2 of the Truck Act, 1831. To that charge there were two answers. In the first place, the section struck at contracts as to the manner, &c., in which wages were to be "laid out or expended." There was no such contract here. The contract merely authorised postponement of payment of the wages, the money in the meantime being carried to a suspense account. The wages were, and

Dec. 21, 1912. remained, the property of the workmen ; and the mere withholding of payment was not a laying out or expending of the money. *M'Farlane v. Birrell*¹ was distinguishable. That was a contract as to the application of the wages ; and it was admitted in argument that the contract fell within section 2 of the Act. In the second place, the contract here was protected by section 23. If there was application of the wages under the contract, it was for rent, which the Act authorised. (2) The third charge labelled non-payment of the wages. But the Act dealt merely with the manner of payment ; it did not seek to enforce payment.² Accordingly, the charge was irrelevant. In *Williams's case*³ the wages were retained as against a debt due to the employer. That was clearly an application of the wages ; it was payment in account, and, therefore, offended against the statute.⁴

Summerlee

Argued for the respondent ;—(1) Section 2 of the Act prohibited any contract providing “directly or indirectly” as to the expenditure of the wages. Here the contract provided that the wages should be retained and held for a specific purpose. This being so, the contract fell within the prohibition in the section. M'Farlane v. Birrell,¹ Williams's case,³ and *Lamb v. Great Northern Railway Company*⁵ were distinct authorities in support of the conviction. If the contract fell within the scope of section 2 of the Act it was clear, on the authority of M'Farlane v. Birrell,¹ that it was not protected by section 23. (2) Deductions from the wages payable were prohibited by section 3 of the Act.⁶ Payment in coin was required ; and payment in account was not permitted.

At advising on 21st December 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The first branch of the complaint, which the Sheriff-substitute has held proved, charges the appellants that on 16th February 1912 they did contract with certain of their workmen, that they (the appellants) should be entitled, in the event of the workmen severally leaving their employment, to retain whatever moneys were then in the appellants' hands until the workmen removed from the houses respectively occupied by them, and belonging to the appellants, and that for rent of and obligations connected with and arising out of their occupation of the said houses for the period subsequent to their leaving the employment. The clause in the form of each of the workmen's receipts for wages, upon which the charge proceeds as being in contravention of section 2 of the Truck Act, 1831, is as follows :—“And in the event of my leaving your employment, I authorise you to retain whatever moneys are in your hand until I remove from your house.” Section 2 of the Truck Act provides that “if in any contract hereafter to be made between any artificer . . .

and his employer, any provision shall be made directly or indirectly respecting the place where, or the manner in which, or the person or persons with whom, the whole or any part of the wages due or to become due to any such artificer shall be laid out or expended, such contract shall be and is hereby declared illegal, null, and void." Section 9 imposes penalties on employers entering into contracts or making payments declared by the Act to be illegal. Section 23 makes "particular exceptions to the generality of the law"; and, inter alia, excepts and sanctions, "demising to any artificer . . . the whole or any part of any tenement at any rent to be thereon reserved," and "making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any such artificer for or in respect of any such rent, . . . provided always, that such stoppage or deduction . . . shall not be in any case made from the wages of such artificer, unless the agreement or contract for such stoppage or deduction shall be in writing, and signed by such artificer." It can hardly be maintained that the authority to retain moneys in hand when the workman has left the employment is a stoppage or deduction from wages in respect of rent within the meaning of section 23. The contrary was decided by this Court in M'Farlane v. Birrell,¹ where the facts bore a strong similarity to those here disclosed. Lord Rutherford Clark stated that "there can be no rent where there is no lease, and no rent can become due after the lease has come to an end." The Lord Justice-Clerk said: "I think it is plain that the sum is not rent in the sense of section 23, but is a deduction intended to cover a sum for the retaining of his house by the miner, when he has no right to do so as a tenant, he having ceased to be in the employment, and therefore having no right to remain." But Mr Macmillan argued with great plausibility that the retention authorised in this case does not amount to a provision, direct or indirect, respecting the manner in which wages due or to become due to the workmen should be "laid out or expended." To retain wages, it was urged, is not to control the manner of their expenditure or outlay; it is at most a temporary appropriation of wages, or a suspension or postponement of payment; it may be a retention for the security of the employer, but that is a perfectly fair and reasonable contract, and one which cannot be held to be struck at by the Act, the true object of which was to prohibit bartering wages for goods. But whatever result one might have reached upon this argument apart from authority, the point seems to me to be conclusively settled against the appellants by the recent decision of the House of Lords in the case of Williams.² The rubric bears that "the Truck Act, 1831, does not allow an employer when paying wages to a workman to make any deductions except those expressly sanctioned by the Act." It is true that the case turned principally upon section 3 and not section 2 of the Act; but none the less I think it is an authority upon the construction and effect of the Act as a whole. The House held that the masters were not entitled to set off against wages due to the man a judgment debt for which they held a decree against him, because the Act does not contemplate or allow a striking of accounts between the parties, and payment merely of the balance due upon such an accounting. Dec. 21, 1912. burn, L.C., with whose opinion Lord Macnaghten expressed his entire agreement, said: "Section 23 provides, with elaborate care, and under strict safeguards, the cases in which debts due from the workman may be deducted from the wages due to the workman when the employer is paying the wages. These provisions would be wholly unnecessary if an employer were already authorised by section 3 to deduct anything that the workman owed him, and to pay in coin merely his balance." Lord Davey, who also agreed, referred with approval to the dicta of A. L. Smith, J. (afterwards M.R.), in Lamb v. Great Northern Railway Company,¹ who said that "in sections 2, 3, and 4 of the Act of Will. IV. a drawback is prohibited per se, but that a deduction in respect of medicine and medical attendance is allowed under section 23; the Legislature seems undoubtedly to have started by making all drawbacks illegal, but there were some they did not wish to make illegal, and these they legalised by section 23, including a deduction in respect of medicine and medical attendance. The effect of that section is that if there is a contract in writing as to such a drawback, it shall be permitted. That is the meaning of the old Truck Act." It seems to me that the case of *Williams*² must be regarded as an authority for holding that a contract such as we have here, which in effect authorises retention of wages for a specific purpose—i.e., for the security of the employers in the event of a workman continuing in occupation of his house after his tenancy has expired—is struck at by the Act as being a contract which makes provision indirectly respecting the manner in which part of the wages due or to become due shall be expended, seeing that the retention cannot be justified as being a deduction authorised by the exclusive enumeration of section 23.

The other branch of the complaint, upon which the Sheriff has also convicted, deals with the same contract but in a different aspect. It charges the appellants that on 1st and 2nd March 1912 they did stop and deduct from the wages due on 1st March to the workmen for their work done in the employment during the fortnight ending 24th February, the sum of £1 for rent and other obligations connected with and arising out of their occupation of their houses for the period subsequent to 29th February, when the employment ceased; "and did fail to pay in the current coin of the realm to each of them the entire amount of the wages earned by and then payable to them severally in respect of the labour done by them respectively at said pits during the fortnight ended on said 24th February 1912." This is charged as involving a contravention of section 3 of the Truck Act. That section provides "that the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer . . . in respect of any labour by him done . . . shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of this realm, and not otherwise; and every payment made to any such artificer by his employer, of or in respect of any such wages, by the delivering to him of goods, or otherwise than in the current coin aforesaid, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be, and is hereby declared, illegal, null, and void." Mr Macmillan urged that failure to pay wages is not an offence under the Act; and that if wages are not paid, but are retained, stopped, or deducted, it is obvious that they cannot have been paid otherwise than in the current coin of the realm, which is the sole offence struck at by section 3. The argument is superficially plausible and attractive, but on examination it appears to be unsound. The charge is not merely of a failure or refusal to pay wages. This part of the complaint is not, perhaps, perfectly framed; but, read as a consecutive narrative, I think it imports a charge of making payment otherwise than in coin of the realm, for it means that part of the wages, instead of being so paid, was in fact retained and appropriated by the employers, as already explained, for the specific purpose of forming a fund for their further security. The decision in *Williams's case*¹ appears to me to be directly in point, and indeed a fortiori of the present case. If the master may not set off his judgment debt, still less can he appropriate part of the wages for a specific purpose of this sort. I think, therefore, that the conviction upon both heads must stand. I confess, however, that I am much in sympathy with the views indicated by Lord Atkinson in Williams's case,¹ to the effect that the language of the Truck Act extends in some respects beyond the mischief really aimed at, viz., prohibition of the payment of wages in goods or otherwise than in current coin, and may reach transactions harmless enough in themselves, and not within the spirit of the statute.

Lord Dundas.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff-substitute has found that two out of the three charges brought against the appellants under the Truck Act are proved. The first of these is a pure question of law; the second involves also a question of fact, about which, however, there is no dispute. The points raised for our decision are important, because it is evident that the contract we have here to consider has been framed with a view to avoid the effect of certain cases already decided, in particular, the case of Williams,¹ to which Lord Dundas has referred. I am of opinion that the attempt has failed. If the result should be that a contract, beneficial, on the whole, both to employer and employed, and, looking to the objects of the Truck Act, probably not intended to be struck at by the Legislature, is found to be struck at by the terms of the Act, a remedy, and that for the future, can only be obtained from the Legislature. Whether this contract is or is not in that position, I cannot say. It would depend on how it was worked out. If the houses were fairly rented, it would work out advantageously for the workman as well as for the master. If they were over-rented, the result might be unfair for the workman; for, in that case, the owner of the house, being only entitled to damages for illegal occupation of the house after the workman's right to occupy ceased at the termination of his employment, would be receiving more than he was entitled to if he deducted the same amount as that previously paid as rent.

The first charge is aimed at the contract of 16th February 1912, or rather at the portion of it contained in these words: "In the event of my leaving your employment, I authorise you to retain whatever moneys are in your hands until I remove from your house." But it is right to consider at the same time the preceding obligation, namely:—"I hereby authorise

Dec. 21, 1912. you to deduct from my future wages the amount of my house rent." Taking the two clauses together, it is evident that the appellants have endeavoured, in three particulars, to obscure the breach of the Truck Act, which they have committed. In the first place, they introduce the word "retain," as applicable to payment for house occupation after the cessation of employment, instead of the word "deduct," which is used immediately before, in reference to house rent. This has obviously been done to enable them to maintain the argument, which was forcibly urged by Mr Macmillan, that mere retention, without specification of the purpose for which the money is retained, cannot constitute an offence against a statute, which declares illegal, null, and void "any provision . . . made directly or indirectly respecting . . . the manner in which the . . . wages due or to become due to any such artificer shall be laid out or expended." But, construing the agreement, it seems to me clear that the retention contemplated is for a specific purpose, namely, in security against the contingency of the workman, after leaving the master's employment, continuing to occupy his former master's house. In the second place, care is taken to avoid the appearance of retaining or deducting wages, by the use of the phrase "whatever moneys are in your hands." But it is clear that this expression, which necessarily involves construction, not only includes, but primarily refers to, wages. In the third place, when the object for which the money is to be retained is ascertained, by construction, to be payment for the use of a house occupied after employment has ceased, it is found to be associated, in the immediately preceding clause, with house rent. But it is not rent at all, but damages for illegal occupation, as was found in the case of M'Farlane v. Birrell.¹

When stripped of these disguises, the contract of 16th February appears to me to be, as is charged in the complaint, in breach of the second section of the Truck Act. This follows from the reasoning of the noble and learned Lords in the case of Williams.² That was a stronger case than the present for exemption from the statute. Although the employer held a decree against his workman for payment of a debt, it was found that he was not entitled to set off the amount of the decree against wages due to the workman by deducting it from these wages. The case of *Hevolett v. Allen*³ decided that such a deduction could have been validly made, had there been an antecedent agreement covering it. But, in the absence of such an agreement, it was held, in Williams's case,² that such deduction would be in breach of the statute. Now it appears to me that the two main points in the argument which induced the Court of Appeal to hold the deduction to be legal, a decision which was reversed in the House of Lords, were those urged by the appellants in the present case, namely, first, that the contract of 16th February does not violate the primary purpose of the statute, that of prohibiting the payment of wages in goods supplied by or through the employer, and, second, that the Act did not strike at failure to pay wages, which is all that this contract involves, but at payment in an illegal manner.

³ [1894] A. C. 383.

No doubt the question did not arise in Williams's case,¹ as here, under Dec. 21, 1912. section 2 of the Truck Act, but under section 3, for no contract had been entered into bearing on the matter. But the House of Lords adopted and approved the opinion of Lord Justice Bowen in Hewlett v. Allen,² where he said: "Payment in account will not do." It follows that, if actual payment, in a case not excepted by sections 23 and 24, otherwise than in current coin, is struck at by section 3, a contract in a certain contingency to make or allow to be made such payment is struck at by section 2.

Lord Guthrie.

On the second charge found proved by the Sheriff-substitute, under the third section of the Truck Act, I think the case is ruled by the case of *Williams*¹ already referred to.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Your Lordships being agreed, I have, according to the constitution of the Court, no vote, but I desire to say that while I express myself as consenting to the judgment, I do so entirely in respect of the decisions pronounced in the House of Lords, which I cannot but hold, rule the case before us. It is only in deference—a deference I am bound to show—that I yield to these judgments. Had I been free to take my own view, I should have been inclined to hold that the Truck Act did not apply to a case such as that now being dealt with. The purpose of that Act plainly was to put an end to the evils caused by employers, instead of paying what was due to the employees for work done, tendering to them, in lieu of the money wages agreed upon, articles of manufacture, professedly of the value represented by the sum due, or any part of it,—a system which led to scandalous abuses, employees being practically defrauded by being made to take what might or might not truly represent the money due, and which in general practice did not represent the full value. And sometimes goods were foisted on them which they did not wish for, or did not require. Abuses of this description were the reasons influencing Parliament to make it the law that what was to be paid to the servant as wages should be paid in coin of the realm. It appears to me to be a very great stretching of the terms of the Act to make it apply, not to a substitution of something else for money, but to a compulsion upon the employer to pay over the full wages, in cases where the employer may have a good claim against the employee, e.g., where the workman refuses to work for him, but goes on occupying the house which was let to him because he was in the employment, his occupation of the house being legal only while he continues in the employment. Here the parties agreed that in the event of the employee leaving his employment—which, of course, he did when he refused to work—the employer should be entitled to deduct from the wages due sums due for occupation of the employer's house. If that were carried out, would the making of the deduction agreed upon be a failure to pay wages in coin of the realm? If I were in a position to answer that question according to my own judgment, I should be inclined to answer in the negative. There is in such a case no attempt by the employer to induce the workman to accept something other than coin, which is the evil struck at by the statute. The workman has received or taken something of the employer's for which he is undoubtedly

Dec. 21, 1912. bound to pay the employer. He takes a benefit by residing in, and holding on to, a house belonging to his employer. The employer is in no way refusing to pay coin. He is only retaining what by bargain he is entitled to retain, as against a debt due to him by the employee. I cannot myself see the ground for holding him to be in breach of the Truck Act.

Procedure—Bail—Refusal of bail—Charge of administering poison with intent to murder.

A person charged with administering poison with intent to murder presented a petition to be liberated on bail. The application was opposed by the prosecutor on the ground, inter alia, that the precognitions disclosed an aggravated case.

The Sheriff-substitute having refused the petition, held, on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary, that the petition was rightly refused.

HIGH COURT. JOHN SAUNDERS was charged on indictment with administering poison to his wife with intent to murder her.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Having been committed to the prison of Edinburgh he presented a petition to the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles for liberation on bail.

The Sheriff-substitute (Macleod) refused the petition.*

Saunders appealed to the High Court of Justiciary, and the appeal was heard before the Lord Justice-Clerk on 3rd March 1913.

It was stated on the appellant's behalf that he had always borne a good character, that he did not desire to avoid his trial and had no intention of leaving the country, and that, as he was a gamekeeper earning £1 a week, it would be impossible for him to leave the country even if he wished to do so. It was further stated that the petitioner's wife was out of danger, so that it was unlikely that a capital charge would be preferred.

* "NOTE.—1. The petitioner is charged with the crime of administering poison to his wife with intent to murder her.

"2. That crime is bailable, i.e., it is the right and duty of the Court to consider whether, in the circumstances of this particular case, bail ought to be granted or refused.

"3. In the light of the result of the analysis, the precognitions disclose a very aggravated case.

"4. The Procurator-fiscal has consulted the Crown officials, and, as instructed by them, he opposes the application on the ground that, if liberated, the applicant would in all likelihood abscond and thus defeat the ends of justice.

"5. In these circumstances it seems to me that I ought to exercise the discretion vested in the Court by refusing the application."

Counsel for the Crown opposed the application, and stated that the Crown papers disclosed an aggravated case. Mar. 8, 1913.

H. M. Advocate v. Saunders.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—So far as I am aware, there has been no case similar to the present one in which bail has been allowed, and I should be very much surprised indeed if there was any precedent for granting this petition. There may be cases, even when the offence is a very heinous one, where the Crown consents to bail being allowed and, when the Crown does consent, the application is always granted. But in cases where the Crown does not consent, and in cases where the information possessed by the prosecutor who has charged the offence points to a very serious crime, I am unable to see how it can be in accordance either with the public interest or with justice to allow bail. An attempt to poison is an approach to the highest crime known to the law; where the victim recovers, the accused is saved from being charged with murder, but, in essence, the crime is the same. Accordingly, for the reasons stated by the Sheriff-substitute, I can see no ground whatever for altering the judgment pronounced by him.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.*

Statutory offences—Coal mine—Maximum period of consecutive underground employment—Exceptions—“Meeting danger or apprehended danger”—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 57), sec. 1.

The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, enacts, sec. 1 (1), that a workman shall not be below ground for more than eight hours during any consecutive twenty-four, but (2) that no contravention of this provision shall be deemed to take place in the case of any workman who is below ground for the purpose inter alia of “meeting any danger or apprehended danger.”

Held that “danger” was limited to danger arising out of some abnormal occurrence, and accordingly that workmen engaged on a Sunday night and Monday morning in repairing falls, such as were expected to occur, and normally did occur, every week when the pit was idle between Saturday and Monday, did not fall within the exception.

WALLACE THORNEYCROFT, managing director of the Plean Colliery Company, Limited, and Peter Inglis, manager of East Plean Colliery, Stirlingshire, belonging to the said Plean Colliery Company, Limited, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Stirling on a complaint at the instance of James Rennie Archibald, procurator-fiscal, which set forth that “on 5th and 6th May 1912, at No. 4 pit, East Plean Colliery, you did connive at Andrew Docherty, pit road repairer [and others], all workmen employed by said Company in said mine, being below ground therein for the purpose of their work and of going to and from

The accused, after evidence, were convicted by the Sheriff-substitute (Mitchell) and sentenced to a fine or imprisonment.

They craved and obtained a stated case for appeal which set forth that the following facts inter alia were admitted or proved:—

“(1) The said Andrew Docherty [and others], all pit road repairers, being workmen employed by said Company in said mine, were below ground in said No. 4 pit for the purpose of their work, and of going to and from their work, for more than eight hours during the consecutive twenty-four hours libelled, viz.:—from 10 P.M. on Sunday 5th to 6 A.M. on Monday 6th May 1912, and from 2.45 P.M. to 10 P.M. on said 6th May 1912, as libelled. (2) The said pit is worked on the single shift system, a full shift working each working day from 6 A.M. till 2 P.M., when alone coal is drawn. In addition there is a repairing shift working each day from 3 P.M. till 11 P.M., and a night shift of a few colliers working in special places at special work from 10 P.M. till 6 A.M. The working was on the long-wall system, and the working face was not advanced at all, or materially, in connection with said night working in special places. (4) At the time libelled Saturday had been an idle day, the idle time extending from 2 P.M. on Friday till 6 A.M. on Monday. (5) It was the practice in said pit at the time libelled—and for at least two years before—for a repairing squad or shift to be below ground for the purpose of their work from 10 P.M. on Sunday night to 6 A.M. on Monday morning, and for the same squad of repairers to be below ground for their

 Sec. 1 (1). “Subject to the provisions of this Act a workman shall not be below ground in a mine for the purpose of his work, and of going to and from his work, for more than eight hours during any consecutive twenty-four hours. (2) . . . Nor shall any contravention of the foregoing provisions be deemed to take place in the case of any workman who is below ground for the purpose of rendering assistance in the event of accident, or for meeting any danger or apprehended danger, or for dealing with any emergency or work uncompleted through unforeseen circumstances which requires to be dealt with without interruption in order to avoid serious interference with ordinary work in the mine or in any district of the mine. . . . (6) A repairing shift of workmen may, notwithstanding the provisions of this section, for the purpose of avoiding work on Sunday, commence their period of work on Saturday before twenty-four hours have elapsed since the commencement of their last period of work, so long as at least eight hours have elapsed since the termination thereof.”

Sec. 7 enacts that any person who “connives” at a contravention of the Act shall be guilty of an offence, and imposes a particular penalty on the “owner, agent, or manager of the mine” who is guilty of such an offence.

work again between 3 and 11 P.M. on Monday at their usual week-day shift. (6) The men named in the complaint, except two, were regular members of said repairing squad or shift, and were below ground on the dates libelled in the regular course of their duty as members of the squad; and the appellant Peter Inglis knew that said men were such members of said squad or shift, but it was not proved that the appellant Wallace Thorneycroft knew who the members of the squad were. (7) It was the duty of said repairing squad or shift to deal with falls from the roof of the workings in said pit, by removing the fallen material, propping up the roofs where falls had taken place or might be anticipated, and removing stones and material which were likely to fall from the roofs and sides of the workings. (8) When falls have taken place in a pit it is probable that further material which has been loosened will fall unless the roof is secured, and it is necessary that such work as is referred to in No. 7 should be done to insure safe working. (9) Prior to the said repairing squad commencing work on Sunday nights, and during the period when they were at work on such nights, the pit was inspected by firemen, in order among other things to discover any falls from the roof which might have occurred, and any places which might have become insecure and where the fall of material might be anticipated; and it was the duty of the repairing squad to carry out such instructions as might be given to them by said firemen, for the purpose of securing the roof and sides of the workings, so that falls might not take place. On the Sunday night libelled the repairers mentioned in No. 1 supra were engaged in this work. On other working days than Monday, as the repairing shift and firemen have not been down all night, the pit is inspected by firemen before the colliers' shift enters at 6 A.M., and if any part of the pit is found to be dangerous the colliers are not allowed to enter it. (10) The object of such prior inspection and the Sunday night work carried out by the repairers under the instructions of the firemen was to make the workings safe for the colliers who were in ordinary course to enter the working places at 6 A.M. on the Monday mornings. (11) There were as a rule more falls from the roof in said pit on Sundays than on other days in the week, which falls required to be dealt with during the Sunday night shifts. The firemen's books, in which the falls are recorded, showed that for the five months, May to September 1912, the percentage of falls on week-days in said pit was about 1·7 while on Sundays it was about 5·9. But otherwise there was no difference between the state of the pit on Sundays and its state on other days. (12) The increased number of falls on Sundays is connected with the idle time from Friday afternoon or Saturday afternoon; but it was not admitted or proved whether said increase was due to the cessation of mining, and the consequent non-advance of the working face causing concentration of roof pressure at one area in this long-wall working, or to the intermission in repairing, nor in what proportion these may have respectively operated. (13) On the said 'idle day,' Saturday, 5th May 1912, though a considerable number of men were in the pit at other work, coal was not being got save by some ten to fifteen men working in special 'developing' places, but their work did not have the effect of causing any substantial advance in the working face. (14) It was not proved that the number or the extent of falls in said pit was unusual, as compared with pits generally or pits in the neighbourhood. (15) The firemen's books showed that on Sunday, the 5th of May, there were eight falls in No. 4 pit, one at least of which occurred after 10 o'clock at night; but it was not proved that the falls in said pit requiring to be cleared away by the night shift on the Sunday libelled were unusual in number or extent as compared with falls in said pit on other Sundays before or after; and there was nothing unusual for a Sunday in the condition of the pit on the Sunday libelled, and nothing calling for the attention of the repairers beyond what was to be expected on Sundays. (16) The appellants apprehended, and had reason to apprehend, that falls from the roof would occur during the idle times of the pit, including Sunday nights, and they apprehended, and had reason to apprehend, that such falls would occur between 2 P.M. on Friday, 3rd May, and 6 A.M. on Monday 6th. (17) The appellants apprehended, and had reason to apprehend, that, on such falls occurring, if the roof was not secured and the workings cleared by a repairing squad, the workings would be in a dangerous condition at 6 A.M. on Monday mornings. (18) The appellants had reason to expect that more falls would have to be dealt with on the Sunday night shift libelled (5th May 1912), and so far to apprehend more danger than on week night shifts, but not more than on other Sunday nights, before and after. (19) The appellants personally were not aware that there were any falls in the mine on 5th May, and did not learn of the falls until after that date; and their apprehension of danger was not based on any conditions existing in the pit on that day beyond the conditions on other Sundays. . . . (21) The regular and most convenient time for the repairing squad to go down the pit on week-days was at 3 o'clock, after the firemen who had been on duty since the morning had reported to the firemen who had come on duty for the afternoon, these latter firemen then carrying out, with or through the repairing squad, such repairs as were necessary. If urgent repairs are required on working days after 11 P.M. they are attended to by the night shift of colliers who are at work on these days. (22) On the Monday libelled there was nothing abnormal in the condition of the said pit, and the appellants had no reason to expect more or larger falls or to apprehend more danger for themselves or others in the repairers' foresaid Monday afternoon shift or for the following night shift than in or for other week-day shifts. No fall was reported on the said Monday after 6 A.M. . . ."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Was I right in holding, in view of the circumstances above stated, that the appellants had not the benefit of the exceptions in section 1 (2) of the Act, in particular the exception applicable to the case of workmen being below ground for meeting 'any danger or apprehended danger'?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 7th March 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—No offence had been committed, as the men were below ground for the purpose of meeting danger or apprehended danger, or dealing with an emergency.¹ The fact that the danger was of more or less regular recurrence was immaterial, no words of qualification or limitation with regard to danger being found in the section. Subsection (6) of section 1 recognised the necessity of, and permitted, extra underground time in the case of repairers to avoid labour upon Sunday, and as the falls in this pit occurred upon

Sunday the extra time had to be done on Monday. The total underground time of the workmen in the week did not exceed the statutory limit. Mar. 7, 1913.
Thorneycroft
v. Archibald.

Argued for the respondent;—The words of exception in subsection (2) clearly referred to danger of an abnormal and unexpected nature, and not to the ordinary and normal occurrences in a pit. The facts here showed that at the end of every week falls such as those with which these workmen were dealing were to be expected, and had to be repaired. There was nothing abnormal in the events which happened in the pit on the Sunday in question. If the appellants' contention was sound these repairers would be altogether exempt from the protection afforded by the Act. Subsection (6) only permitted an extra shift on Saturday, and could not be extended to cover Monday as well. If any extension were necessary it must be effected by legislation.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have had a very able statement from Mr Horne, but I am unable to say that what the Sheriff has held to be a breach of the statute is not a breach of the statute. The statute is intended to prevent miners from being at work more than eight hours in the twenty-four, unless under exceptional and abnormal circumstances. The case made on the part of the appellants is that every Sunday in this pit abnormal circumstances are to be expected. It appears to me, however, that these circumstances in that case cease to be abnormal because they are the regular occurrences that take place on every Sunday. If it be true that the Sunday intervals necessitate more work in the way of repairs than would otherwise be the case, that just means that the pit requires more attention on Monday morning than it does at any other time.

We must distinguish between two things. There is, in the first place, the ordinary attention bestowed on the pit by repairers and brushers, whose business it is—always a more or less dangerous one—to keep the ways and works of the pit in a safe condition. Things are constantly occurring which, although slight at the moment, may, if not attended to, ultimately become dangerous, and it is the regular and ordinary work of the skilled repairer to detect and deal with these occurrences. In the second place, in such pits there are frequent occurrences which are more serious, and which obviously amount to danger or apprehended danger, distinguishable from these ordinary occurrences to which I have referred. Looking at the words of the clause of exceptions in section 1 (2) of the Act and the context in which they occur, I think they do not refer to the danger which will always be present in a pit if it is not looked after, but to some abnormal and exceptionally serious occurrence. The object accordingly of the clause section 1 (2) is plainly to exclude from the prohibition imposed by the Act the case of men who have finished their eight hours' shift, but who, if they left off work, would leave behind them a condition of things tending to exceptional danger. The section permits them to go on and continue working, and make the pit safe where some danger or apprehended danger of a marked kind has supervened. That, of course, is a totally different thing from their being allowed, after they have completed their ordinary eight hours' shift, to begin, after an interval of only eight hours, to work

Mar. 7, 1913. another eight hours' spell. That is the very thing the Act was intended to strike at.

Thorneycroft
v. Archibald.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

It may be, of course, that in carrying out this Act a little extra expense may be put upon the mineowner. He may have to employ more men for this particular work during the twenty-four hours that follow the Sunday than he would otherwise do, because he cannot use his own repairing squad, who have done their eight hours' work already. He may employ miners to do the work, because we are told that ordinary miners are expected to do such work, as is shown by the statement that "if urgent repairs are required on working days after 11 P.M. they are attended to by the night shift of colliers who are at work on these days." He will, however, have to pay them wages, because they are not winning their own coal, and because, if he did not, they would be thereby losers. That may be his misfortune, but it is one imposed on him by the Act of Parliament, which requires that there shall be provision made for the ordinary repairs of the pit. I must say that I do not understand the idea that because arrangements are made whereby it is necessary for certain men to work more than eight hours unless other men are employed to do the work, that is a reason for excluding the operation of the statute.

The only point which Mr Horne made with some shadow of success was on subsection (6), which allows a repairing shift to commence their period of work on Saturday, before twenty-four hours have elapsed since the commencement of their last period of work, in order to avoid doing work on Sunday, but that does not entitle them, so far as I can see, to do it in any other way than that prescribed—namely, by doing an extra shift on Saturday. It is a different thing altogether to transfer that on to a Monday at the beginning of the week, and give the men sixteen hours' work out of the twenty-four. If there is to be any amendment of this Act it must be done, as the Solicitor-General said, by the Legislature; we cannot interfere with it. For myself I think the Sheriff has made very careful findings indeed, and that on his findings in fact he was justified in coming to the conclusion he did.

LORD DEWAR and LORD HUNTER concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

Leavack v.
Macleod.

Procedure—Proof—Oppression—Sentence—Magistrate asking for information from person not witness in case before pronouncing sentence.

In a prosecution in the Police Court for reckless driving it was proved that a lorry driven by the accused had collided with a tramway car. After finding the accused guilty of the offence charged the magistrate inquired of the manager of the tramway company, who was present in Court but who had not been examined as a witness in the case, what was the amount of the damage done to the tramway car, and after the manager had stated the amount the magistrate fined the accused 30s. with the alternative of imprisonment for fifteen days.

Conviction quashed on the ground that the information given by the manager was not competently before the magistrate, and that it was impossible to say that his mind might not have been affected thereby in fixing the penalty.

Question whether the same result would have followed had the question been put to the prosecutor.

On 29th January 1913 William Leavack, a carter in Leith, was charged in the Leith Police Court with recklessly driving a horse attached to a lorry. The presiding Magistrate found the accused guilty as libelled and sentenced him to a fine of 30s. with the alternative of imprisonment for fifteen days.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Kinnear.
Ld. Johnston.

Leavack brought a suspension of this conviction in which it was stated:—(Stat. 3) “ . . . From the evidence it appeared that a tramway car, the property of the Leith Corporation, and the complainant's lorry had come into collision with one another. Thereafter, when both prosecutor and complainant had closed their proofs, and prior to finding the complainant guilty or passing sentence upon complainant, the Magistrate asked the prosecutor the amount of the damage which had been done to the Leith Corporation's tramway car by the collision with the complainant's lorry. The prosecutor replied that he had no information on that point, whereupon the Magistrate called upon Mr Fitzpayne, the manager of the Leith Corporation Tramways, who had made it his business to be in the Court, but who had not been a witness in the case, and had not been sworn, to tell him the damage that the tramcar had sustained. Mr Fitzpayne replied that the damage in question was about thirty shillings. The Magistrate then found complainant guilty of the offence libelled, and fined him thirty shillings with the alternative of fifteen days' imprisonment.” (Stat. 4) “ The complainant maintains that the said pretended warrant or conviction and sentence of 29th January 1913 should be quashed on the ground of corruption and malice and oppression on the part of the Magistrate. The case having been closed, it was incompetent to obtain further evidence thereon; and it was corrupt, oppressive, and malicious of the Magistrate to inquire of and to receive from the manager of the tramways information as to the damage sustained by the said tramcar, said manager not having been either a witness in the cause, nor sworn. . . . Further, the Magistrate in fixing the amount of said fine was guided by the said information obtained as above mentioned, and fixed same with the view of recouping the Corporation for the damage sustained by their tramcar, and he did thereby recover same for said Corporation.”

penalty exceeding £1 but not exceeding £3 being twenty days, whereas the complainer in default of a penalty of £2, 11s. had been sentenced to imprisonment for one month.* Meanwhile three of the Justices had left the Bench and the Courthouse, and of the original Court only Mr M'Call and another Justice remained. The complainer was sent for and brought back into Court, when Mr M'Call intimated to him the mistake which had been made, and said that the sentence of Court would be a fine of £1, with £1, 11s. of expenses, and in default of payment twenty days' imprisonment. The fine already paid by the complainer was not handed back to him before this intimation was made. The sentence as first pronounced was never written out, and did not enter the record of proceedings. The sentence which was recorded was that in which the alternative was twenty days' imprisonment.

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The sentence complained of being irregular and incompetent, the complainer is entitled to suspension as craved. (2) The sentence complained of not having been pronounced by a competent Court should be suspended. (3) The complainer having implemented the sentence pronounced by the Court by which he was tried, the pretended sentence pronounced thereafter by the said two Justices was incompetent and should be suspended.

The case was heard before the High Court on 21st November 1912, when it was remitted to the Sheriff of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk for inquiry into the facts regarding the trial of the complainer.† It was again heard before the High Court, after the Sheriff had reported, on 19th March 1913, and was sent to a full bench, before whom it was heard on 28th May 1913.

Argued for the complainer;—The sentence originally pronounced

Exceeds—

£1, but does not exceed £3,	20 days
-----------------------------	-----------------

Where the Court in imposing any penalty or sum for which caution is to be found does not specify the period of imprisonment in default of payment of such penalty or on failure to find such caution, such period shall be the maximum period applicable to the non-payment of the amount imposed. If in any sentence or extract sentence, the period of imprisonment inserted in default of payment of any penalty or of caution being found is in excess of that competent under this Act, such period of imprisonment shall be held as being reduced to the maximum period under this Act applicable to such default, and the Judge who pronounced such sentence shall have power to order such sentence and extract to be corrected accordingly. . . ."

Sec. 57. "In any proceedings in a Court consisting of more than one Judge the signature of one Judge shall be sufficient in all warrants or other proceedings prior or subsequent to conviction, although the presence and signature of two or more Judges may be necessary to conviction of the offence in respect of which such warrants are granted or procedure takes place, and it shall not be necessary that the Judge so signing shall be one of the Judges trying or dealing with the case otherwise."

was incompetent, in respect that it imposed an alternative penalty of imprisonment for thirty days instead of for twenty. After the complainant had paid his fine, the sentence had been implemented and could not thereafter be altered. If alteration were competent, it could only be at the hands of "the Judge who pronounced" the sentence,¹ namely, the members of Court who tried the cause, or of the High Court acting under section 75 of the Act, as in the case of Whillans v. Hilson.² What happened when the complainant was brought back was in effect that he received a new sentence from a new Court which had not tried the cause, and this was the sentence which was put on record. This sentence, which was the one sought to be suspended, was incompetent, because pronounced by a Court which had no jurisdiction to sentence the complainant. At any rate before the new sentence was pronounced the fine which the complainant had paid should have been handed back to him so that he might have had an opportunity of reconsidering whether he would pay the fine or go to prison. On these grounds the sentence should be suspended.

May 28, 1913.
Benwick v.
M'Dougall.

Argued for the respondent;—Even after extract it would have been competent for "the Judge who pronounced" the sentence to correct the error which had been made.³ Much more was it competent for him to correct it before the sentence had been recorded. The "Judge who pronounced" meant the person who was the mouth-piece of the Court, as distinguished from the Court itself, and this appeared both from the context and from the definition clause.⁴ The complainant had been found guilty by the whole Court, who had also determined the amount of the fine. What followed was not the imposition of a new sentence, but the timeous⁵ correction of a mere point of executorial detail,⁶ which one Justice by himself could competently make,⁷ and would have been automatically effected by the statute itself¹ even though it had not been noticed at the time. At least the sentence as recorded was unimpeachable, and the Court would not go behind the record.⁸ It was not even necessary for the record to contain any mention of the period of imprisonment seeing that the fine had been paid at the bar.⁹

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—[After narrating the facts]—The suspender seeks to have the conviction quashed upon the ground that the sentence as recorded was a new sentence pronounced, not by the Court who had tried him, but by certain persons who had been members of that Court. If I thought that was the real state of affairs, he would, I think, be entitled to have the sentence quashed, because undoubtedly a man cannot be tried by one Court and then sentenced by another. But when one comes to look at the matter, I do not think that that is the proper way of describing what

May 28, 1913. happened. The sentence as delivered was, first of all, a conviction, and then a penalty of £2, 11s., or thirty days' imprisonment. Now, an error of that sort is provided for by the 48th section itself, which says that the proper period of imprisonment for a penalty of £2, 11s. shall not exceed twenty days. It provides this: "If in any sentence or extract sentence the period of imprisonment inserted in default of payment of any penalty or of caution being found is in excess of that competent under this Act"—which was the case here—"such period of imprisonment shall be held as being reduced to the maximum period under this Act applicable to such default, and the Judge who pronounced such sentence shall have power to order such sentence and extract to be corrected accordingly." Now, I think the effect of that section is not doubtful. It makes the reduction of the period of imprisonment automatic and statutory. It does not make it depend upon any new determination of the Court as to what ought to be, but it is reduced by statute to the maximum period, and the period that is proper, namely in this case to twenty days, and that would have happened whether anything had been done or not. Supposing the error had never been found out, and the sentence had been entered in the record as originally pronounced, namely £2, 11s. penalty or thirty days' imprisonment; nevertheless, the effect of the statute would have been to cut down the period of imprisonment to twenty days, and I have not a doubt that the prisoner, if he had chosen to go to prison and had not paid the fine, could have obtained his liberation at the end of twenty days, either, perhaps, by bringing before the notice of the Prison Commissioners the error that had been made, or, if that was not sufficient, by presenting a bill of suspension and liberation to this Court. The additional words that are put in—"The Judge who pronounced such sentence shall have power to order such sentence and extract to be corrected accordingly"—I think are only inserted in order to save trouble, because it is obvious that if a correction is allowed, then the jailer will have a warrant which is in accordance with the true position of the case, instead of a warrant which is not in accordance with the true position of the case. But I do not find that there is any absolute necessity to have the matter corrected at all, although it is quite right that it should be corrected if it can be corrected. Now, therefore, when I come to the correction, I think one must take that also with the provisions of section 57—[His Lordship read the section]. So that I think by that section the action of one Judge alone was sufficient, provided that what was done was only an executorial act. I think that here the presiding Justice was only performing an executorial act, viz., correcting the sentence and making it accord with what the Act of Parliament automatically arranged. Accordingly, I do not think this sentence was a new sentence at all. It was simply an alteration of the old sentence. I think it is perfectly clear that, if the old sentence had been recorded exactly as it was, the presiding Judge or any one of the Judges could thereafter have put his pen through the thirty and substituted twenty, correcting the sentence in accordance with the Act of Parliament, and I do not think it could possibly make it any worse because they did not go through the form of first writing the thirty days in order to scratch them out but put in twenty days at once. On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When I heard this case for the first time, I con- May 28, 1913.

 to the view that this conviction could not stand. But having had the M'Dougall.
 advantage of the discussion to-day and of communing with your Lordships,
 I have come to a pretty distinct opinion that I would have been wrong if I had acted on that view. What was done here in making the alteration was to place upon the record that which had already automatically taken place under the statute. The sentence in stating a longer period of imprisonment than the Act allows was a sentence which was bad under the statute, and required correction, but the correction was automatically made by the statute itself. At the same time it is very desirable that the record on which execution takes place should be accurate and in accordance with the statute, otherwise awkwardness and even injustice might follow. The jailor might, if he did not know the law, keep the prisoner beyond the permissible period; and if he did know the law, he might have to go to the Prison Commissioners for authority to liberate him. All such complication is easily avoided by the record being made to accord with the statutory requirements. Now, can the correction be made where the sentence has been entered upon the record and signed? I think plainly that it can.
 If so, can a mistake in announcing the sentence be put right when it is discovered before recording? I am of opinion that it can. How is this to be done? Is there any sound objection to it being done as it was done here?
 I have come to the conclusion upon the grounds stated by your Lordship that there was no objection. What was done was purely an executorial act for the sake of convenience. It was quite unnecessary to bring together the whole bench who originally expressed their opinion upon the case.

There is only one other remark I should like to make. I think it would have been better before any alteration was made on the sentence originally pronounced if the money had been handed back to the accused at the bar, so that he should have had that money in his power in order that he might consider whether or not he would pay the fine. In this case I do not think that is of much consequence, because in the particular circumstances of the case it would probably have made no difference. But I think where a fine has been received and where there is difficulty about the recording of the conviction in a form that was not announced, it is well that the accused should have the money back again and that he should have the opportunity of considering what he ought to do. In this case the alteration limited the term of imprisonment from the term announced. One can conceive a case in which a convicted person, if put again in possession of his money on the discovery that there had been an error in the term of imprisonment, might, on being told that the term of imprisonment was now shorter than that in view of which he chose the fine, elect to suffer the shorter period of imprisonment rather than part with his money.

Upon the whole matter I am of the same opinion as your Lordship for the reasons expressed by you.

LORD DUNDAS.—My views in this case fluctuated somewhat during the argument; but in the end I have come clearly to agree with your Lordship in the chair, and that for the reasons you have expressed.

May 28, 1913. LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur, and for this reason in particular. The case is relieved from any difficulty by the fact that the fine was the real or primary penalty imposed, and to it there is no objection possible. The error in announcing the sentence occurred in the ancillary compulsitor of imprisonment failing payment. But it is not necessary (Act of 1908, section 53) that the alternative term of imprisonment should enter the record of sentence, where the fine is paid at the bar. As it was so paid here, the Clerk of Court was relieved of the duty of recording the alternative period of imprisonment when recording the sentence. He did so after the fine was paid, and even if the record had contained an error, the error would have been innocuous. I am far from saying that it is not the duty of the Clerk to keep the presiding magistrate right in the matter of technical details, and, if he has announced a sentence the period of imprisonment added in which does not correspond with the fine imposed, to draw his attention to the mistake and see that it is corrected at the time of recording, and before the record is signed. But it is not necessary in the present case to decide that question, for the insertion by the Clerk of Court, whether correctly or incorrectly, of what he was not required to insert, even though he varied the terms used by the presiding magistrate, cannot, I think, vitiate the conviction.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. I take the case as stated by the complainer because the report of the Sheriff really substantiates the complainer's statements and negatives the respondent's answers. The only point that at first impressed me was the academically plausible argument submitted on behalf of the complainer, that he never had the chance of electing whether he would exercise the option of paying the fine or of going to prison for twenty days. It seems to me sufficient to point out that, supposing the proceedings had been unobjectionable, except in respect of the excessive number of days in the sentence (a defect which would have suffered mechanical reduction by force of the statute), he would have been subjected to the same hardship, if hardship it be.

THE COURT refused the suspension.

Statutory Offences—Fortune-telling—Jurisdiction—Magistrate in Burgh Police Court—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. cap. 83), sec. 4—Prevention of Crime Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), secs. 15 and 17. Gerald v. M'Intyre.

By the Vagrancy Act, 1824, which applies only to England, it is made an offence, under sec. 4, to profess to tell fortunes by palmistry with intent to deceive. The Prevention of Crime Act, 1871, enacts, sec. 15, that the provisions of the section above mentioned "as amended by this section, shall be in force in Scotland," and sec. 17, that "any offence against this Act" may be prosecuted before a Court of summary jurisdiction.

Held that the expression in the latter section "any offence against this Act" did not apply exclusively to offences contained in the body of the Prevention of Crime Act, but included offences against sec. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, and that accordingly a magistrate sitting in a Burgh Police Court had jurisdiction to try a charge of professing to tell fortunes by palmistry with intent to deceive.

On 19th December 1912 Margaret Gerald was charged in the Police Court in Glasgow, at the instance of John James M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal, with professing to tell fortunes by palmistry with intent to deceive. HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Kinnear. Ld. Johnston.

The charge bore that the offence was committed "contrary to the Vagrancy Act, 1824, section 4,* as amended and made applicable to Scotland by the Prevention of Crime Act, 1871, section 15,† whereby you are liable to be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the meaning of said Vagrancy Act, 1824, and to be committed to prison with hard labour for any term not exceeding three calendar months."

When the complaint was called before the magistrate a preliminary objection was taken, inter alia, of no jurisdiction. The magistrate repelled this objection, and found the accused guilty as libelled and imposed a penalty of 10s. 6d., and, in default of payment, of seven days' imprisonment.

Thereafter, at the request of the accused, he stated a case for the opinion of the High Court upon, inter alia, the following question of law:—"(1) Was I right in repelling the plea of no jurisdiction?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 27th May 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The magistrate had no jurisdiction to try this offence. The offence was one created by section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, which did not apply to Scotland, and was an offence against that Act. It was not an offence against the Prevention of Crime Act, 1871. All that the latter statute effected, so far as the present case was concerned, was to apply section 4 of the

May 30, 1913. Vagrancy Act to Scotland, that is to say, to provide that the offences there described should be offences in Scotland,¹ but they remained offences against the Vagrancy Act. The expression "offences against this Act," used in section 17 of the Prevention of Crime Act, referred primarily and exclusively to the offences created by that Act,² and accordingly the provision of that section that "any offence against this Act may be prosecuted before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction" did not apply to the present case. Jurisdiction to try statutory offences was confined to Courts of universal jurisdiction, i.e., to the Sheriff Court and the High Court, unless it was expressly conferred upon some other Court.³ In the case of *Smith v. Neilson*⁴ a conviction of this offence obtained in a Police Court was quashed on the ground that the complaint was irrelevant, but the question of jurisdiction was not raised.

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

At advising on 30th May 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—In this case, although several questions are asked us, the argument was limited to the question of jurisdiction, and the point upon jurisdiction was a very small and sharp one.

The offence of being a rogue and a vagabond was created by the Vagrancy Act, 1824, section 4. That Act did not apply to Scotland; but the provisions of section 4 were amended and extended to Scotland by the 15th section of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1871. Section 15, referring to section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, says:—" . . . The provisions of the said section, as amended by this section, shall be in force in Scotland and Ireland." That, therefore, clearly introduces the offence as an offence in Scotland as well as in England. Then the 17th section of the same Act says this:—"Any offence against this Act may be prosecuted before a Court of summary jurisdiction, as follows:— . . . In Scotland, under the provisions of 'The Summary Procedure Act, 1864,' and any Act amending the same." And then the section goes on to say:—"Court of summary jurisdiction' shall in this Act mean and include any justice or justices of the peace, sheriff or sheriff-substitute, metropolitan or police magistrate, stipendiary, or other magistrate, or officer, by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by the Acts in this section mentioned or any Acts therein referred to. . . ."

Now practically the whole argument was limited to this very short point. It was said that the provisions of section 17 only apply to an offence against "this Act," that is to say, an offence which is in the body of the Prevention of Crime Act, and that an offence under "this Act" does not include an offence against the Vagrancy Act, which is only made applicable to Scotland by section 15 of the Prevention of Crime Act. I think that is far too narrow a construction, and would be against the principles of ordinary common sense. I think any offence against "this Act" means any offence which this Act makes an offence. Well, the particular thing charged in this case, which was not an offence before so far as Scotland was concerned, is made an offence by this Act. I am of opinion, therefore, that the ground urged against the conviction here was bad, and that the conviction must stand.

Statutory Offences—Keeping a brothel—Jurisdiction—Whether charge triable by a single magistrate—Sentence—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 69), sec. 13—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), secs. 403 and 431.

Held (by a full bench) that a charge of keeping a brothel contrary to section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, may be tried under section 431 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, before a single police magistrate; and that the magistrate is entitled to impose on the accused, if found guilty, a sentence of imprisonment for three months.

Observed that proceedings for the offence of keeping a brothel may also be taken under section 403 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, which provides for trial before the Sheriff, or two police magistrates, and limits the sentence of imprisonment to one of sixty days.

Jurisdiction—Complaint—Relevancy—Necessity of setting forth statute giving jurisdiction.

Held (by a full bench) that it is unnecessary to set forth in a complaint the particular statutory enactment which gives jurisdiction to the Court which tries the accused.

Procedure—Proof—Admissibility of evidence—Hearsay—Evidence of overheard conversations—Conversations part of res gestæ.

In a prosecution for keeping a house as a brothel the prosecutor examined as witnesses two policemen who repeated conversations overheard by them in the house in question. The accused objected to the evidence on the grounds that she was not present when the conversations took place, and that the persons whose conversations were overheard were not examined as witnesses.

Held that the evidence was competent, in respect that it was not led to prove the truth of the matters stated in the conversations, but merely to prove the fact that such conversations took place.

May 30, 1913. MRS JANE HEATH OR M'LAREN, Wardie Bank House, Boswall Road, Trinity, Edinburgh, was charged in the Police Court of the burgh of Leith on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, at the instance of John Macleod, burgh prosecutor, which set forth that during certain periods specified "in the house situated in Boswall Road aforesaid, occupied by you, you did keep a brothel, contrary to section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, whereby you are liable to a penalty not exceeding Twenty pounds, and in default of payment of said penalty, to imprisonment in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, or in the discretion of the Court to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour, in terms of the said section 13 of the said Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885."

HIGH COURT.

Lord Mackenzie.

At the trial in the Police Court a preliminary objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the Court, which was repelled by the Magistrate (J. H. Leslie Pennell), who, after hearing evidence, found the accused guilty as libelled, and sentenced her to three months' imprisonment.

She brought a bill of suspension in which she averred, inter alia: "6. At the trial the solicitor for the complainer objected to evidence being given by Inspector Jefferies and Detective Peebles, witnesses for the prosecutor, regarding conversations alleged to have been overheard by them between two women in the house of complainer, neither of whom were called by the prosecutor as witnesses. Further, the complainer's solicitor objected to such evidence in respect that the complainer was not present when such conversation is alleged to have taken place. The solicitor for the complainer further objected to another conversation alleged by said Inspector Jeffries and Detective Peebles to have taken place between a man and a woman in the house outwith complainer's presence. Neither said man nor woman referred to were produced as witnesses for the respondent. All said objections were repelled by said J. H. Leslie Pennell. Said conversation seriously influenced the said J. H. Leslie Pennell in his judgment."*

She stated the following pleas;—(1) The said Magistrate sitting in said Police Court had no jurisdiction to try said complaint.† (2)

* The following excerpt is taken from the record of proceedings made by the Magistrate:—

"In the course of the examination of Edward Jefferies, police inspector, Leith, a witness in this case, the burgh prosecutor put to him the following question: 'After the second woman entered the room did she complain to the other woman in the room about her trade being prejudiced by the accused introducing "short time" into the house.'

"Accused's agent objected to said questions, 'in respect that accused was not present and neither of parties conversing produced.'

"The Court repelled the objection.

"In the course of the continued examination of the said witness the prosecutor put to him the following question: 'What was the woman in the east bedroom complaining of?'

"Accused's agent objected to said question in respect that accused was not present and neither of parties conversing produced.

"The Court repelled this objection also."

which was incompetent, as in Statement of Fact No. 6.

On 7th March 1913 the case was heard before the Lord Justice-M'Laren v.
MacLeod.
Clerk, Lord Dewar, and Lord Hunter, who, at the conclusion of the argument on the question of jurisdiction, remitted the case to a full bench.

Thereafter on 28th and 30th May 1913 the case was heard before a bench of five Judges (the Lord Justice-General, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, Lord Johnston, and Lord Guthrie) on this point.

Argued for the complainer;—The Magistrate had no jurisdiction. Keeping a brothel was a statutory offence, and a statutory offence could only be tried by a Court with inherent universal jurisdiction,¹ or by a Court on which jurisdiction was conferred by the statute. The only Courts with inherent universal jurisdiction were the Court of Session and the Sheriff Court. The offence libelled here was a statutory offence constituted by section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, but that Act conferred no jurisdiction upon any Court, so that so far as regarded that Act jurisdiction was limited to the Court of Session and the Sheriff Court. It was said, however, that jurisdiction was conferred on the single Magistrate by section 431 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892; that, however, was not the case, because section 431 had to be read along with section 403, and, when so read, it was clear that it was merely explanatory of section 403, as directing the way in which the offence was to be tried by the Sheriff or the two Magistrates on whom jurisdiction was expressly conferred by section 403. Under section 403 the maximum penalty which the two Magistrates could impose was sixty days; under section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, the maximum penalty was three months; so that the respondent's contention as to the effect of section 431 would lead to the extraordinary result that a single Magistrate could impose a higher penalty than a

Sec. 403. “Suppression of Brothels.—The magistrate may . . . grant warrant to enter into . . . any house . . . which . . . the magistrate is satisfied there is reasonable ground for believing to be kept, managed, or used, or suffered to be used, as a brothel; and any constable . . . may take into custody . . . the occupier of such house . . . or any person found therein who either temporarily or permanently manages or assists in the management of such brothel, and every such person shall be liable on conviction before the sheriff or two magistrates of being the occupier of, or of temporarily or permanently managing, or assisting in the management of such brothel, to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, or to imprisonment, without the option of a fine, for any period not exceeding sixty days, and failing payment of any such penalty, to imprisonment not exceeding sixty days. . . .”

Sec. 431. “All offences committed within the burgh under the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 and 1889, and under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, in so far as it relates to the suppression of brothels, may be tried by the magistrate as police offences under complaint by the burgh prosecutor. . . .”

May 30, 1913. Court of two. It was the reasonable implication¹ of the words of the Acts that two Magistrates were necessary. In any event however, even if it was competent for a single Magistrate to sit, section 431 made it clear that he could only try the offence as "a police offence," which meant that the sentence which he was entitled to impose was limited to the maximum sentence for ordinary police offences, viz., sixty days. Further, and independently, the complaint was bad in that it did not libel section 431 which, it was argued, conferred the jurisdiction. The only section referred to in the complaint was section 13 of the Act of 1885, which certainly did not confer jurisdiction.

M'Laren v.
Macleod.

Argued for the respondent;—Admittedly if section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, had stood by itself contraventions of the section could only have been tried by the Court of Session or the Sheriff.² But section 13 was supplemented by section 431 of the Act of 1892, which clearly conferred upon a single Magistrate the right to try offences against section 13 of the Act of 1885, and to impose the penalty specified therein, viz., three months. It was not unusual to find a statute permitting a Police Magistrate in the case of some particular crime to impose a sentence greatly in excess of the ordinary Police Court maximum, viz., sixty days.³ It was quite true that proceedings might have been taken under section 403, which in itself contained a complete code entirely independent of the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885. In that event the Court would have been the Sheriff, or two Magistrates, and the maximum legal penalty would have been sixty days. The existence, however, of this alternative and independent method of procedure did not affect the method provided for by section 431, and such overlapping legislation was by no means uncommon. While it was necessary to specify the section which constituted the offence it was quite unnecessary and unusual to specify the section which conferred jurisdiction on the Court. It was probable that section 431 was inserted in the Act in consequence of the decision in Clark and Bendall v. Stuart.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is a bill of suspension and liberation against a conviction obtained against the suspender upon a complaint in the Police Court of the burgh of Leith, charging her with a contravention of section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. That section provides: "Any person who—(1) keeps or manages or acts or assists in the management of a brothel; or (2) being the tenant, lessee, or occupier of any premises, knowingly permits such premises or any part thereof to be used as a brothel or for the purposes of habitual prostitution . . . shall, on summary conviction in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, be liable—(1) to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, or, in the discretion of the Court, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour. . . ." Upon conviction the suspender was sentenced to a period of three months' imprisonment.

The first objection that is put forward is that the Police Magistrate had no jurisdiction to entertain a complaint under section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. If that section had stood alone I have no May 30, 1913. doubt that this objection would have been good, because the offence being ^{M'Laren v. Macleod.} a new statutory offence, and there being no mention of jurisdiction, it follows from what has been laid down on many occasions, and notably in the case ^{Lord Justice-General.} of M'Pherson v. Boyd,¹ that the only Courts possessing jurisdiction would have been those Courts which have an inherent jurisdiction, of which the Police Court is not one. But by section 431 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, it is provided as follows: "All offences committed within the burgh under the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 and 1889, and under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, in so far as it relates to the suppression of brothels, may be tried by the magistrate as police offences under complaint by the burgh prosecutor. . . ." That section appears to me, in plain terms which cannot be avoided, to give a jurisdiction to the Magistrate which otherwise he would not have had.

Two arguments have been advanced against this view. The first was that, inasmuch as section 403 of the same Act provides that it is an offence to keep a brothel and provides for punishment upon conviction before the Sheriff or two Magistrates, it must therefore be held that section 431, which says that the complaint may be tried by "the Magistrate," means that it must be tried in the same way as offences under section 403, that is to say by two Magistrates, and that as this case was not tried by two Magistrates the conviction is bad. I do not think that argument is sound. I think that sections 403 and 431 are perfectly separate and distinct sections. No doubt it comes to this, that there is overlapping legislation, that is to say there are two methods in which you may proceed against the brothel-house keeper; but overlapping legislation, although it may be due to bad draftsmanship which ought not to have occurred, does not invalidate an enactment; and if, when we find there has been overlapping legislation, we were to hold that one or other of the overlapping provisions must go, we should have to make a great inroad upon previous decisions. It seems to me that proceedings could have been taken under section 403, in which case two Magistrates must have sat if the case were not brought before the Sheriff. But the proceedings were equally well taken under section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, jurisdiction for which is given by section 431.

The next objection advanced by Mr Moncrieff was to this effect:—Inasmuch as section 431 enacts that the case may be tried by the Magistrate as a police offence, that necessarily means that no heavier punishment can be inflicted than is usually given for a police offence. I think that this argument, although ingenious, is not sound. In my opinion the expression "as police offences" merely means that the case may be tried in the Burgh Police Court as other offences are there tried, and there is no rule of law that for a police offence as such eo nomine no greater punishment can be given than sixty days' imprisonment. The jurisdiction and powers of all Courts of summary jurisdiction are now regulated by the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, which has superseded the earlier statutes dealing with these matters. Section 7 of the Act of 1908

May 30, 1913. provides :—"The jurisdiction and powers of all courts of summary criminal jurisdiction, except in so far as the same may be altered or modified by this or any future Act, shall remain as at the commencement of this Act, and the justice of peace court and justices of the peace, and also any judge of police or burgh magistrate shall, without prejudice to any other or wider powers conferred by statute, be entitled to exercise within their respective jurisdictions power on convicting of a common law offence—(1) to award imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding sixty days." The words "without prejudice to any other or wider powers conferred by statute" were inserted, I think, with the very purpose of keeping intact the wider powers which may be conferred by some other statute. Here there were larger powers conferred by the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885.

M'Laren v.
Macleod.

Lord Justice-
General.

The only other objection to the conviction was that upon the face of the complaint there was no mention of section 431 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892. I do not think there was any need to mention that section. It is, of course, always necessary to mention in the complaint the particular section of the statute which the accused is charged with contravening, because he must be given fair notice of the offence for which he is about to be tried; but I cannot think that it was necessary—nor can I recollect of ever seeing it in our practice—that there should be a citation of the statutes which confer jurisdiction upon the Court trying the offence.

On the whole matter I think that, so far as the objections hitherto urged before us are concerned, the ruling of the Magistrate was perfectly right. I understand that there are other objections upon the merits, and these we shall take up at a separate hearing.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion which your Lordship has pronounced. Two points appeared to me to be of importance. The first was the one to which your Lordship last referred, namely whether or not it is necessary in a complaint to set forth the particular statutory enactment under which the Court has jurisdiction to try the case. I am very clearly of opinion that it is not necessary, and that it is not according to our practice to do so.

The only other point which seems to me to have some plausibility arises under section 431. Mr Moncrieff argued that the words "police offences" should be read as limiting the punishment to the ordinary punishment for a police offence. There is some plausibility in this contention, but I am quite satisfied with your Lordship that it is not one which can be reasonably maintained. The Act, which your Lordship has quoted, expressly declares that the powers of the Magistrate, as regards higher punishment than is ordinarily given in the Police Court, shall depend upon the statute which fixes the punishment. We know quite well that in the Police Court there are many cases in which the Police Magistrate, whose ordinary power is limited to sixty days, has nevertheless the power of inflicting a much heavier punishment.

LORD DUNDAS, LORD JOHNSTON, and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

The case was then heard before the Lord Justice-General, Lord

Kinnear, and Lord Mackenzie, on the question raised by the complainant's third plea in law. May 30, 1913.

Argued for the complainer;—The evidence of the police-constables was incompetent. It was wholly hearsay evidence, and was objectionable on the grounds that the persons who were engaged in the conversations had not been examined as witnesses, and that the conversations had taken place outwith the presence of the accused, who had thus no chance of testing the evidence. The case of Ewing v. Earl of Mar,¹ founded on by the respondent, was distinguishable from the present, because in that case one of the two boys, one or other of whom had uttered the exclamation, was dead, and the other could not be found, and the boys at the time the exclamation was uttered formed part of a crowd which could not be summoned to give evidence. Here the constables could have identified the speaker easily.

Argued for the respondent;—The evidence had been properly admitted, and was not "hearsay" of the kind prohibited. It was only being used to prove a fact in the case, viz., that certain conversations had taken place which were part of the res gestæ, and which threw light on the character of the house. The evidence was not used for the purpose of proving the truth of any of the facts stated in the conversations. If that had been its purpose it might have been incompetent.²

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This conviction is objected to on the ground that evidence was improperly admitted. The evidence which was said to be improperly admitted was that of certain constables; while the constables were listening outside this house they heard certain conversations going on between some of the inmates, and the prosecutor asked them what it was they heard. That was objected to upon the ground that it was not said that the accused—the present complainer—was present, and that it was not proposed to call the persons who took part in those conversations. If the matter depended upon the truth of what was said in the conversations, that, I think, would be a good objection; but I take it that those conversations became relevant not in respect of their truth, but of their character. I think they really came into the same category as any noises or exclamations which were heard, and which might have been testified to by those who were watching. The weight that should be given to them is another matter, but I cannot think it was wrong to admit them. I hope that it is clear that there is nothing in this judgment to countenance the idea that hearsay conversations may be used as evidence to prove what is contained in them. I look upon this as a mere question of something that showed what I may call the atmosphere of the place, and nothing more. I think, therefore, the conviction should stand.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely concur with your Lordship. I think the evidence was admissible. I do not think it could properly be described as hearsay, although that is no doubt an ambiguous term, because the thing to

May 30, 1913. be proved is not that the witness heard other people making statements which it is proposed to adduce as testimony in the cause, but simply that he in fact heard certain things. The thing to be proved was that a certain conversation took place. That that was relevant to the question at issue seems to me not doubtful, because the question is whether a house was of a certain character or not, and it is evidence tending to show the affirmative that certain things are done and conversations heard in that house. But if the fact that the conversation took place is relevant at all, there is no difference between the way of proving that fact and the way of proving any other fact. If oral evidence is admissible it must be the direct evidence of witnesses who speak to what they themselves heard or saw. But the evidence of a man who depones that he heard a certain thing said is just as direct and as little to be confounded with hearsay as the evidence of one who depones that he saw a certain thing happen.

M'Laren v. Macleod.

Lord Kinnear.

I agree entirely with your Lordship in the chair that the inference to be drawn from the fact so proved is a totally different matter, but with that we have nothing to do.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The question in the case was as to the character of the house, and that of course depended upon the character of the people who were frequenting it. I take it that the evidence here has a direct bearing upon the character of the people who were engaging in this conversation, and in that way reflected upon the character of the complainer. This is the point of the evidence. We have nothing to do with the truth or falsity of what was said against the complainer during the conversation. I am unable to see that the objection taken that the accused was not present was a good objection.

Circumstances in which the Court refused to interfere with a conviction where evidence had been led of such a voluntary statement. Hodgson v. Macpherson.

Statutory Offences—Betting—Use of rooms for the receipt of money for purposes of betting—Betting Acts, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 119), secs. 1 and 3, and 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 15), sec. 4.

An accused was charged with contravening the Betting Acts by keeping a room at one address and a room at another address "for the purpose of money . . . being received . . . as the consideration for an undertaking . . . to pay thereafter money on events . . . relating to games. . . ." He was found guilty as libelled.

Held that the conviction was good, although all the money was received and all the correspondence relating to bets was conducted at one room, while the other was used exclusively for settling up accounts.

Stoddart v. Hawke, [1902] 1 K. B. 353, applied.

WILLIAM HODGSON senior and William Hodgson junior were charged in the Police Court at Edinburgh on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, at the instance of Charles Angus Macpherson, public prosecutor. The charge in the complaint was:—
"You are charged at the instance of the complainer that you, William Hodgson senior, being the occupier of, or person using, a room or office at 13 St James Square, Edinburgh, and a room or office at 15 Dalziel Place, Edinburgh aforesaid, between 21st January and 1st February 1913, both days inclusive, did open, keep, or use said rooms or offices for the purpose of money or other valuable thing being received by you, or on your behalf, as the consideration for an undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay thereafter money on events or contingencies of or relating to games of football: And you, William Hodgson junior, time above libelled, did assist the said William Hodgson senior in the conduct of the business of said rooms or offices, opened, kept, or used for the purpose aforesaid; contrary to the Betting Act, 1853, sections 1 and 3, as extended to Scotland by the Betting Act, 1874,* and you, William Hodgson senior, have been previously convicted as in the list annexed; whereby you are each liable to the penalties set forth in section 3 of the said Betting Act, 1853."

The accused having pleaded not guilty a proof was led. The Judge of Police found the accused guilty as libelled, and at their request stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—

"The following facts were proved or admitted:—That the appellants are father and son. That during the period libelled the senior appellant was the occupier of a room or office at 15 Dalziel Place, and of another at 13 St James Square, both in Edinburgh. That during the period libelled both premises were watched by the police, who saw a large quantity of correspondence being delivered daily by post at 15 Dalziel Place. That both appellants were frequently seen to go thereafter from 15 Dalziel Place to 13 St James Square with bulky parcels, which the police took to be correspondence, and where they subsequently remained for a considerable time. That on Friday, 24th January 1913, the police obtained a warrant to search said premises at 13 St James Square, in terms of section 11 of the Betting Act, 1853, and on Saturday, 1st February, Inspector John Whyte and Police-constable William Webster proceeded to execute same.* They arrived at 13 St James Square at about 9.30 P.M., and entered the appellants' premises, which consisted of a single apartment fitted up as an office. On the door was a name-plate, bearing the name of the senior appellant. The latter opened the door to the police. Both appellants were engaged in dealing with correspondence. The junior appellant was sitting at a desk engaged in examining the same. Before him was a bundle of football coupons after described. That on entry the inspector informed the appellants that he was in possession of a search warrant. That the senior appellant dispensed with the reading thereof, remarking that he was satisfied it would be in order. That the police officers thereafter examined the papers in the room, which included a large quantity of football betting coupons, postal orders, and envelopes. The coupons and the postal orders were made up in separate piles, and the envelopes were mostly in a waste-paper basket. The envelopes were all addressed to 'Mr William Hodgson, 15 Dalziel Place, Edinburgh,' this superscription being in the great majority of cases lithographed thereon. The coupons each contained, printed on the one side thereof, a list of football matches played, or announced to be played, on said 1st February. They also bore written in ink or pencil the name and address of the sender, figures or marks indicating the team or teams which he backed to win or draw, as the case might be, and a note of the amount sent by him along with the bet. On the other side were printed a number of rules for the guidance of intending bettors, with instructions as to latest hours of postage and similar details. The coupons had a perforated edge, which indicated that another portion had been thereto attached at some anterior date. The individual witnesses—to whom reference is later made—stated that the attachment in the case of the coupons which they identified as having been sent by them, contained, inter alia, the name of the senior appellant, and his address as at 15 Dalziel Place, together with a statement of the odds which the senior appellant was prepared to give against clients correctly forecasting the results of the matches. It was also proved that he was in the habit of sending out these coupons entire to his clients. That Inspector White seized under his warrant 34 betting coupons from the pile referred to, and 21 postal orders from the pile of postal orders referred to.

"The agent for the appellants objected to the reception of the postal orders as productions, maintaining that they were incompetently seized under the aforesaid warrant, in respect that there was nothing to indicate that they fell within the category of 'lists, cards, or other documents relating to racing or betting found in said premises.' I repelled the objection and admitted the said orders as productions, holding (1) that they were documents relating to betting, and competently seized; and (2) that whether competently or incompetently seized they were unexceptionable as evidence against the appellants. June 4, 1913.

Hodgson v.
Macpherson.

"Many of the postal orders bore the stamp of the post office of towns or districts from which betting coupons, included in the aforementioned bundle of 34, bore to have been dispatched, and in numerous instances the value of said order coincided with the amount of the bet contained in a coupon bearing to be dispatched from the same town or district. Thus, for example, a coupon bearing to be from a client in Saline enclosing a bet of one shilling, obviously corresponded to a postal order for one shilling, bearing the post mark of Saline. That there were also found in the premises a number of 'investment forms,' bearing to be used by the senior appellant in settling with clients. Six of these were seized and produced. Three envelopes were also seized, bearing the lithographed name and address of the senior appellant.

"That while Inspector Whyte and Police-constable Webster were examining the whole documents in said premises with a view to satisfying themselves as to the nature of the transactions in which the appellants were engaged, and with a view to seizure, the senior appellant indicating certain documents said, 'There is no use taking these away, for they refer to my credit business.' Inspector Whyte replied that he accepted the statement, and would not disturb them. It was admitted that the appellants carried on a credit betting business in horse races, and a great quantity of printed and other material, relative to this business, was found on the premises. Immediately thereafter, referring to the football coupons, Inspector Whyte said that he was surprised that the senior appellant was engaged in the football business. Thereupon the said appellant stated that he was sorry he had started it, but that he had done so because some of his clients who did business with him in horse-racing, wanted to start football betting, and had suggested that, if he did not issue coupons, they would transfer their patronage to other bookmakers who were conducting that business. Before making the said statements, the senior appellant had not been cautioned by Inspector Whyte that anything he might say would be used in evidence against him.

"In the course of the examination of Inspector Whyte as a witness for the prosecution, the agent for the appellants objected to the foregoing evidence of the appellants' statements being received in respect of the absence of caution, and he renewed his objection when Police-constable Webster was examined to like effect. I was satisfied that the statements were voluntarily made by the said appellant, and repelled the objection in each instance.

"On the completion of the evidence as to the police observations and raid, four witnesses were examined by the respondent to speak to specific transactions with the senior appellant. It was proved by them that they had had numerous betting transactions on football matches with the senior appellant prior to the date of the police raid, said transactions being conducted by correspondence with him at the premises at 15 Dalziel Place. Several of them had received his coupons from fellow workmen, and after a first transaction thereafter regularly received from the senior appellant coupons bearing his name and address as at 15 Dalziel Place aforesaid, with a statement of the odds he was prepared to offer thereto annexed, and enclosed therewith a stamped addressed envelope, bearing lithographed thereon his name and address. Said coupons were similar to the coupons seized by the police. On every occasion on which a bet was sent a postal order was enclosed for the amount thereof. Said coupons were posted prior to the matches being played, and the money was sent on the footing that, if successful, the senders would receive from the appellants the winnings due. When winnings were due they were received early the following week. Each witness identified a coupon which had been sent by him on 31st January or 1st February 1913, relating to the bet then made by him on football matches to be played on said 1st February 1913. Said coupons were among the number seized by the police. Each witness stated that he had enclosed therewith a postal order or orders, for an amount corresponding to the sum invested by him.

"I held that, on the facts proved, the appellants were guilty as libelled. I therefore convicted both appellants. The senior appellant admitted the previous convictions libelled. I fined the senior appellant £100, with the alternative of two months' imprisonment, and the junior appellant £20, with the alternative of ten days' imprisonment."

The questions of law were:—(1) Was I right in repelling the objection to the competency of receiving the postal orders in question as productions? (2) Was I right in repelling the objection to the evidence of Inspector Whyte and Police-constable Webster as to the statements made by the senior appellant on the occasion of the police raid? (3) Did the facts proved infer a contravention of the statute, as libelled?"

The appeal was heard before the High Court on 4th June 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) Postal orders were not ejusdem generis with "lists" or "cards," the seizure of which had been authorised; the postal orders had, therefore, been unlawfully seized,¹ and consequently could not be used in evidence.² (2) Evidence of statements made by the senior panel to the police inspector without caution should not have been admitted.³ (3) There was no proof of the offence charged in the complaint having been committed at 13 St James Square. No money was received there, and the place was only used for settling up accounts. All bets were made and all money was received at 15 Dalziel Place, and the transactions were in every respect completed there, the only business done at 13 St James Square being purely accounting. The undernoted cases established the appellants' contention on this point.⁴

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

LORD KINNEAR.—There are three different objections stated to this conviction. The charge is of using a room or office at 13 St James Square, Edinburgh, and a room or office at 15 Dalziel Place, Edinburgh, for the purpose of conducting the business of betting—the words of the charge are June 4, 1913. “for the purpose of money or other valuable thing being received by you, ^{Hodgson v.} or on your behalf, as the consideration for an undertaking, promise, or ^{Macpherson.} agreement, express or implied, to pay thereafter money on events or contingencies of or relating to games of football,” that is to say, betting on games of football. The senior appellant, who is charged with this offence, is the occupier of both these rooms, one in St James Square and the other in Dalziel Place. The conviction, however, is challenged upon three different grounds.

In the first place, it is said that in the course of the proof certain postal orders produced by the prosecution, which had been seized by an officer under a search warrant, and which were produced as evidence tending to show that betting had been carried on by the appellant in one or other of these houses, ought not to have been produced, or that the production of these postal orders ought not to have been allowed, because the officer who recovered them was acting in excess of the power given him by his warrant. I do not think myself that he was. It appears to me that, prima facie, all the documents that were recovered were admissible to prove the fact in issue. Their decisive value might be determined only in the course of the trial, but they all, prima facie, bore upon the matter in issue, and were quite within the words of the warrant as I read it. The warrant enables the officer to seize all lists, cards, or other documents relating to racing or betting found on the premises, and if he finds lists and coupons on the premises, and postal orders and sums of money, I think he is quite entitled to take the postal orders as well as the coupons as being within the scope of his warrant. But, if that were doubtful, I am clearly of opinion that, being seized and produced at the trial, they were quite admissible as evidence, whatever might be their weight, for the purpose of proving the case alleged against the appellant.

The second point taken against the conviction relates to evidence given by a police inspector who had executed the search warrant, and who, in the course of executing it, is said to have remarked to the senior appellant, in reference to the football coupons, that he was surprised that he should be engaged in that kind of business. It is not put in the shape of a question. He did not ask a question demanding an answer, but made an observation on the nature of the appellant's business which it was quite open for the appellant to take no notice of. He made an answer, however, to the effect that he was sorry he had started the business, but that he had done so because some of his clients who did business with him in horse-racing wanted to start football betting, and had suggested that if he did not issue coupons they would transfer their patronage to other book-makers who were conducting that business.

Now it is said that that evidence ought not to have been allowed. I confess I do not find myself in a position to determine whether the question put by the prosecutor in the course of the examination which elicited that statement, was permissible or not. We do not know how the evidence came out. All we know is that the appellant made that statement. I cannot say that I think that that mere fact is in itself sufficient ground for objecting to the conviction. In the first place I think that the question is June 4, 1913. in a totally different position from those which were considered in the Court of Justiciary, where, upon the trial of persons accused of grave criminal offences, it was held that questions by a criminal officer ought not to have been put, and that answers given to them ought not to have been received as evidence. The ground of judgment in these cases is that a criminal officer is not entitled to examine a person suspected of a crime in order to obtain confessions or admissions from the criminal, and so in fact to obtain from him what is to serve the purpose of a declaration without giving him the protection of the Magistrate, before whom alone declarations have to be taken. That seems to me to be a rule of procedure which is altogether inapplicable to this kind of question. The accused in this case was, or might have been, a witness for himself in the course of the trial. He had every opportunity of disputing what the police officer is alleged to have said he did say, and no injustice can be done by allowing the evidence. The Magistrate says that he is quite satisfied that the remark was made ultroneously by the accused. But, assuming that the evidence ought not to have been led, I do not think that the appellant makes his case even on that assumption, because the judgment proceeds on the facts proved irrespective of the observation of the appellant as to why he had undertaken this trade. There was evidence upon which the Magistrate was entitled, if he was satisfied, to convict.

There is a third objection which goes beyond either of these two. It is said that the alleged contravention is not proved because the charge is of "using a room or office at 13 St James Square, Edinburgh, and a room or office at 15 Dalziel Place, Edinburgh," between certain dates, "for the purpose of money or other valuable thing being received by you, or on your behalf, as the consideration for an undertaking" to pay bets on football matches. It is said that there is no evidence that any bet was made at one of these places, because all that is proved is that the appellant made his bets by correspondence in the house at 15 Dalziel Place, and received answers in that place, and that he only settled up his transactions at 13 St James Square. Accordingly, it is said there is no offence relevantly charged with reference to 13 St James Square at all, because it is not alleged that he received money there or made bets there, but only that he settled his accounts there after getting his money.

I think that objection is unsuccessful, because of the ground of judgment very clearly brought out in the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Stoddart v. Hawke,¹ where it was decided that the Betting Act of 1853 creates an offence constituted by keeping a house for the purpose of money being received by or on behalf of the keeper of the house as the consideration for undertakings to pay thereafter money on events relating to horse-races or games, and that to constitute an offence under section 1 it is not necessary that the money should be intended to be received at the house itself, nor need the intended place of receipt be within the United Kingdom. The question was whether a man who kept an office for the purpose of betting in Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, London, was or was not within the scope of the Act, notwithstanding that the money was received not in London but in Holland. The Court held that the case was within the Act. The June 4, 1913. ground of judgment is given by Lord Alverstone, C.J., who says the defendant was charged with having kept an office for the purpose of money being received by him or on his behalf as a consideration for undertakings of the kind therein prohibited, and that the facts were sufficient to bring the case within the section. And then he says¹ that, "having regard to the preamble of the Act and the judgments in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Company, Limited,² the section is to be understood as prohibiting the keeping of a house for the purpose of the receipt of money wherever that receipt may be, and that it would defeat the obvious intention of the Legislature if after the words 'for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received,' we were to read in the words 'at that house.'" It appears to me that that judgment, which, apart from any weight it may derive from what was said in the House of Lords in the case of Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Company, Limited,² is itself of great authority, is directly applicable to this case. The charge is not that the appellant used the room at 13 St James Square for the purpose of receiving money in that place, but that he used the room for the purpose of receiving money in respect of the undertakings that he gave, wherever the money might be got. On the whole matter I think that the questions should be answered in the affirmative.

Hodgson v.
Macpherson.
Lord Kinnear.

LORD JOHNSTON concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. In regard to what was said when Inspector Whyte and Police-constable Webster were on the premises, if it had appeared that either the inspector or the police-constable had put any question or had made any observation for the purpose of getting the Hodgsons to make any statement to be used as evidence against them, it would have been for the Judge trying the case to take care that that evidence was not brought out. There is nothing of that kind on the case as stated to us; indeed, the Judge who tried the case expressly says that he was satisfied that the statement was voluntarily given. With regard to the second question I think there is no ground for interfering with the judgment.

THE COURT answered the questions in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

Held that, whereas under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892, 1903, and 1911, town-councils are empowered to make bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing ice-cream shops and other places of public refreshment in burghs, and to impose a penalty for each breach not exceeding forty shillings, county councils under the same Acts and under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, are empowered to make like bye-laws for counties, but to impose a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

A bye-law of a county council made it an offence to keep premises open later than an hour specified. Held that a complaint which simply set forth that the accused kept his premises open after the hour specified contrary to the bye-law was relevant, and an objection that the purposes for which they were kept open ought to have been stated repelled.

HIGH COURT. FERRUCIO LENA, 46 Rankin Street, Carluke, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court of Lanarkshire on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, at the instance of John Marr Davidson, procurator-fiscal. The charge in the complaint was "that you, being the person registered with the County Council of the county of Lanark, to keep or use the premises occupied by you at 53 High Street, Carluke aforesaid, as a place of public refreshment, in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, sections 82 and 97, duly adopted by the said county council, and as amended by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, did, on 8th March 1913, after 10 o'clock P.M., keep open your said premises at 53 High Street, Carluke aforesaid, contrary to the bye-laws made under said Burgh Police Acts, and section 57 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,* on 7th June 1912, by the said county council, and confirmed by His Majesty's Secretary for Scotland on 2nd January 1913, particularly No. 1 of said bye-laws†; whereby you are liable to the Objections stated to the competency and to the relevancy of the complaint having been repelled, the accused pleaded guilty, and was fined £3. At his request a case was stated for appeal.

The case set forth:—

"The appellant appeared along with Mr J. K. Murray, writer, Motherwell, who objected to the competency of the complaint on the grounds that (1) the bye-laws are ultra vires of the county council; (2) the Act under which they are made does not authorise the county council inflicting a penalty for the non-observance of the bye-laws; and (3) the penalty stated in said bye-laws exceeds the statutory limit.

"The appellant's agent also stated the following objections to the relevancy of the complaint, viz.:—Want of specification in respect it is not stated whether the shop in question was kept open (a) for sale for consumption on the premises; (b) for sale for consumption off the premises; and (c) whether any sale took place at all.

"After the respondent was heard in reply to the objections stated, the Court repelled the same, whereupon the appellant pleaded guilty and was fined three pounds, and in default of payment, twenty days' imprisonment. The fine was paid."

The questions of law were:—" (1) Was the Court right in repelling the foresaid objections as to the competency of the complaint; and (2) Was the Court right in repelling the foresaid objections to the relevancy of the complaint?"

The appeal was heard before the High Court on 4th June 1913.

The arguments addressed to the Court sufficiently appear from the opinion of Lord Kinnear.¹

At advising on 5th June 1913,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is an appeal against a conviction for breach of certain bye-laws made by the County Council of Lanarkshire for preventing premises, occupied as places of public refreshment, being kept open contrary to the regulations of the bye-laws.

The prosecution is instituted under the Burgh Police Acts, 1903 and 1911; but I think we are concerned only with the Act of 1903, because the Act of 1911 does nothing more for the prosecutor than extend to places of public refreshment provisions which were, under the previous Act, applicable only to places for the sale of ice creams and aerated waters. But I do not understand that there is any dispute that, if the Act of 1903, pro-

"(5) Every person who shall offend against any of the foregoing bye-laws shall be liable in a penalty not exceeding five pounds for each offence."

The question, therefore, really is.—What does the Act of 1903 allow?

Lena v.
Davidson.

Lord Kinnear

Now, there is no appeal upon the merits of this conviction—assuming that the proceedings were competent—because the conviction proceeds upon the confession of the accused, but it is said that the proceedings were incompetent upon various grounds.

The statement of the appellant's objections in the stated case is not perhaps very explicit, but it was very clearly explained to us by his counsel at the bar, and I have no doubt that it was quite clearly explained to the magistrates. The main objection is that the bye-laws were either ultra vires of the County Council inasmuch as they are not entitled to inflict any penalty for the non-observance of their prohibition against the keeping open of places of public refreshment, or that, if the County Council were entitled to impose a penalty, the penalty which the bye-law inflicts is beyond the limit allowed by the statute.

Now that of course depends upon the construction of the provisions of the Act of 1903. The enactment upon which the County Council proceeded in making these bye-laws is contained in the 97th section of the Act of 1903. That section allows a county council to adopt certain sections of the Act which in their terms are applicable not to county councils and counties but only to burghs and town-councils and in particular to adopt section 82, which in the marginal note is described as the section relating to "Ice-cream shops, &c., to be registered." Accordingly in order to see what the powers of the County Council are, we must go to section 82, which provides by the first subsection that ice-cream shops are to be registered, and subjects to a penalty anybody who keeps an ice-cream shop which has not been registered. In the second subsection it is enacted that section 316 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892 shall be deemed to confer power on the town-council to make bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing of premises registered under this section, and that the provisions of the Burgh Police Act of 1892 relating to bye-laws and the confirmation and the enforcement thereof shall apply accordingly.

Accordingly that sends us to the Act of 1892, and in particular to section 316. That section allows police commissioners to make bye-laws for certain purposes. The commissioners may, from time to time, make bye-laws as they think fit "for the purposes aftermentioned," and then follows a list (first) of general purposes and (second) of more special sanitary purposes. Now, these purposes had nothing to do with the bye-laws which the town-council is specially authorised to make by section 82 of the 1903 Act. They are bye-laws for different purposes altogether. But what the 1903 Act enacts is that this section, which provides the other things, shall be deemed to confer power to make bye-laws with regard to the opening and closing of the places of refreshment referred to in section 82. Therefore the reference to section 316 of the Act of 1892 is simply for the purpose of bringing in an express power to make bye-laws. The bye-laws which are authorised by a reference to this Act are bye-laws defined not by section 316 itself but expressly defined by section 82. But then that section provides, as I have said, not only that section 316 of the 1892 June 5, 1913. Act shall be deemed to confer power to make bye-laws on the subject in Lena v. Davidson. question, but that the provisions of that Act relating to bye-laws and the confirmation and enforcement thereof shall apply accordingly.

Lord Kinnear.

Now following upon section 316, which is a bare power to make the bye-laws, there are subsequent sections, which are really consequential and ancillary, by which the bye-laws may be enforced by the imposition of penalties; and in particular the immediately following section 317 enacts that the magistrates and commissioners by the bye-laws authorised by the Act may impose such reasonable penalties as they think fit not exceeding 40s. for each breach of such bye-law. And then there follows a certain series of what I have called ancillary provisions for the registration, confirmation, and enforcement of these bye-laws. The material consideration is that, when you read these two sections together, what the statute of 1903 authorises town-councils to do is to make bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing of the premises registered under that section, and to make such provision for the confirmation and enforcement of these bye-laws as the statute of 1892 allows. The practical effect is that a town-council under this Act may pass bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing of the premises, and may make penalties for punishing the offence of disobeying these bye-laws by a penalty not exceeding 40s. That is the position of the town-council.

Now, as I have said, these provisions, subject to qualifications to which I shall refer immediately, may be adopted by a county council. And the County Council of Lanarkshire has adopted them. But then they have made a bye-law which inflicts a penalty of a much larger amount than that authorised by the Act of 1892, for their penalty is a sum not exceeding £5 instead of not exceeding 40s. The real question—at least the most important question—is, whether that is authorised by their statute or not.

Now, that depends upon the 97th section, which authorises the adoption of the 82nd and provides that a county council may by resolution adopt certain sections of this Act, one of which is section 82, and, after a date to be specified in the resolution the adopted section shall have effect throughout the county, with the substitution of “county” for “burgh” and “county council” for “town-council,” and of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, and section 57 thereof, for the principal Act, that is for the Burgh Police Act of 1892 and section 316 thereof.

Now in the application of section 97 of the Act of 1903, it does not appear to me to be in the least degree doubtful what Parliament means by that provision. In the first place section 82 is to be adopted for the county; and therefore the first clause, which requires that “every person who shall keep, or suffer to be kept or used,” or who shall use a house “as an ice-cream shop or aerated water shop, without being registered in a register to be kept by the town-council, who are hereby required to keep a register for that purpose,” is liable to a penalty of £5—that is made applicable to the county by simply substituting the words “county council” for the words “town-council.” But then that is not the clause which enables bye-laws to be made. It is the immediately succeeding subsection, subsection 2, and we are to read that according to the prescription of section 97,

June 5, 1913. substituting as we read it the words "57" and "1889" for the words "316" and "principal Act." So far as regards burghs, the 82nd section required
 Lena v. that they should go to section 316 of the principal Act—that is, the Act of Davidson. 1892—in order to find their power to make bye-laws in regard to the hours
 Lord Kinnear. of opening and closing the premises, and that the provisions of that Act should apply to the enforcement of these bye-laws.

Now, if we read that provision as section 97 requires us to read it, the enactment is: "Section 57 of the Local Government Act of 1889 shall be deemed to confer power on the county council to make bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing of premises registered under this section, . . . and the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1889, relating to bye-laws and the confirmation and enforcement thereof shall apply accordingly." That appears to me to be quite as plain an enactment as words can make it; and therefore if we are to ascertain the powers of the County Council in this matter, we are plainly to go to the Act of 1889.

Now the Local Government Act of 1889 provides in section 57: "(1) The council of a county may from time to time make such bye-laws as to them shall seem meet for the administration of the affairs of the county, for the prevention of vagrancy, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner, . . . and may thereby appoint such penalties, not exceeding in any case £5, as they deem necessary for the punishment of offences against the same." Now it was said upon the construction of that Act, that the purposes for which the county are here empowered to make bye-laws have nothing to do with the hours at which places of public refreshment may be open. It is said that they are confined to bye-laws for the prevention of vagrancy and for the suppression of nuisances and also for the administration of the affairs of the county, and that none of these expressions will cover regulations for fixing the hours during which shops may or may not be kept open. If the question depended upon the construction of that clause taken by itself, I must say that for myself I should have the greatest difficulty in holding that you could bring in a power to restrict the hours of keeping business premises open under any reasonable construction of the words "administration of the affairs of the county," or "prevention of vagrancy," or "the suppression of nuisances." I should, to say the least, have the greatest doubt whether any of these provisions could be made to apply. But then that does not appear to me to be of the slightest consequence in this case, because we are not sent to section 57 for the purpose of discovering the particular regulations which it empowers the county to make. That is fixed by the 82nd section of the Act of 1903. We are not to construe this clause separately as an isolated provision regulating the powers of the county council in this matter, but we are to read it into section 97, which says that section 57 is to be substituted for section 316 and the Local Government Act for the Act of 1892. Section 57 of the Local Government Act shall be deemed to confer power on the county council to make bye-laws in this matter.

Now that appears to me to be an end of the whole question. Whatever construction we might put upon section 57, if we were reading it apart from the later statute and upon its own terms, we are compelled by the statute of 1903 to deem that it means this particular thing which read—ing it by itself without the aid of the later statute we should not understand it to mean. It is to be held that this clause which empowers the county council to make bye-laws defines the purpose for which they may make such bye-laws as including, among other things, bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing of premises registered under section 82. I therefore cannot say that I have any doubt as to the construction of these three statutes taken together.

June 5, 1913.
 Lena v.
 Davidson.
 Lord Kinnear.

But then it was argued that section 316 of the Act of 1892, which is specially excluded from consideration by the 97th section of the 1903 Act, is not a section empowering penalties to be made, and that the section which authorises bye-laws to be enforced by penalties is section 317 which is not mentioned. Now that again, I think, might be a very forcible observation if the clause which requires us to read out of the 82nd section any reference to the Act of 1892 were limited to section 316 of that Act.
 But it is not so. We are to substitute not only section 57 for section 316, but, wherever the provisions of the principal Act are mentioned, we are to substitute for the principal Act the Local Government Act of 1889; and therefore we are to read that the provisions of that Act are to be applied in so far as they relate to the confirmation and enforcement of the bye-laws which the section, as adopted by the county council, authorises. The original introduction of section 317 into section 82 for this primary purpose of authorising bye-laws by a town-council was to enable the bye-laws which a town-council might make to be enforced by penalties. It is still necessary that some provision should be found enabling the bye-laws which the county council will make to be enforced by penalties also. But then for that purpose we are sent not to the Act of 1892 but to the Act of 1889.
 The terms of that Act seem to me to be quite clear.

Now it is objected with some reason that the result of that reading of the Act is to enable a county council to impose very much heavier penalties than a town-council may impose for offences of exactly the same kind. It is said to be anomalous that keeping an ice-cream shop open in the county should be an offence to be punished by a penalty of £5, whereas if it is kept open in the town, it is punishable only by a penalty of 40s. I do not feel called upon to consider the force of that reasoning at all, nor to conjecture why the Legislature made that distinction between burghs and counties. I do not know, and there is nothing in the Act itself to show, why the difference is made. I know nothing about it. But the material fact is that a difference is made and intended, for Parliament says in the first place that the town-council shall enforce penalties under the regulations introduced by the Act of 1892; and in the second place that the county council shall enforce penalties, not under that Act but under a different Act which introduces different penalties. It is absolutely certain, therefore, that Parliament meant, for whatever reason, that the powers of county councils in the enforcement of penalties should be different from the powers of town-councils within burghs. And the only question for us is to consider what the difference is, and that does not seem to me to be a question open to controversy. The construction I take to be clear. The objection to the competency was therefore rightly repelled by the Court.

June 5, 1913. But then there is a different objection taken. It is said that the complaint is not relevant because it is not sufficiently specific in respect that it does not state whether the shop in question was kept open for sale for consumption on the premises, for sale for consumption off the premises, or whether any sale took place at all. I think the answer to that is obviously that if any of these statements had been introduced into the complaint, they would have been altogether irrelevant. The bye-law does not regulate the consumption of whatever refreshments may be offered for sale in these premises. It has nothing to do with the question whether they are to be consumed on the premises, nor does it prohibit the sale. The express purpose of the bye-law—and the purpose which the statute intends it shall serve—is to prevent the premises being kept open. That is all that the bye-law prevents and that, therefore, is quite rightly all that the prosecutor complains that the appellant has done.

Lena v.
Davidson.

Lord Kinnear.

We were referred, as an authority, to the case of Rossi v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.¹ That case has only a very indirect bearing, but, so far as it is applicable, it appears to me to support the judgment of the Court of Appeal in repelling the objection, because the whole force of the judgment of the House of Lords lies in this, that they say a prohibition to sell a commodity is one thing; a prohibition to keep open premises is another and a different thing; and a statute which authorises magistrates under certain conditions to prohibit a sale, does not thereby authorise them to prevent traders from keeping their premises open. But then that was a decision pronounced upon the construction of an Edinburgh Police Act, and the Lords held, on grounds that are clearly explained, that that Act did not authorise the magistrates to prohibit the keeping open of premises at certain times. But this Act of 1903 does the very thing which that Act did not do, because it expressly authorises a town-council within a burgh and a county council within a county to make bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing of premises registered under the Act and to enforce these bye-laws by providing penalties to be inflicted upon those disobeying them.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below is right, and that the questions submitted for the opinion of this Court ought to be answered in the affirmative.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur in the judgment your Lordship proposes. Though there is some difficulty on the surface of the case, a careful consideration of the statutes leads, I think, to a clear conclusion which may be shortly stated.

The business of ice-cream shops was placed under regulation by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, which contains a clause (section 54) dealing with the manufacture and sale, and another (section 82) dealing with the registration of such shops and the regulation of their traffic. In particular, section 82, subsection 2, empowers town-councils to enact bye-laws restricting the hours during which such shops may be kept open. This it does by extending the purposes for which bye-laws may be made under section 316 of the principal Burgh Police Act, viz., that of 1892, to include this additional purpose, and enacting that "the provisions of the principal June 5, 1913. Act relating to bye-laws and the confirmation and enforcement thereof shall apply accordingly." One of these provisions was contained in section 317, ^{Lena v. Davidson.} which empowered the magistrates to impose penalties for the enforcement of their bye-laws, but not exceeding 40s. for each breach of such bye-laws. ^{Ld. Johnston.} Other necessary provisions are contained in sections 318 to 323.

But though properly a Burgh Police Act, the Act of 1903 contained a provision (section 97) which authorised county councils to adopt its 54th and 82nd sections dealing with ice-cream shops or either of them, in which case the adopted section or sections were to have effect throughout the county, as if "county" were substituted for "burgh," and "county council" for "town-council." Had the section stopped there the county council's power of making bye-laws would have depended on the Act of 1903, section 83 (2), and through it upon the principal Burgh Police Act, 1892, section 316, and following sections. But section 97 proceeds to say "with the substitution of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, and section 57 thereof for the principal Act and section 316 thereof." Turning then to the Local Government Act, 1889, section 57, it will be found that it empowers the county council to make bye-laws on certain subjects enforceable by penalties not exceeding five pounds, with subsidiary provisions, which cover all the matters regarding bye-laws which are dealt with by the principal Burgh Police Act not only in section 316 but also in sections 317 and 323. Consequently the county council, though the mode of conferring the power is unnecessarily confusing, are in fact empowered to deal with ice-cream shops exactly as town-councils are, but under their own bye-laws code, and under no limitation from the terms of the corresponding town-council bye-laws code. Hence, though it may appear anomalous, the county councils are authorised to enact a maximum £5 penalty for an offence for which the town-council can only enact a maximum 40s. penalty.

I therefore think that the county council were not acting ultra vires in enacting a maximum £5 penalty in enforcement of the bye-law in question, and that the determination of the Justice of the Peace Court to that effect is sound. There are certain other points submitted to us, but on these I do not think it necessary to add anything.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. It is plain from the examination of the statutes which your Lordship in the chair has made that the Legislature did not put county councils and town-councils on the same footing as regards penalties. It would have been a simple and intelligible thing to have made the provisions of section 317 of the 1892 Act applicable to county councils, in which case they would only have been able to impose a penalty of 40s. which is the maximum that can be imposed by a town-council. But the Legislature have not thought fit to do that and this Court cannot do it for them. The result is that it is competent for a county council to impose a penalty of £5 for exactly the same offence as that for which a town-council can impose a fine of only 40s.

THE COURT answered both questions in the affirmative and dismissed the appeal.

No. 18. JOHN SHAW SOUTAR (Procurator-Fiscal, Dunfermline), Appellant.—
Sol.-Gen. Anderson—Wark.

June 10, 1913.

CHARLES CARLOW REID, Respondent.—Horne, K.C.—W. T. Watson.

Soutar v.
Reid.

Statutory Offences—Coal mine—Regulations for safety of miners—"Mechanical haulage"—Whether expression applicable to haulage worked by gravity—Coal Mines Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 50), sec. 46 (4).

Held that a system of haulage in use in a mine by which an empty tub was drawn up an incline by the weight of a loaded tub descending on a parallel set of rails and attached to the empty tub by a chain passing round a pulley situated at the top of the incline, was not a system of "mechanical haulage" in the sense of sec. 46 (4) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, and that accordingly the mineowners were not bound to provide certain safeguards which under the section were compulsory "on every haulage road where mechanical haulage . . . is used."

HIGH COURT. CHARLES CARLOW REID, colliery manager, Cowdenbeath, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline on a complaint at the instance of John Shaw Soutar, procurator-fiscal, with the consent of the Home Secretary, which set forth:—"You are charged, at the instance of the complainer, that being district agent of the mine of Hill of Beath, in the parish of Beath and county of Fife, known as No. 1 Dalbeath Pit, belonging to and worked by the Fife Coal Company, Limited, having its registered office at Leven (hereinafter referred to as said pit), you did, on 30th November 1912, on a haulage road in a mine between the Lochgelly Splint Seam and the Kinglassie Seam in said pit, on which road mechanical haulage (not being endless-rope or endless-chain haulage) was used, and the gradient of which exceeded one in twelve, fail to provide and attach to ascending tubs backstays or other suitable contrivances for preventing the said tubs running back; contrary to section 46 (4) (b) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911*; whereby you are guilty of an offence against said Act in terms of section 75 thereof, and are liable to the penalty set forth in section 101 thereof."

The Sheriff-substitute (Umpherston) found the accused not guilty. In a case stated for appeal at the request of the complainer, the Sheriff-substitute made the following statement:—

"I found in fact that (1) The respondent was agent for said pit. (2) The locus was part of a mine between two seams in said pit. (3) The portion of the haulage road referred to in the complaint was an

Sec. 46. "(2) Sufficient and suitable sprags . . . shall be provided and used for the purpose of holding a tub or set of tubs—

"(a) at the top of every incline on which the haulage is worked by gravity; . . .

"(c) on all roads or parts of roads where the gradient exceeds one in twenty, and the haulage is worked by animal power.

"(3) Stop blocks . . . shall be provided at the top of every incline on which the haulage, not being endless-rope or endless-chain haulage, is worked by gravity. . . .

"(4) On every haulage road where mechanical haulage, not being endless-rope or endless-chain haulage, is used, and where the gradient exceeds one in twelve . . .

"(b) there shall be provided and attached to an ascending tub or set of tubs a backstay or other suitable contrivance for preventing the tub running back."

incline about 30 yards long. A fall was being cleared near the top of said incline, and the material was lowered in tubs by means of said incline to the main haulage road, whence it was sent forward to the pit bottom. (4) The road was what is known as a self-acting incline, or wheel brae, or cousie brae, and the gradient of said incline was 1 in 3. (5) There were two lines of rails on said incline—each line being alternately used for the passage of (a) an empty tub, and (b) a loaded tub. (6) The haulage was not endless-rope or endless-chain haulage. (7) The haulage arrangements consisted of (a) a pulley fixed at the top end of the incline; and (b) a chain which passed round the pulley. The loaded tub was attached to one end of said chain at the top of the incline, and the empty tub to the other end of the chain at the foot. As the loaded tub descended under gravity it pulled up the empty tub to the top of the incline. (8) Backstays or other suitable contrivances for preventing the tubs running back were not provided and attached to the ascending tubs. (9) If, in the course of working, the chain broke, even if a backstay were provided on the ascending tub, there was nothing to prevent the full hutch from running away to the bottom of the incline. (10) On 30th November 1912 said chain broke, and both the ascending and descending tub ran away, and James Meldrum, a worker employed on said road, was killed. (11) No mechanical power, as I interpreted that phrase when used in sections 43, 44, 48, and 57 of the Act, viz., power developed by means of some mechanism, was in use to actuate the haulage.

June 10, 1913.
Soutar v.
Reid.

"I held in law that the haulage arrangements described in article 7 hereof did not constitute 'mechanical haulage,' and that backstays or other suitable contrivances for preventing tubs running back were not required by the Act."

The questions submitted for the opinion of the Court were:—" (1) Does the system described in article 7 hereof, in operation on said haulage road, constitute mechanical haulage in the sense of section 46 (4) (b) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911? (2) Was it therefore legally necessary to provide and attach to tubs ascending on said haulage road backstays or other suitable contrivances for preventing said tubs running back?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 4th June 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The system here was one of "mechanical haulage," in the sense of section 46 (4). It would be surprising if it were not, seeing that the object of the section was to provide safeguards for miners, and the system in use here was at least as dangerous as those which the respondent contended alone fell under the expression. The language, however, of the Act was in itself reasonably clear. Two expressions were found in the Act. The ordinary expression used was haulage "by mechanical power."¹ It occurred throughout the Act in connection with and in contrast to haulage by gravity, animal power, or manual labour, and meant haulage where the motive power was a machine. The system here obviously did not fall under that description. The other expression was the one used in section 46, "mechanical haulage." It was a new expression found in this section alone, and used intentionally instead of the ordinary expression elsewhere found in the Act, because it was meant to denote something different, viz., any form of haulage not operated by hand or animal power, and it included haulage by force of gravity. The

June 10, 1913. object was to combine for the purposes of the section systems of haulage which had been differentiated for certain purposes in earlier sections, but between which no distinction could be drawn for the main purpose of the Act, viz., protection of life and limb. The Sheriff-substitute had erred, because he had not apprehended the distinction between the two expressions, and had thought that section 46 (4) was dealing with the first. If it had, his decision would doubtless have been right. He had wrongly interpreted the word "mechanical" as meaning "produced by mechanical power." Such a meaning could not be reconciled with the Act, nor with the ordinary use of language.¹

Soutar v.
Reid.

Argued for the respondent ;—The system was not one of "mechanical haulage" in the sense of section 46 (4). "Mechanical haulage" was merely another expression for "haulage by mechanical power," and did not and could not include haulage by gravity. That it did not do so in this Act was clear from the fact that throughout the Act four different kinds of haulage were recognised, mechanical, hand, animal, and gravity, and in this very section in subsections (2) and (3) haulage by gravity was expressly dealt with. Had it been meant to include haulage by gravity in subsection (4) the language of section 48 of the Act, "haulage by gravity or mechanical power" would have been used. Further special rules for the safety of men engaged in connection with haulage by gravity were to be found elsewhere in the Act, the "hanger on" being required to stand clear of the wheel brae while the tubs were in motion, whereas, as the Sheriff-substitute pointed out in finding 9, the safeguards provided by the subsection here in question would be absolutely useless.

At advising on 10th June 1913,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is an appeal by the procurator-fiscal of Dunfermline against a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute at Dunfermline by which he has acquitted the respondent of the charge of an offence against the Coal Mines Act, 1911. The particular clause of the Act which is said to have been infringed is the fourth subsection of section 46, which prescribes that "On every haulage road where mechanical haulage, not being endless-rope or endless-chain haulage, is used, and where the gradient exceeds 1 in 12, (a) runaway switches or other suitable contrivances shall be provided, where the use thereof is practicable, to prevent accidents in the event of a tub running away ; (b) there shall be provided and attached to an ascending tub or set of tubs a backstay or other suitable contrivance for preventing the tub running back."

The haulage road in question was not worked by endless-rope or endless-chain, and the case is therefore not within that exception ; but it is said that it was a haulage road where mechanical haulage was used, and that an accident happened through the failure of the mineowners or mine engineers to provide and attach to ascending tubs backstays or other suitable contrivances for preventing the said tubs running back.

The learned Sheriff-substitute describes the apparatus quite clearly in the stated case. He says :—"The haulage arrangements consisted of (a) a pulley fixed at the top end of the incline ; and (b) a chain which passed round the pulley. The loaded tub was attached to one end of said chain at the top of the incline, and the empty tub to the other end of the chain at June 10, 1913. the foot. As the loaded tub descended under gravity it pulled the empty tub to the top of the incline." Then, that being the construction of the apparatus, he says :—" On 30th November 1912 said chain broke, and both the ascending and descending tub ran away, and James Meldrum, a worker employed on said road, was killed." Soutar v. Reid.

Lord Kinnear.

The question, therefore, is whether in using this apparatus without providing and attaching to the ascending tub a backstay or other suitable contrivance for preventing the tub running back, the colliery manager was in breach of the statutory regulation. That is, of course, a question of the construction of the section in question, having regard to the facts described.

I confess that, if the clause in the statute which we have to construe were taken by itself, I should have some difficulty in accepting the view of the learned Sheriff-substitute. As at present advised, it appears to me that what the learned Sheriff-substitute describes is haulage which is operated by no other force, so far as he shows, except mechanical force. One part of a complex machine by its weight is used to pull up another part of the same complex machine which is much lighter, and I cannot at present see that any force is in operation which is not mechanical. But then I do not think that that is the question we have to decide. We cannot take this particular clause apart from the series of regulations of which it forms a part and interpret it by itself. And for this reason to begin with, the first thing that strikes one in reading the clause itself is that the statute intends to distinguish between one method of hauling, which it calls mechanical, and some other method of hauling. For the purpose of ascertaining the true effect and meaning of that distinction we must go to its description of the other kinds of hauling to which it relates.

Now I think that throughout the whole series of enactments upon this subject we find that the statute distinguishes between three different powers or forces which may be used to effect haulage. It speaks of animal haulage, that is to say haulage worked by animal power; again, as distinguished from that, haulage worked by mechanical power; and again, and separately as something different, haulage worked by gravity. All these three are treated in the statute, as I read it, as different modes of haulage, and in this very section, which we are to apply, the statute begins by prescribing what is to be done upon the haulage roads at which other modes of haulage than mechanical haulage are employed. The first provision is that sufficient and suitable sprags shall be provided and used for the purpose of holding a tub or set of tubs at the top of every incline on which the haulage is worked by gravity. The next is a clause relating to the same kind of haulage—that certain contrivances shall be provided on roads on which haulage is worked by gravity. Therefore you have these two provisions with reference to that mode of haulage. Then comes the next, where it is provided that on every haulage road where mechanical haulage is used certain other and different precautions are to be taken.

I cannot therefore help thinking that the statute has provided a glossary for its own interpretation, and that, when it has made certain definite provisions with reference to haulage roads which are worked by mechanical

June 10, 1918. power on the one hand, and haulage roads which are worked by animal power on the other hand, and again for a third kind of haulage power which it says is worked by gravity, it means that these are to be considered as three different modes of haulage, and that precautions of one kind or another are to be taken according as the one or the other is used.

Soutar v. Reid.
Lord Kinnear.

But then I think we are not here called upon merely to decide the construction of this clause according to the strict meaning of particular words used. The question turns not only upon the meaning of words, but upon the facts of the case, because this particular regulation is only one of a series of very minute and stringent regulations for the underground management of mines, all of them addressed to skilled managers, because the statute begins by providing that there shall be a manager with certain qualifications underground, who shall be responsible for carrying out all these regulations. They are addressed to persons constantly engaged in the operations which the Act describes and skilled in their performance, and they are very various and complicated in their nature, although this particular direction may seem to be simple enough.

Therefore we have to construe a statute addressed to persons skilled in the particular matter in hand, and to be interpreted with reference to the arrangements for working a mine, which are very well known to such skilled persons but which cannot be known to a Court of law unless they are proved in evidence. Now the learned Sheriff-substitute had the means of bringing all these facts before his mind and of pronouncing his judgment with reference not only to the mere interpretation of particular words, but with reference to the whole facts of the case. We in this Court have nothing before us except the particular words of the statute and the short description he has given us of this particular apparatus. I am not prepared, for my part, upon these materials to say that the learned Sheriff-substitute is wrong in a question which involves for its determination an exact knowledge of the facts to which the clause relates, as well as a sound construction of the words of the clause itself.

It was said, and with force, by the Solicitor-General, that this was an Act of Parliament which was intended for the protection of life and limb, and that therefore, in construing it, we must be careful that safeguards which Parliament has enacted for the protection of miners are not disregarded by the managers and the owners of mines. That is perfectly true, but I am afraid it is a consideration which is not very directly conclusive of the particular question we have to determine—indeed, it begs the question. It is a consideration of great importance, if we are to decide whether mineowners or underground managers are to be excused for disregarding regulations which the statute has laid upon them. But the question is whether a particular regulation does or does not provide a safeguard, and I am afraid it does not help us in determining that to say that the statute intended safeguards to be provided. Whether the apparatus which was not employed is a safeguard within the meaning of the statute is the question to be decided. Now, upon that question the Sheriff-substitute has given us a finding in fact which, I think, goes far to exclude the particular argument that I am considering, although I do not say that it is in itself conclusive, because he says that "If, in the course of working, the chain broke, even if a backstay were provided on the ascending tub, there was nothing to prevent the full hutch from running away to the bottom of the incline." Soutar v. Reid.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am not prepared on any judgment of my own to say that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment was wrong. I think the final consideration that ought to govern the Court in the determination of this matter is this: that it is proposed to inflict a penalty upon the construction of an enactment which creates a punishable offence and subjects the offender to a penalty. I do not think that we can hold that Parliament intended to create an offence and subject persons to penalties by the use of any ambiguous language; and that, at the utmost, all that can be said for the prosecutor's construction of the statute is that, if it is read without reference to the context, it may or may not bear the meaning which he has put upon it. In these circumstances I am of opinion that there are no sufficient grounds for interfering with the Sheriff-substitute's judgment. Lord Kinnear.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The question submitted is, whether the process of hauling an empty tub up an incline by the weight of a loaded tub running down the incline on parallel sets of rails, the tubs being connected by a rope or chain passing over a fixed pulley at the top of the incline, is mechanical haulage in the sense of section 46 (4) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911.

I think that the learned Sheriff-substitute has rightly concluded that it is not.

Haulage is the action or process of hauling. It requires power to effect it. That power must be developed, as distinguished from applied. It may be developed (1) by manual or animal labour, (2) by the attraction of gravity, and (3) by means of mechanical contrivance. These are contrasted in various sections of the Act, though the expressions used occasionally vary. For instance, section 43 (2) speaks of the haulage being "worked by gravity or mechanical power." By the latter phrase is meant power developed by means of mechanism, for strictly there is no such thing as mechanical power.

Now in section 46 there is, as regards haulage, one provision (section 46 (2) (c)) for the case where "the haulage is worked by animal power," another (section 46 (3)) for the case where "the haulage is worked by gravity," and a third (section 46 (4)) for the case "where mechanical haulage is used." I quote in each case the expression adopted by the statute. It is this latter provision with which we are concerned. The turn of phrase of the first and second case is altered in the third case. But the expression "where mechanical haulage is used" is only another way of saying where the haulage is "worked by" mechanical contrivance. In either case it is the animal, gravity, or the mechanical contrivance which develops the power necessary to operate the haulage.

In the method described by the Sheriff-substitute, or, to use the mining term "on the wheel brae," it is not the rope and pulley which develops the power or works the haulage, but the force of gravity, applied through the rope and pulley as its channel, and accordingly I think that the Sheriff-substitute came to a right conclusion in holding that the haulage in question was not mechanical haulage in the sense of section 46 (4) of the Act.

June 10, 1913. I think that confusion has arisen in the mind of the prosecution owing to a misapprehension of the parenthetical words "not being endless-rope or endless-chain haulage," which are found in section 46 (4). That is not a description of mechanical haulage but of haulage, and is equally applicable to gravitation as to mechanical haulage, as is shown by a reference to section 46 (3). The true import of the provision read with its parenthesis is:—On every haulage road where haulage, not being endless-rope or endless-chain haulage, is worked by mechanical contrivance, certain precautions are to be taken. So read the parenthesis creates no difficulty in the way of deciding the question as the Sheriff-substitute has, I think, rightly decided it.

Soutar v.
Reid.

Ld. Johnston.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships that the Sheriff-substitute has come to a right conclusion in this case. I may say that I should have been very slow to differ from the conclusion reached by the Judge who had the advantage of hearing the evidence of skilled witnesses on such a question as this. It appears from the papers before us that a number of documents were laid before him, and we were informed by counsel at the bar that he had had the advantage of hearing expert testimony. The provision which he had to construe is one which occurs in a fasciculus of clauses dealing with travelling roads and haulage, and, inasmuch as they are dealing with a provision which imposes a penalty, it would require to be stated in plain language what it was that had to be provided by the mine management.

Now, as your Lordships have pointed out, whatever might prima facie be the meaning attached to the expression "mechanical haulage" if it occurred as an isolated term, I think there is quite sufficient material in the clauses, particularly 43, 44, 48, and 57 of the Act, for justifying the conclusion arrived at by the learned Sheriff-substitute after he had had the advantage of having explained to him the practical application of these different provisions. Accordingly I think that the conclusion he has reached is correct.

THE COURT answered both questions in the negative and dismissed the appeal.

No. 19.

June 10, 1913.

Robson v.
Menzies.

Sheriff—Small-debt procedure—Appeal—Malice and oppression—Deviations from statutory form—Incompetency—Hearing of incompetent evidence—Small Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 41), sec. 31.

By the Small Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, an appeal in small-debt cases is only competent when (sec. 31) "founded on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part of the sheriff, or on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think took place wilfully, or have prevented substantial justice from having been done, or on incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the sheriff."

Held that under the above section no appeal was competent unless in a case where there had been a denial of justice owing to a failure of June 10, 1913. duty on the part of the Sheriff. Held further (1) that "malice and oppression" meant malice and oppression in the ordinary signification of the terms, and pointed to something done by the Sheriff from wrong or capricious motives of his own; (2) that the expression "deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments" covered any case in which the Sheriff had denied justice by not allowing the parties a hearing; (3) that "incompetency" referred exclusively to the entertainment by the Sheriff of a cause which he might not competently entertain.

Robson v.
Menzies.

In a small-debt action at the instance of a landlord against his tenant for recovery of a proportion of taxes paid by the pursuer in respect of the subjects let, the parties lodged a minute in which, "to obviate proof thereon," they agreed in admitting the lease and a correspondence which had taken place between their respective agents. The Sheriff-substitute ex proprio motu took evidence as to the purpose for which the subjects were let, and thereafter assolized the defender. In an appeal against this judgment on the grounds of (1) incompetency, and (2) malice and oppression, held that if the Sheriff had erred in taking the evidence his error was one in law only, and that no appeal lay on either of the grounds stated.

On 21st January 1913 William Frier Robson brought an action in the Small-Debt Court at Duns against Colonel Charles Thomson Menzies, in which the pursuer claimed payment of £5, 5s. 8d. for taxes alleged to be due by the defender to him in respect of certain premises let by him to the defender.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Kinnear.
Ld. Johnston.

On 21st February 1913 the Sheriff-substitute (Macaulay Smith) assolized the defender from the conclusions of the summons.

The pursuer appealed to the High Court of Justiciary against this judgment, and lodged a note of appeal, in which it was stated:—"On 21st February 1913 a minute of admissions* was lodged, together with the lease and the copy correspondence referred to in said minute. Said minute was lodged for the purpose of obviating the leading of any proof, and bears to be a renunciation of proof by both parties. Said lease was a probative document, and contained the whole terms and conditions of the bargain between the pursuer and the defender in reference to the tack of the premises, in respect whereof the pursuer claimed the sum sued for from the defender, and it provided, inter alia, that the said premises were let as an unfurnished residence. Notwithstanding that neither party sought to lead any proof other than that contained in said minute of admissions, the Sheriff-substitute stated that he was entitled to have evidence as to the express purpose for which the house was let, and that as he could not find this from the lease, he was not going to look at it, but he would like to hear the circumstances under which the house was taken. The pursuer objected to the competency of leading evidence as to the purpose for which the premises were let, in respect that the lease was the measure of the agreement between the parties; but the Sheriff-substitute insisted on the defender and Thomas Smart,

* The minute was in the following terms:—"Minute of Admissions in Small-Debt Action Robson v. Menzies. To obviate a proof thereon, the parties agree in admitting the following:—(1) The lease between the parties dated 6th and 8th August 1912, produced herewith; (2) The copy correspondence between the parties' agents produced herewith; and (3) That the sums in the claim sued for are the correct taxes on the assessed rental of £55."

Robson v.
Menzies.

overseer at Kames, defender's own residence, giving evidence as to the purpose for which said premises were let, and on their testifying that the premises were let for the purpose of storing defender's furniture and as a residence while defender's own house was under repair, the Sheriff-substitute held that these facts constituted a special agreement between the parties, relieving the defender of any liability to pay taxes for the period of his occupancy under the lease, and he accordingly assolzied the defender, and found the pursuer liable to defender in £1, 3s. of expenses."

The grounds of appeal were stated as follows :—“(a) Incompetency. The said lease is a probative document, and contains the whole terms of the contract between the appellant and the defender, and no addition to, or modification thereof, could be made by oral evidence. Further, the purpose for which said premises were let was not a competent consideration to take cognisance of in deciding whether or no the defender was liable to relieve the pursuer of the taxes due by defender in respect of his period of occupancy under said lease. (b) Malice and oppression. Parties having renounced probation by minute lodged in Court, it was malicious and oppressive of the Sheriff-substitute, at his own hand, to insist on leading evidence, and although said evidence was irrelevant and incompetent, to decide the case upon and in respect of said evidence.”*

The appeal was heard before the High Court on 27th May 1913.¹

At advising on 10th June 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is an appeal against a judgment in the Small-Debt Court. The action was a claim for payment of £5, 5s. 8d. of taxes, which the lessor of certain premises claimed from the lessee, and the defender was assolzied. He was assolzied after the Sheriff-substitute had listened to evidence which, in fact, according to the statement of the appellant, the learned Judge himself insisted should be led before him. This evidence, it is said, he had no business to listen to, because the lease, which was produced, was the only document which could show the relationship between the landlord and the tenant, and contained the full terms of the bargain between them. The appellant is the pursuer, and he presents this appeal, and in the note of appeal he sets forth his reasons for the appeal thus—[His Lordship read the grounds of appeal as stated supra].

* The Small Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 41), sec. 31, enacts :—“It shall be competent to any person conceiving himself aggrieved by any decree given by any sheriff in any cause . . . raised under the authority of this Act to bring the case by appeal before the next circuit Court of Justiciary, or, where there are no circuit courts, before the High Court of Justiciary . . . Provided always that such appeal shall be competent only when founded on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part of the sheriff, or on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the court shall think took place wilfully, or have prevented substantial justice from having been done, or on incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the sheriff; . . .”

Robson v.

Menzies.

Lord Justice-General.

A great many cases were quoted to us, and I am afraid it is true that the cases are not altogether reconcilable. For that reason I do not propose to go through them seriatim; but I may say that I have, as a matter of fact, read every case in the books that I have discovered which has been decided on this statute. The cases not being reconcilable, I think it puts upon us the duty of going to the statute itself. And I may say also that I think it is all the more necessary to give what will, I hope, be an authoritative judgment upon this matter, because the discrepancies of the cases may, to a certain extent, be explained by the fact that some of them were pronounced at Circuit Courts, where there is obviously not the same opportunity for full citation of authorities and consideration as there is in the High Court here.

The matter naturally depends upon the 31st section of the Small Debt Act, but that must be taken along with the 30th section, and the 30th section provides "No decree given by any Sheriff in any cause . . . decided under the authority of this Act shall be subject to reduction, advocacy, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution, other than provided by this Act, either on account of any omission or irregularity or informality in the citation or proceedings, or on the merits, or on any ground or reason whatever." I need scarcely say that a more absolute exclusion of appeal could not be imagined; and therefore, in the matter of appeal, we are strictly limited to the grounds subsequently provided in this Act. Those grounds are in section 31, which enacts:—[His Lordship here quoted the terms of the section].

As the first matter that is put forward here is incompetency, I may say at once that I think it is quite impossible to hold that under the head of incompetency you could deal with anything that is wrong in the procedure of the case itself. I think that incompetency means, and can only mean, an inability in the Court to deal with the matter in hand; and I think the reason why the phrase is used—"incompetency including defect of jurisdiction"—is not really to add anything, but is merely to look at the matter from another point of view. In other words, I think incompetency pure and simple would mean any case with which the Court, as a Court, had not power to deal. For instance, if a small-debt decree purported to give a declarator of marriage with a pecuniary result, the Court is obviously incompetent to deal with that matter. Or again, if the Court purported to give a decree for £1000, it would clearly be incompetent to do so.

Where you come to the phrase "want of jurisdiction," that is really the same thing but looked at from the point of view, not of the matter of the complaint but of the person. An illustration of this is a decree in the Small-Debt Court of Midlothian given against a person who lives in Inverness-shire. But in both branches of this incompetency the defect is that the Court itself had no business to go on and pronounce a decree in the matter in hand. That obviously cannot touch something wrong that is done in the proceedings.

June 10, 1913.

Robson v.
Menzie.

General.

The next ground of appeal here is put as malice and oppression; and there is again, I think, some ground in some of the decided cases for what is argued here—I mean, there is a hint in some of the judgments of there being a sort of oppression which is not oppression in the ordinary sense of the word, but a fancied oppression when anything very far wrong is done in the course of the case. I think that where oppression is joined with malice, as it is here, and is followed by the words “on the part of the Sheriff,” it obviously points to something done by the Judge, and done by the Judge from (what I may call) motives of his own. Although I am not going through the cases, I wish to say that I cannot agree with an expression in one of the judgments in which it was said that what the learned Sheriff had done from caprice was not oppressive.¹ I think that caprice in a Judge, for the purpose of coming to a certain result—for such it clearly was in that case—which has the effect of depriving the litigant of justice, is oppression. But, obviously, that does not apply to this case. There was nothing here oppressive in what the Judge did, and there is not the slightest hint of malice on the Judge’s part.

Now I have taken those two objections first, because those were the points which were put by the pleader in the forefront. But that does not exhaust the whole grounds of appeal; and, in particular, your Lordships will see that, in my opinion at least, these were not the grounds of decision in any of the cases which were cited in which an appeal was allowed, because in none of those cases in which an appeal was allowed was there ever true incompetence or true malice and oppression. And yet I think in all of the cases where an appeal was allowed it was rightly allowed. Now the ground upon which it was rightly allowed was this: “Such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the court shall think took place wilfully, or have prevented substantial justice from having been done.”

Now I think that expression “deviations from the statutory enactments” sends you to the whole proceedings as detailed in the Small Debt Act, and you find in section 13 of the Small Debt Act, “when the parties shall appear, the sheriff shall hear them viva voce, and examine witnesses or havers upon oath, and may also examine the parties,” and thereafter decree is pronounced. It appears to me, therefore, that wherever you can show that the Sheriff has denied justice by not allowing the parties a hearing—so to speak, driven them away from the judgment seat—that is a deviation from the statutory forms of a character that has prevented substantial justice from being done.

I think that we have our way made clear to us in this matter by considering an analogous branch of law which has been the subject of more decision, including decisions by the House of Lords, namely, the grounds upon which a decret-arbitral can be set aside. Your Lordships will remember that the grounds upon which a decret-arbitral can be set aside are detailed in the old Articles of Regulation in words which, although not exactly the same, are very like the words used in the Small Debt Act—so like, indeed, that I cannot help thinking that the draftsman of the Small Debt Act June 10, 1913. must have had in his mind the words of the Articles of Regulation. And in the older decisions there was an inclination on the part of the Court to define "corruption" as used in the Articles, not in the natural sense of the word, but as including a sort of legal corruption, which really included a departure from the justice of the case. That tendency of the Court was corrected by the House of Lords; and I specially refer to the judgment of Lord Watson in the case of Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Company,¹ and the case which very soon followed after that—the case of the Holmes Oil Company, Limited, v. Pumphreston Oil Company, Limited.² But your Lordships will remember that, although the House of Lords and Lord Watson disclaimed any idea of being able to reach injustice through the word "corruption" in the proper sense of the word, yet they said that if there had been an entire desertion of all those forms of process which are meant to do justice between party and party, then you could get at the decree. As an instance of this I refer to the old case of Mitchell v. Cable,³ where the arbiter heard the one side and did not hear the other. And I do not think that the matter is really better put, or can be better put, than it is put by a sentence in the judgment of the first Lord Mackenzie in Mitchell v. Cable,³ where he says this: "We are not entitled to set aside the award of an arbiter pronounced under an error of judgment, however palpable that error may be; but if any failure in duty has been committed, distinct from an error of judgment, the award cannot stand." Now I think that is not only good law in the case in which it was pronounced, but it is good law also for these small-debt appeals. I ought to say, in order to prevent misunderstanding, that Lord Mackenzie, after the words I have read, added these words: "That failure must be included under the term corruption." That, in view of the House of Lords judgment, is not correct. But that does not vitiate the application of the sentence that has gone before; it merely ascribes it to a wrong category.

Therefore I think what one has got to consider in coming to a concrete case is this: Does what the Sheriff has done in the Small-Debt Court amount to a failure of duty, or has he merely made a mistake in law? If he has made a mistake in law, then the matter is not subject for appeal; if he has failed in duty, then it is appealable. I do not think that this distinction can be brought out better than by comparing two cases which, if I may say so, I think were both quite rightly decided. The one was the case of Brown v. Edinburgh House Proprietors Company, Limited.⁴ It was a judgment of Sheriff Maconochie, and the action was a small-debt action for rent. The defence was that there were certain counter claims. Now section 11 of the Small Debt Act provides that, where counter claims are put forward, a certain notice must be given. That notice had not been given; and accordingly Sheriff Maconochie held that he was bound to give decree at once without going into the matter of the counter claim. It was argued, however, that he had, so to speak, driven them from the judgment seat—that he had refused evidence which he ought to have

June 10, 1913. heard. But their Lordships held, and I think rightly, that that could not be listened to, because the Sheriff had not refused evidence simply because he would not hear evidence, but because his reading of section 11 was that, if such evidence had been tendered, it was irrelevant in terms of the statute. I think he was clearly right. But even assuming he had been wrong, it did not matter, because it would have been a mere mistake in law.

Robson v.
Menzies.

Lord Justice-
General.

Now that case may be compared with the case of Renfrew v. Hall,¹ in which a landlord raised a sequestration for rent two days after the Whitsunday term. The tenant offered payment of the rent, but without expenses. Now section 5 of the Small Debt Act provides that a pursuer, in a sequestration for rent where the rent is due, shall get expenses. Now the Sheriff not only did not give expenses but he refused to hear evidence as to the circumstances in which the sequestration was raised. And the Lord Justice-General in that case says this: "It appears to me, however, quite possible that evidence might have been material to the decision of the question. . . . The refusal to hear evidence under the circumstances of the particular case appears to me to be such a deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments governing procedure in the Small-Debt Court as might prevent substantial justice from being done, and I therefore think that the appeal should be sustained."

I think that that decision was quite right also, and the distinction between the two cases is obvious. It was not, in that case, a mistake in law, but it was a failure in duty on the part of the Sheriff in refusing to listen to evidence that might have had a bearing upon the case.

I have nothing more to say upon the general question. I think it is quite clear from the views that I have expressed that, when we come to this particular case, the Sheriff-substitute, if he is wrong, made a mistake in law and nothing else, and accordingly I am of opinion here that the appeal should not be allowed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship for the reasons which you have given, in all of which I entirely concur. I do not find myself much embarrassed by the irreconcilability of certain of the cases with others or, if so be, of some of them with the plain construction of the statute. The cases on this matter do not make law. Previous decisions are extremely useful as illustrations of the way in which the law should be applied; and if there were, what I think there is not, a consistent series of judgments on the construction of particular terms, we should find in such judgments a very useful guide in the performance of our own duty in construing the statute. But the decisions in this matter are not law in the sense in which, in other departments, decisions may be binding on the Court, because the purpose of examining them is not to extract from a series of judgments some governing rule or formula which will be found to cover them all, and which therefore may safely be applied to similar or analogous facts upon which the Court has to adjudicate. We do not go to the decisions in this matter for the rule of law at all. The formula is laid down for us in perfectly clear and express terms by the statute, and the decisions of our predecessors can do nothing more than help us in applying that formula by showing how they applied it in particular cases. If some of them are not reconcilable with the great majority—and I must say that I think the great majority are entirely in accordance with the construction of the statute which your Lordship has given—that only shows that in the application of this statute there have been occasional miscarriages which do not bind the Court; and, notwithstanding these particular variations on the ordinary course of decision, we must look at the statute and apply it according to its plain meaning.

June 10, 1913.
Robson v.
Menzies.

Lord Kinnear.

Now in so applying it in the circumstances of the present case I agree with all that your Lordship has said. We have to consider, in the first place, whether there is any relevant allegation of incompetency, because the first ground upon which the appellant says that the judgment is to be set aside is that it was incompetent. I agree with your Lordship that in reading the thirty-first section, which introduces the grounds upon which it is possible to set aside a judgment in the Small-Debt Court, we must take along with this the previous enactment that such judgments are not to be subject to review on account of any omission, or irregularity, or informality, or on the merits, and that the only grounds upon which they may be set aside are those enumerated in the thirty-first section.

As to the first of these grounds, viz., incompetency, I am quite clear that it means the incompetency of the Sheriff and of the Sheriff Court. It is said that the Sheriff-substitute admitted incompetent evidence. But then, if he made a mistake in allowing evidence when it was his business to decide whether evidence should be admissible or not, that is not incompetency in the Court or in the Sheriff. Incompetency, in the sense of the statute, as I read it, means incompetency to decide the matter at all. The Court has no power to determine the particular question one way or another, and such determination is therefore not a matter for it. If it is a question which the Court is called upon, in the ordinary course of procedure, to decide one way or the other, then it is of no consequence whether the Sheriff decides it rightly or wrongly, because, although he may have gone wrong on the merits of the particular question, nevertheless his judgment is unreviewable. I think that that construction, which would have been the only one, in my view, even if the word "incompetency" had not been explained by the statute itself, is confirmed when we see that the statute affords a certain aid to the interpretation of the word "incompetency" by giving a conspicuous instance of its meaning. It says, "Incompetency, including want of jurisdiction." Therefore, want of jurisdiction is an instance of the kind of incompetency which the statute says is to be a sufficient ground of appeal. Want of jurisdiction—as your Lordship has said—is incapacity of the Judge to entertain the matter at all, to decide anything with effect upon the particular question.

The second ground of objection is that the Sheriff-substitute's proceeding was oppressive. Now what is said to be oppressive is this that he, having before him the terms of a lease which it was said was the sole measure of the relations between the landlord and the tenant, nevertheless took evidence as to the purpose for which the tenant had taken the lease and gave effect to that evidence in his decision of the question. He allowed witnesses to June 10, 1913. speak on a matter which, it was said, was precluded by the written lease.

Robson v. That may have been right or wrong. It may have been an error in judg-Menzies. ment. I do not express any opinion upon that point, because it is not before us. But there is nothing in that, taken by itself, approaching to malice and Lord Kinnear. oppression in the sense of the statute.

I cannot assent to a doctrine which was maintained by the learned counsel—and with some show of support from one of the previous cases—that oppression in this statute does not mean oppression. It was said that it does not mean oppression at all, but that it means something else. I agree that we have the best of all possible guides in rejecting that argument in the judgment of the learned Lords in the case of Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Company.¹ There is no such thing as “legal oppression,” any more than there is “legal corruption,” as something different from what ordinary educated people, using ordinary language, mean by corruption and oppression. After all, these are ordinary words. The words have a meaning, and when the Legislature uses them in an Act of Parliament it must be understood that it intended that meaning. And it appears to me that the observations of one of the learned Lords who took part in the judgment in the case of *Weir v. Bell*² are directly applicable, when he says, “I do not understand legal fraud, to my mind it has no more meaning than legal heat or legal cold, legal light or legal shade.” Fraud and oppression and corruption mean exactly the same thing when used by lawyers and in legal cases and by ordinary people in the ordinary talk of mankind.

But then, I think, we are relieved of any difficulty in the construction of the word such as might have arisen. There might have been some difficulty in the construction of the word oppression if it had stood alone, because it might well have been said a wrong judgment is oppressive however honest the Judge who delivered it may have been. But then that is quite clearly excluded by the statute which says that the ground of appeal is malice and oppression. Now, malice is malitia, which means wickedness. If, therefore, the Judge pronounce an oppressive judgment, not as an honest judgment in the course of his duty, but from some wrong motive or from caprice, I agree with your Lordship that such caprice or wrong motive upon the part of a Judge which leads him to refuse to hear evidence which he was bound to hear, is, in the ordinary sense of the word, malice and oppression; but then, if what the Judge does is to accept evidence which there may be legal grounds for saying ought to be rejected, or to reject evidence which ought to have been admitted, from mere error of judgment, in the exercise of his own honest opinion, there is nothing capricious or oppressive in the sense of the statute.

On the whole matter, therefore, I concur with your Lordship in thinking that what the statute enables us to set aside is a denial of justice from failure of duty on the part of the Judge, and that in this case there is no relevant averment of failure of duty or denial of justice from that cause, but simply that, in deciding a question properly before him, which he was required to decide, the Judge went wrong.

I cannot subscribe to the doctrine of the Sheriff-substitute, if it be as I understand it, that, where the subject is an unfurnished house, the purpose of the let, where the period of let happens to be a broken period less than a year, has any bearing upon the question of apportionment of taxation. That question falls, in my opinion, to be determined on the terms of the contract of lease, and on these alone. We have here a formal lease of a heritable subject, unfurnished, for occupation as a dwelling-house, with all usual provisions, and some exceptional ones as to repair and sanitary condition. And I cannot see that the question of apportionment of taxation is in any way different, in the case, on the one hand, where the tenant stipulates for the continuance of the lease after the conclusion of the broken period, or where he has not made up his mind to such continuance, but leaves it open to continue on tacit relocation or by express agreement, and in the case, on the other hand, where he has made up his mind ab initio that his tenancy is to be limited to the stipulated period, though his mind may change. On the general question of apportionment of taxation in the case of an unfurnished house, which, I think, is the same in all circumstances, I do not think that I should do more than reserve my opinion. I only say that there is, I think, no ground for discrimination according to circumstances.

But when the case came before the Sheriff-substitute parties presented him with a minute of admissions, which admitted the lease and the correspondence between the parties' agents, and obviated any question of accounting. If the correspondence consisted of prior communings, it was incompetent evidence—as incompetent, I think, as that for which the Sheriff-substitute insisted. But this minute is prefaced thus: "Minute of Admissions in Small-Debt Action, Robson v. Menzies. To obviate a proof thereon, the parties agree in admitting the following." The expression "to obviate a proof thereon" is ambiguous. Is it to obviate a proof in the action, or to obviate a proof on the points following? The appellant maintains that the minute was lodged for the purpose of obviating the leading of any proof and imported a renunciation of proof. If I thought that this was necessarily the case, I should say that the Sheriff, in insisting ex proprio motu for further and incompetent proof, though it may be that malice and oppression in the sense of malicious oppression cannot be attributed to him, was yet guilty of such deviation from his statutory duty as admits of review under section 31 of the statute. I cannot read the statutory provisions (section 13 et seq.) regarding procedure, except in the light of recognised rules governing all Court procedure. I think therefore that the Sheriff-substitute would properly have been found to have deviated, in point of form, from the statutory enactments, and the deviation would certainly have been one which prevented substantial justice being done, because it prevented the true question being considered, and enabled the Sheriff-substitute to give effect to peculiar and erroneous views of the considerations on which the question at issue depended.

June 10, 1913. But I cannot say that the terms of the minute of admissions bear unequivocally the meaning which the appellant puts upon them. It is open therefore to conclude that the Sheriff has done no more than order or allow incompetent proof, and against that there is under the statute no redress. I entirely adopt what your Lordship has said on the statute and the case law, to which I should not presume to add anything.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

Held that a police magistrate sitting in a Burgh Police Court has jurisdiction to try an offence against the Immoral Traffic (Scotland) Act, 1902.

Sentence—Statutory Offence—Increase in penalty by amending Act—Conviction of offence in period extending from before till after date of amending Act—Imposition of increased penalty—Amendment of sentence—Immoral Traffic (Scotland) Act, 1902 (2 Edw. VII. cap. 11), sec. 1 (1)—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912 (2 and 3 Geo. V. cap. 20), sec. 7 (2)—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 75.

The Immoral Traffic (Scotland) Act, 1902, sec. 1 provides that every male person summarily convicted of living upon the earnings of prostitution shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months. By sec. 7 (2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, which came into force on 13th December 1912, the period of imprisonment which may be awarded is increased to six months.

An accused was convicted of an offence against these Acts, which was libelled as having been committed between 1st October 1912 and 15th March 1913, and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

Held, in a suspension, that the sentence could not stand in respect that the offence might have been committed in whole or in part prior to 13th December 1912, the date at which the increased penalty came into force; and sentence reduced, under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 75, to one of three months' imprisonment.

HIGH COURT. ON 28th March 1913 Otto Hall was charged in the Police Court of Lord Justice-General. Edinburgh on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, at the instance of Charles Angus Macpherson, Public Lord Kinnear. Prosecutor, with having "between 1st October 1912 and 15th March 1913, both days inclusive," lived wholly or in part on the earnings of Lord Mackenzie. the prostitution of a known prostitute, contrary to the Immoral Traffic Act, 1902, section 1, as amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, section 7, "whereby you are liable to the penalty set forth in said section 7."

The case was tried by one of the Judges of Police, who found the accused "guilty as libelled," and pronounced a sentence of six months' imprisonment.

The accused brought a bill of suspension, in which it was stated:— June 19, 1913.

"(4) On said complaint being called in Court on 27th March 1913 the complainer's solicitor objected to the relevancy of the complaint. The objection to the relevancy stated was that the acts constituting the offence were libelled as having been committed between 1st October 1912 and 15th March 1913, while section 7 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, one of the statutes libelled as having been contravened, did not become law until 13th December 1912. The Court having heard the respondent in reply repelled the said objection. The accused pled not guilty to the complaint, and evidence was led and various productions were lodged. The diet was adjourned till 28th March 1913. (5) On 28th March 1913 further evidence was led, and the complainer was found guilty of the charge as libelled and was sentenced by the Judge of Police to six months' imprisonment. (6) The statutes libelled do not per expressum confer jurisdiction upon the magistrates or Judges of Police Courts in Scotland, and do not authorise complaints thereunder to be tried by such magistrates or Judges in such Courts, and in consequence, the magistrates or Judges of Police of the city of Edinburgh had no jurisdiction to try the complaint in question."

The accused pleaded, inter alia;—The said warrant or sentence ought to be suspended because the procedure was illegal, unwarrantable, and oppressive in the following respects, viz. :—(1) The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, was not law at the date when the offence charged against the complainer is alleged to have commenced, and the Act is not retrospective. (2) The said Judge of Police sitting in said Police Court had no jurisdiction to try said complaint.

The case was heard before the High Court on 30th May 1913.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The magistrate had not jurisdiction to entertain this complaint. The offence charged was a statutory offence, and, as such, could be tried only by a Court of universal jurisdiction, i.e., the Sheriff Court or High Court, unless jurisdiction were conferred either expressly or by necessary implication on some other Court.¹ The first section of the Immoral Traffic Act, by which the offence was created, did not expressly confer jurisdiction on any Court, and it was not a necessary inference from its terms that a Police Court should have jurisdiction. The statute did not create a jurisdiction; it created an offence, and the words "a Court of summary jurisdiction" used in the first section could therefore only refer to such a Court where it was already empowered to try the offence. (2) The sentence pronounced was incompetent. The charge, which was laid under the Immoral Traffic (Scotland) Act, 1902, and the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, was a general charge of having committed an offence over a period extending from October 1912 to March 1913. The conviction was a general conviction, "guilty as libelled," i.e., a conviction of an offence extending over the whole period. But the Criminal Law Amendment Act, by which the maximum penalty was increased to six months, only came into operation on 13th December 1912, and therefore the offence, in so far as it was committed before that date, was a contravention only of the Immoral Traffic Act, under which the maximum penalty was three months. The magistrate, however, had imposed the penalty which was competent only for an

Hall v.
Macpherson.

Argued for the respondent ;—(1) It was unnecessary that jurisdiction should be expressly conferred by the statute ; jurisdiction might be inferred by implication from its terms.² The expression in the statute under consideration, "a Court of summary jurisdiction," necessarily implied that the offence might competently be tried before any such Court, and the City Police Court was such a Court. The case was distinguishable from M'Pherson v. Boyd.³ The words used in the Act under consideration in that case were "on summary conviction," and the Court had been unable to find in these words the implication which was plainly to be found in those of the Immoral Traffic Act, viz., "Court of summary jurisdiction."⁴ (2) The offence here libelled was one against the Immoral Traffic Act, and was in no way affected by the Act of 1912 except in the matter of the penalty.⁵ The conviction, therefore, was a good one, and the accused was properly sentenced to the penalty to which he was liable at the time of his conviction. In any case, the Court might amend the sentence by virtue of the provisions of section 75 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.*

At advising on 19th June 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—[After referring to the complaint and the statutes]—Two points have been taken against the conviction. In the first place, the jurisdiction of the Court is challenged. The Court, as I have mentioned, was the Police Court of the royal burgh of Edinburgh. The terms of the Act, which I have read, are that a person who lives on the earnings of prostitution is to be guilty of a crime or offence, and, if convicted thereof before a Court of summary jurisdiction, shall be liable to certain punishments. It seems to me that, when the Act of Parliament used the expression "Court of summary jurisdiction," it must be held to have done so in the cognisance of what were Courts of summary jurisdiction in Scotland, this being a Scottish Act and one not applying to England ; and that accordingly in this case there was jurisdiction in the Court before which the offence was tried. I conceive that in so holding I am not in any way going against the opinion of the Court, and especially against my own opinion, in the case of M'Pherson v. Boyd.⁴ In that case there was no mention of the Court before which the offence was to be tried, and there were indications connected with the provisions for appeal which showed very clearly that the Sheriff Court alone of the inferior Courts was meant. The general proposition, as laid down in that case, I humbly think was perfectly sound. But it is quite true that Parliament, being omnipotent in this June 19, 1913. matter, may give jurisdiction to any Court that it pleases, and the only point ^{Hall v. Macpherson.} is one of construction—whether it has been pleased to give jurisdiction to Courts other than the Sheriff Court and the High Court of Justiciary, which ^{Lord Justice-General.} have what we term an inherent jurisdiction for all crimes. I think here it is clearly an implication from the Act that jurisdiction is given to all Courts of summary jurisdiction as they exist in Scotland, and that the Burgh Police Court is one of them.

³ Rex v. Austin, [1913] 1 K. B. 551, 8 Crim. App. Cases, 169.

* The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 75, sets forth the grounds upon which a conviction, sentence, or order of the Court may be quashed, and contains this proviso :—"Provided always that the High Court may amend any conviction, sentence, judgment, order of court, or other proceeding, or may pronounce such other sentence, judgment, or order as they shall judge expedient."

The other matter that was dealt with is the question of the sentence. As your Lordships have noticed from my recital of the statutes, the penalty under the earlier Act was only three months, and it is only by the second Act that the penalty is increased to six months. Now the second Act only became law on the 13th December 1912, and the complaint is that the accused lived upon the earnings of prostitution between 1st October 1912 and 15th March 1913—that is to say, during a period which embraces time both before and after the passing of the amending Act. The conviction is general, and the punishment allotted is the larger punishment of six months. It seems to me that that cannot stand as it is, because we cannot tell that the actual instance that was proved, and which warranted conviction, may not have been prior to the 13th December 1912; and I cannot think that it was intended that the provision of the Act of 1912, which made the punishment the larger one of six months, was meant to apply to crimes which had already been committed. Accordingly, I do not think that the conviction as it is can stand.

But then I think this is a clear case where, under the provisions of the recent Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act of 1908, section 75, we are enabled to amend the sentence and thereby prevent any injustice being done to the accused without the necessity of quashing the conviction. The proviso of that section, after setting forth that all appeals shall be subject to the provisions of sections 60 and 72, says: "Provided always that the High Court may amend any conviction, sentence, judgment, order of court, or other proceeding, or may pronounce such other sentence, judgment, or order as they shall judge expedient." Accordingly, I think that the proper way of meeting the justice of this case is to reduce the sentence to three months.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I have no doubt that when the statute speaks of a Court of summary jurisdiction it means any Court of summary jurisdiction, because nothing can be more indefinite than the indefinite article, and it is clear that the Police Court of Edinburgh is such a Court. Therefore upon the jurisdiction I have no difficulty.

I have had more difficulty than your Lordship upon the other question, because I think there is some force in the argument that was addressed to us that the statute of 1912 supplies its own point of time for the determination of the question whether it is prospective only or retrospective also, not by reference to the time at which the offence is committed, but to the time at which the proceedings are instituted. But on consideration I have come to the conclusion that that argument depends too much upon a mere construction of words, and that the sound view is that which your Lordship has taken.

June 19, 1913. LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships. Upon the question of jurisdiction I regard the Act of 1902 as conferring per expressum jurisdiction to try offences under the statute upon any Court of summary jurisdiction, and therefore no argument can be derived in favour of the suspender from the case of M'Pherson,¹ to which your Lordship in the chair has referred. There the language of the Act was "on summary conviction," and the statute also provided that the appeal should be to the Sheriff-depute. That case, therefore, is entirely different from the present.

Hall v.
Macpherson.

In regard to the second question I confess I have no doubt. The complaint libels an offence as having been committed between 1st October 1912 and 15th March 1913. During the whole of this period the offence charged was a punishable offence, but under the Act of 1902 only with three months' imprisonment. A sentence of six months' imprisonment was only warranted by the Act of 1912, which did not come into operation until 13th December 1912. The accused was found guilty as libelled. Therefore the offence may have been committed in whole or in part during the period from 1st October to 13th December, when the maximum penalty was only three months' imprisonment. To hold that upon such a conviction a penalty can be awarded which could not have been inflicted during the period when the offence may have been committed, seems to me to lose sight of the deterrent effect of punishment. It would not, in my opinion, be fair to an offender, whatever the nature of his offence, to inflict a punishment upon him which was not before his eyes when he committed the offence.

As regards the application of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908, section 75, I think this is an appropriate case for amending the sentence and pronouncing the sentence proposed by your Lordship.

THE COURT reduced the sentence to one of three months' imprisonment, and quoad ultra refused the bill.

Lipsey v.
Mackintosh.

HARRY LIPSEY, Appellant.—Sandeman, K.C.—Duffes.
WILLIAM FYFE MACKINTOSH, (Procurator-Fiscal, Dundee), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Anderson—Gillon.

Jurisdiction—Statutory Offences—Betting—Sending postcards inviting to bet—Jurisdiction of Sheriff in Sheriffdom where cards received—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 10 (4).

Held that the Sheriff-substitute at Dundee had jurisdiction to try a Glasgow bookmaker charged with a contravention of the Betting Acts by sending by post to persons in Dundee cards inviting them to bet.

Complaint—Relevancy—Statutory offence—Specification of statutes—Inclusion of statutes creating different offence from offence charged—General conviction—Betting.

Review—Sentence—Amendment of sentence—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 75.

post cards containing invitations to bet, "contrary to" certain specified sections of the Betting Act, 1853, which deal with the offence of owning, occupying, or advertising betting houses, and certain sections of the Betting Act, 1874, which deal with the offence of inviting to bet. He was found "guilty as libelled."

The Court quashed the conviction, in respect that the sections of the Betting Act, 1853, libelled were not directed against the offence set forth in the complaint but against entirely different offences.

Held further that this was not a case in which the Court should amend the conviction under section 75 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.

On 3rd February 1913 Harry Lipsey, Glasgow, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Forfar on a summary complaint at the instance of William Fyfe Mackintosh, Procurator-fiscal of Forfarshire, at Dundee, which set forth that the accused did, on two specified occasions in January 1912, at some post office in Glasgow unknown to the prosecutor, send by post to certain police-constables in Dundee certain cards, which were received by the constables, and that by the cards so sent the accused invited the recipients to make with him or take a share in or in connection with bets or wagers on the football matches mentioned therein "all contrary to sections 1, 3, and 7 of the Betting Act, 1853, and sections 3 and 4 of the Betting Act, 1874, whereby you are liable in respect of each of the above offences to the penalties provided by section 7 of the Betting Act, 1853, with respect to offences under that section." *

At the diet of compareance on 12th February 1913 the accused appeared and his agent stated the following objections to the competency and relevance of the complaint:—" (First) To the competency; that the Court had no jurisdiction to try the complaint, the contraventions, if any, having been committed outwith the jurisdiction of the Court; (Second) To the relevancy; (1) Complaint irrelevant in respect that the accused is charged with a contravention of sections 1, 3, and 7 of the Betting Act, 1853, whereas on the face of it the contraventions, if proved, must be against section 3, subsection 3, of the Betting Act, 1874; (2) Complaint irrelevant in respect that the cards alleged to have been sent by the accused do not contain any invitation to bet."

The Sheriff-substitute (Neish) repelled these objections, and on 13th March 1913, after hearing evidence, he found the accused guilty as libelled and imposed a fine of £10, being £5 for each offence.

At the request of the accused he stated a case in which the following questions of law were, inter alia, put for the opinion of the High Court:—" (1) Had I jurisdiction to try the complaint? (2) Is the complaint relevant?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 31st May 1913.

In his argument for the respondent and in support of the relevancy of the complaint the Solicitor-General referred to Agnew v. Morley &

* The Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 119), provides, sec. 1, that no house, &c., shall be kept for the purposes of betting, and by secs. 3 and 7 imposes penalties on persons owning or occupying and on persons advertising betting-houses respectively.

The Betting Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 15), sec. 3 imposes a penalty on any person sending a letter, card, or advertisement inviting any person to make or take a share in or in connection with any bet or wager.

June 19, 1913. Anderson,¹ in which case a complaint in somewhat similar terms had been held to be relevant.² He further contended that should the Court sustain the objection to the relevancy of the complaint this was a case in which the conviction should be amended in terms of section 75 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.³

Lipsey v.
Mackintosh.

At advising on 19th June 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—[After referring to the charge and stating the objections]—As regards the first objection of no jurisdiction, I think that is quite untenable. I need not go into the matter. I think the matter is perfectly well settled by the series of cases that are generally known as the "Long-firm Cases." In all these cases, where something is going on by the medium of the post, the offence is really committed, if I may use the expression, at both ends of the transmission by the post office. I base my judgment here upon the general law, but I think this objection is probably entirely met by section 10 (4) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.

But I think the second objection ought to have been sustained. The Betting Act of 1853 provides, in section 1, that no house, &c., shall be kept for the purpose of the owner or occupier betting with other persons. Section 3 imposes a penalty on the owner or occupier of a betting-house, and section 7 imposes a penalty on persons exhibiting placards or advertising betting-houses. Now, there is not a word in the complaint here about keeping a betting-house or advertising a betting-house. Yet not only was the objection not sustained, but the case went to trial, and there was a general conviction, that is to say, the accused was convicted of offences under sections which there was no attempt to prove had ever been contravened. I think that the conviction is bad upon those grounds. That being so, I do not think it is necessary to go into the somewhat more delicate question of whether, in this case, there was an invitation to bet or whether there was not.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion as your Lordship. As to the objection to jurisdiction, it is to my mind quite untenable. I think the objection to the relevancy, however, is perfectly well founded. The complaint, when read short, really means that inasmuch as you, the accused, wrote certain letters, you are guilty of the offence of keeping a betting-house, and also of the offence of advertising a betting-house, and therefore are within the scope of sections 1, 3, and 7 of the Betting Act of 1853. Now, writing letters giving information as to bets or inviting bets is one thing, and keeping a public betting-house is another and different thing, and I confess I am quite unable to understand why the charge of contravention of these sections of the Act of 1853 was ever brought into the complaint. The complaint specifically alleged, and the complaint which the prosecutor undertook to prove, has nothing whatever to do with these sections. But then the the accused was found guilty as libelled, that is to say, he was found guilty of a contravention of each and all of these sections ; and I think that is a June 19, 1913. conviction which cannot stand.

Lipsev v.
Mackintosh.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships, and only desire to add that in my opinion this is not a suitable case for applying the provisions of section 75 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908. In this case it would not only be necessary to reconsider the sentence but to remodel the libel and conviction. I do not in the least mean to suggest a limitation of the powers of the Court under section 75, but I do not consider they should be exercised in the circumstances of the present case.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I should like to add that I quite agree with what my learned brother Lord Mackenzie has said. The distinction between this case and the case we have just disposed of (*Hall v. Macpherson*¹) is very obvious. In the last case there was no question that the man had been quite properly convicted of the offence, that is to say, he had been found guilty of living on the earnings of prostitution. All that was wrong was that a bigger penalty was imposed than ought to have been imposed. That was a clear case for amending. But here we have the accused found guilty as libelled, that is to say, he is convicted of all and sundry of the offences, some of which, we find, there was no ground for convicting him of at all. If we amended the sentence here we should be retrying the case for ourselves, because we cannot tell what the views of the Court were when he was convicted of something of which he ought not to have been convicted at all.

THE COURT sustained the appeal and quashed the conviction.

Procedure—Indictment—Theft—Relevancy of indictment—Charge of stealing book containing trade secrets and making copies and appropriating secrets—Latitude in time. H. M. Advocate v. Mackenzie.

An indictment against a husband and wife charged the husband (1) with stealing between 3rd July 1907 and 2nd April 1913 a book of recipes of chemical secrets belonging to his employers, and (2) with making during the same period copies of the recipes with intent to dispose of them for profit in breach of an agreement of secrecy with his employers ; and charged the wife with offering to dispose of these or other copies to the employers' trade rivals, in the knowledge that the copies had been fraudulently made by her husband, and with thus appropriating to her own profit trade secrets which were the exclusive property of the employers.

Held, with regard to the charges against the husband, that the first was relevant in respect that the taking of a book in order to copy its contents for an illegitimate purpose was theft, although there might be no intention to retain the book, but that the second was irrelevant as it merely charged the accused with the preparation for, and not with the perpetration of, a crime. Held further, that the charge against the wife being dependent on the second charge against the husband fell with it, and in any event was irrelevant in respect that it set forth no overt or accomplished criminal act.

Smith, Limited, you, Hector Mackenzie, did steal a book containing recipes of value relative to secret processes for the manufacture of chemical products, the exclusive property of the said T. & H. Smith, Limited, and in particular, recipes for the preparation and manufacture of" (certain specified chemical preparations); "and (second) time and place or places above libelled, you, Hector Mackenzie, being engaged in a confidential capacity as an assistant, first at Blandfield Works, Canonmills, aforesaid, and subsequently at Blandfield Works, Wheatfield Road, aforesaid, in the service of the said T. & H. Smith, Limited, and being bound by your agreement of service with them not to make known, directly or indirectly, to anyone, so long as you remained in said service or at any time after its termination, the secrets of your said employers, or of their manufactures, trade, or business, or of or connected with any of the processes used by them at the date when you entered their service as assistant aforesaid, or at any time thereafter, nevertheless did, in breach of your said agreement and obligation above set forth, and of the trust reposed by your said employers in you as their assistant aforesaid, make copies from the said book, particularly of the recipes for the preparations, manufactures, and processes hereinbefore specifically set forth, and that with intent to dispose of said copies for valuable consideration to trade rivals of the said T. & H. Smith, Limited, and you Anna Mackenzie, knowing the said copies to have been made fraudulently by your said husband, did, between 1st and 21st April 1913, at No. 5a Eyre Place, Edinburgh, or elsewhere in Edinburgh, to the prosecutor unknown, offer to dispose of or furnish said copies or other copies made or to be made therefrom for a valuable consideration to" (certain manufacturing chemists named), "and you Anna Mackenzie did thus attempt to appropriate to your own profit trade secrets which were the exclusive property of the said T. & H. Smith, Limited."

On 16th June 1913 the case was heard before the High Court on objections to the relevancy of the indictment.

Argued for the panel Hector Mackenzie;—The first charge was irrelevant in respect that too great a latitude of time was taken by the prosecutor. A latitude of six years was both unprecedented and unreasonable in a simple charge of stealing a book. This objection also applied to the second charge. The first charge was also irrelevant in respect that there was no such thing as "exclusive property" in processes or recipes for processes, except perhaps where rights of patent or copyright had been granted, which were not alleged to exist here. At any rate, there could never be an invasion of a right in a process or recipe without publication, and it was not said that there had been any publication by the accused. The second charge was irrelevant because it merely set forth the breach of a civil contract not to disclose the processes, for which the appropriate remedy was an action of damages; it did not set forth anything amounting to criminal fraud. There never could be a crime without an overt act,¹ and here no overt act was alleged to have been committed.

Argued for the panel Anna Mackenzie;—The charge against the wife depended upon and was ancillary to the charge against the husband, and if the charge against the husband was defective it followed ipso facto that the charge against the wife could not stand. The charge against the husband was irrelevant for the reasons stated by his counsel, and that was per se a sufficient answer for the wife. If, however, the charge of theft against the husband was relevant the charge against the wife was obviously bad. They were both indicted with the crime of theft. If the husband stole the book the crime was complete; the employers were divested of possession, and nothing which the wife subsequently did by way of making copies of the contents of the book could constitute a theft from the employers. It could not even be said that she was "appropriating trade secrets which were the exclusive property" of the employers, because these secrets had already, on the theory of the Crown, been appropriated by the husband. Further, the disclosure of trade secrets was not a common law crime. In the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,² there was no scheduled form of indictment for such an offence, and the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901,³ and the Post Office (Protection) Act, 1884,⁴ both provided special statutory penalties for the disclosure of secrets. In any event, however, the indictment was further radically bad in that it did not state that any disclosure had actually been made.

Argued for the Crown;—The first charge was clearly relevant; it was a simple charge of stealing a book, and even if the description of the contents of the book were faulty that was immaterial. To constitute theft of the book it was not necessary that the book should have been removed from the employers' premises; if it was temporarily removed from the desk or safe where it was kept that was sufficient amotio to satisfy the requirement of the law.⁵ Latitude of time in an indictment was always a question of circumstances, and here the latitude was reasonable and could cause the accused no prejudice.⁶ As to the second charge, the purloining of trade secrets was an offence known to the law.⁷ All the charges really constituted one crime, and accordingly the charge against the wife was good.

H. M. Advocate v.
Mackenzie.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first charge in this indictment is a charge of theft against the male prisoner. It sets forth a very great latitude in respect of time, ranging over nearly six years. The justification of the latitude so taken, which is unprecedented so far as I am aware, is made in argument on the ground that the book said to have been stolen was a book of recipes, and that it was taken in order to obtain copies of these recipes, and that the prosecutor does not know when the actual taking occurred. I should myself have expected that a prosecutor proposing to take such a latitude would have set forth facts to indicate his difficulty in being more precise, as, for example, that the accused was in the employment of the owners of the book during the period given, and thus had opportunities of taking possession of it without the fact of his having done so becoming known to the owners. And certainly, if the case were allowed to go to trial, the prosecutor would have to show by his evidence that the latitude taken was not unfairly taken, and if he failed to do so, his failure might lead to his not being able to obtain a verdict. While I refrain from expressing an opinion as to whether the extreme latitude of time taken should not be fatal to the charge for lack of a justifying statement, I may say that, as I understand no trial is to proceed on the present indictment without a new service, the advisers of the Crown may well consider whether, if they are to proceed further with the case, they will not frame an indictment which may be more satisfactory in this respect. I am not prepared to cast the indictment on this point, but it certainly would be more satisfactory, in a case so peculiar, for the prosecutor to express in the indictment the cause justifying a latitude so extreme.

As regards the charge of theft, I cannot see any ground for holding it to be irrelevant. The charge is stealing a book, and that charge the prosecutor will have to prove by sufficient evidence. All defences, such as that there was only a trespass and not a theft, will be open to the accused. The indictment seems to hint at the book having been taken, not to appropriate the actual article itself, but in order to obtain the opportunity of copying part of its contents for an illegitimate purpose. That such a taking, although there is no intention to retain the article, may be theft is, I think, clear. The article is taken from its owner for the serious purpose of obtaining something of value through the possession of it. And that such an action may be a theft is shown by the case of a person who desires to enter premises for a felonious purpose, and takes possession of the key by which the security of the premises is protected. Although he has no desire or intention to appropriate and keep the key, he is held to have stolen the key, he having taken it in order to facilitate the carrying out of his criminal intention. In this case the prosecutor charging the accused with stealing a book described fulfils all the requirements of relevancy, and if he can make out by his evidence that the book was taken, and taken with a nefarious purpose, he may be able to obtain a direction in law from the Judge at the trial that what was done constituted a theft of the book. It is quite evident that a book of no real value in itself may be of great value because of what is written in it. I think, therefore, that the charge of theft against the male prisoner must be held to be relevant.

The second charge against the male prisoner is that he was bound by his agreement with his employers not to make known to others the secrets of their business, and that he did in breach of trust make copies of recipes "with intent to dispose of said copies for valuable consideration to trade rivals."

June 20, 1913.
H. M. Advocate v. Mackenzie.

I am quite unable to hold that this is a relevant charge of crime, either completed crime or attempted crime. It is a charge covering a preparation for crime only—assuming that the completed act or actual attempt would infer crime—but it is not a charge of anything done that can be called an overt act. The law does not strike at preparation to commit a crime unless by special statutory enactment such preparation is placed in the category of crime. The analogy which comes nearest to the present case is that of forgery. No successful prosecution can take place so as to secure punishment for the preparation of a forgery. The overt act of uttering is essential to a conviction. The forger is not amenable to the law because he has made a forgery or has a forgery in his possession, whatever may be his intent to make use of it to effect a felonious end. Thus in the old indictments, although forgery and uttering were charged, there could be no conviction of the forgery unless the uttering was proved. It must have gone beyond his power to abstain from using by his having used it, by actually presenting it, or posting it, or so putting it out of his own possession that there is no longer any locus poenitentiae. Till this is done, however much the making or the possession of the fabricated document may indicate moral delinquency, his act does not bring him within the grasp of the law. He has not proceeded to put his nefarious intention into operation. He is like a man who has prepared false keys in order to enter the premises of another for a felonious purpose, but has never used them. This well-established and most just rule of law, which does not allow of punishment for unfulfilled intents and preparations which have not culminated in an irrevocable act of commission or attempt, is only, as I have said, set aside in certain cases by statutory enactments for special reasons. Thus the manufacture of spurious banknotes is constituted a criminal offence without there being any proof of uttering. The statute strikes at the manufacture of false banknotes as being a thing highly dangerous to the general community, and calling for special State intervention. That a statute should be necessary to check such wholesale manufacture illustrates the rule that the preparation of a fraudulent document, or a document intended to be fraudulently used, is not in itself a punishable crime, and that it requires an overt act of use to constitute an indictable offence. In this indictment the statement that he made the copies with an intent to dispose of them to trade rivals, is not an averment of any act done, but only of a state of mind, which might be gone back upon, and nothing done to carry out the intent. I have therefore no hesitation in holding the second charge against the male prisoner to be irrelevant.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

There remains the charge against the female prisoner, and this, in view of the irrelevancy of the second charge against the male prisoner, must fall with it. The charge is expressed in a very extraordinary way. It states that the female prisoner knew that her husband had fraudulently made copies of recipes. But if, as I hold, the allegation made against the husband does not constitute a relevant charge of fraud, how can she be said to June 20, 1913. have known that he had acted fraudulently? For the word "fraudulently" must here be held to be meant to express a crime committed. But if no crime is relevantly averred to have been committed, it follows that she cannot be charged in the sequence of this indictment with knowing a fraud had been committed. And that being so, the whole basis of what follows necessarily falls away.

H. M. Advocate v.
Mackenzie.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

Even were it otherwise, I feel that I must say that my strong impression is that, apart from the ground of objection above dealt with, what is charged here against the female prisoner does not amount to an overt act of crime. It is alleged only that she "offered to dispose" of recipes to certain people. That is that in words, whether written or spoken, she made an offer to give them certain things for a consideration. Even if it would have been criminal had she carried out the offer and handed over the recipes and got the consideration, I cannot see that her mere expression of a willingness to do so would constitute a crime or an attempt to commit crime. To me it appears reasonable to say that, as long as she was in the position of being able to draw back and repent of her proposal, she could not be held to have committed an offence for which she could be dealt with as a criminal. Her conduct in intending to sell the recipes might be morally reprehensible, but she had only spoken or written of an intention to do an act; she had not done any act which falls within the category either of accomplished or attempted crime. All as regards action was still in her own power either to do or not to do. If she did not do, can it be said that crime was committed? She had done nothing; she had only evinced an intention to do something. It was still open to her not to proceed to do it, should she so resolve. I have thought it right to express my view on the charge as stated, although from the fact that it must fall along with the second charge against the male prisoner with which it is structurally connected, it is unnecessary to decide the question of relevancy as regards the female prisoner on the special grounds to which I have last referred.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur with the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD SALVESSEN.—This is an unusual case; and I am not surprised that the Crown have found difficulty in framing the indictment. There are three charges—two against the male accused and one against his wife. There is no suggestion that the two acted in concert; and, indeed, the indictment excludes this view.

As regards the first charge I am of opinion that the objection to relevancy fails. The charge is simply one of theft of a book, which is described as containing certain recipes. It is not said to whom the book belonged, although the recipes which it contained are described as being the exclusive property of T. & H. Smith, Limited. It was, however, conceded that it is not necessary, to make a charge of theft relevant, that the indictment should contain a statement that the article stolen was the property or in the lawful possession of any given person. Here the book is sufficiently described, and the place from which it was stolen is also set forth. The most serious objection was that the latitude of time was too great, and, at first sight, a charge of theft of a single article as having been committed June 20, 1913. between 3rd July 1907 and 2nd April 1913 is unusual, but the circumstances are also unusual. The male accused is said to have been in the service of the firm from whose premises the book was stolen during the whole of that period; and the Crown say that they cannot condescend on a particular date when the theft was committed. One can figure many parallel instances. Thus a dismissed servant is found in possession of a piece of plate belonging to his master. He has been in the master's service for some years; and there is no definite evidence as to when the piece of plate was last seen. Nevertheless it may be reasonably certain that it was abstracted at some time during the period of service. A criminal might well escape punishment for such a theft if it were necessary to specify the date at which it was committed. I am therefore of opinion that this objection fails.

It may be gathered from the second charge that the book itself was not appropriated; but if it was removed by the accused, for the purpose of making copies of its contents, and if he had no right to have it in his possession at all, the charge of theft may be substantiated. It is no defence that the property has been restored by the thief, especially if he has done so only after the theft has served its purpose. If this is the true nature of the first charge, then the fact of copies having been made from the book may be the main evidence of the alleged theft, which will be more or less serious according to the purpose which the accused had in view in making the copies.

As regards the second charge, I think it is irrelevant. It sets forth a breach of the accused's contract of service with his employers, but this is primarily a civil wrong. The indictment narrates that the accused, being bound not to make known the secrets of his employers, did, in breach of his obligation, make copies of certain secret recipes. It does not, however, go on to state that he disclosed them to others or made any use of them himself. Assuming that he intended to do so, no overt act on his part is alleged. This charge seems to assume that the accused had access to the book with his employers' authority; for if he stole the book, in order to make the copies, such an offence is already covered by the first charge. I cannot affirm that it is a crime for a clerk to make copies from an employer's book, which copies he neither discloses nor makes use of in any way. He has, of course, no legal right to make such copies, and they would fall to be given up by him to his employer or destroyed. It may even be that the accused was demonstrably preparing himself to do his employer a wrong; but it is not a crime to make preparations with a view to committing some crime in the future. A man may purchase a pistol with the avowed object of shooting an enemy; but if the pistol remains in his possession unused, he has committed no crime.

The third charge is confined to the wife of the male accused, and it is bound up with the second charge against him—which we are all agreed is irrelevant. It, accordingly, starts badly. Its substance is that she, knowing that certain copies of recipes which were in her husband's possession had been made fraudulently by him, offered to dispose of these copies, or other copies to be made therefrom, to certain rivals in trade of the Messrs Smith. Now while the word "fraudulently" is used in this charge, it must be interpreted by what is said as to how the male accused got possession of the copies.

June 20, 1913. So interpreted, it simply means that Mrs Mackenzie knew that these copies had been made by her husband in breach of his contract of service. It is not said that she actually disclosed the contents to any person; merely that she offered to do so for a valuable consideration. It is not even alleged that she ever had possession of them. Now, however reprehensible such conduct may have been, and assuming a criminal intention to be proveable, there is still no overt act alleged such as to exclude locus poenitentiae on her part. It is very much the same thing as if she had offered to steal the book, and make copies of its contents, if she were well paid for doing so. The person who made such an offer would be potentially a criminal; but, if the offer was not accepted and nothing followed, he would not have actually committed a crime. I am accordingly of opinion with your Lordships that this charge also fails upon relevancy.

THE COURT repelled the objections to the first charge against the male panel, and quoad ultra held the indictment irrelevant.

SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—P. GARDINER GILLESPIE & GILLESPIE, S.S.C.—HUME M'GREGOR & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 23. JOHN MORRISON, Complainer (Appellant).—D.-F. Dickson—Paton.
DUNCAN ANDERSON, Respondent.—MacRobert.

July 16, 1913.

Morrison v.
Anderson.

Statutory Offences—Game—Trespassing in pursuit of game or rabbits—Complaint—Relevancy—Alternative charge—Game (Scotland) Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68), sec. 1—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 18, and Schedule C.

Held that a complaint brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, charging an accused with trespassing in pursuit of "game or rabbits," contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 1, was relevant, and not open to the objection that it libelled alternative charges.

Procedure—Trial—Administration of Justice—Prosecution under Game (Scotland) Act, 1832—Emergence of question of civil right—Lease—Game—Ground game—Right of joint tenant in common pasturage to give authority to kill rabbits—Ground Game Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 47).

In a prosecution in the Sheriff Court for trespassing in pursuit of game or rabbits contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 1, the question arose whether one of five joint tenants of a common pasturage had the right to authorise a third party to kill rabbits upon the land.

Held that a question of civil right had emerged, and accordingly that the complaint fell to be dismissed.

Question whether the common law right of the tenant of a farm verbally to authorise another to kill rabbits for the preservation of his crops was available to a tenant of pasture ground common to several tenants; and opinion reserved upon the applicability of the Ground Game Act, 1880, to such a tenancy.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Dewar.
Lord Hunter.

DUNCAN ANDERSON was charged in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire at Oban on a complaint at the instance of John Morrison, with the concurrence of Donald Mackenzie, Procurator-fiscal, Oban, which set forth that "on 22nd August Nineteen hundred and twelve, upon the common pasture lying between the farm of Brolas, Airds Bay, Taynuilt, and the land of Airds Park, Muckairn, Taynuilt, which common pasture lying as aforesaid is upon and part of the estate of Airds Bay, belonging to the complainer, in the united parish of Ardochattan and Muckairn and county of Argyll, you did in the daytime trespass on said land forming said common pasture in search or pursuit of game or rabbits, contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, section 1, whereby you are liable to a penalty not exceeding £2, together with the costs of conviction, and, in default of payment of said penalty, to imprisonment in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sections 47 and 48."*

Morrison v.
Anderson.

At the trial the accused's agent stated the following objections to relevancy of the complaint:—“(1) The complaint is irrelevant in respect that trespassing in pursuit of ‘game or rabbits,’ as libelled, is an alternative charge. (2) Complaint irrelevant in respect that a civil right is involved.”

The Sheriff-substitute (Wallace) sustained the first objection and allowed the complaint to be amended by the deletion of the words “game or.” With regard to the second objection he repelled it hoc statu, being of opinion that at that stage of the case there was nothing before him to enable him to dispose of the objection. Thereafter the accused pleaded not guilty and the case proceeded to trial.

After hearing evidence the Sheriff-substitute dismissed the complaint on the ground that it raised a question of civil right.

The complainer, John Morrison, obtained a stated case on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

In the stated case the Sheriff stated that the following facts, inter alia, had been admitted or proved to his satisfaction:—“(1) The accused was the brother of Peter Anderson, the agricultural tenant of Sandbank Croft, Airds Bay, Taynuilt. (2) Peter Anderson was one of five tenants of the common pasture referred to in the complaint, the tenancy being held under a lease for a number of years. (3) The locus was not unenclosed lands, nor moorlands, nor a detached portion of moorland. Peter Anderson was sole tenant of Sandbank Croft, which is arable land, with right of pasture on said common pasture, and enclosed. (4) The five tenants of the common pasture had agreed that any one of their number might shoot ground game thereon. (5) The accused had written authority from his brother (Peter Anderson) to shoot ground game on the common pasture, previous to and on the date libelled. (6) At the time no demand was made by the complainer's gamekeeper on the accused to produce any written authority by his brother to shoot on said common pasture, nor was there ever any demand made in the sense of section 1 (1) (c) of the Ground Game Act, 1880. (7) The complainer was proprietor of the locus.”

* The Game (Scotland) Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68) enacts:—Sec. 1. “. . . That if any Person whatsoever shall commit any Trespass by entering, or being, in the Daytime, upon any Land, without Leave of the Proprietor, in search or pursuit of Game, or of Deer, Roe . . . or Conies, such Person shall” on conviction be liable to a penalty.

The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), enacts:—Sec. 18. “All proceedings under this Act for the trial of offences or recovery of penalties shall be instituted by complaint in the form contained in Schedule C to this Act. . . .”

Schedule C contains the following form:—“You did in the daytime trespass on said land in search or pursuit of game (or rabbits), contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 1; whereby,” &c.

July 16, 1913.

Morrison v.
Anderson.

He also set forth at length a number of other facts which showed that the accused had been on the common pasture on the occasion in question in suspicious circumstances. He then stated that he had dismissed the complaint on the ground that a question of civil right had arisen which had been expressed by the agent of the accused in the following terms:—"A civil right is involved, in respect that the accused is a brother of the agricultural tenant of Sandbank Croft, and is authorised by his brother in writing to shoot both on the arable land and on the common pasture referred to in the complaint, the five tenants of said pasture having decided that any one of their number might shoot on said pasture; and further that the proprietor is endeavouring to have the question as to these five tenants' right to shoot tried in this Court."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were, inter alia, the following:—" (1) Was I right in sustaining the first objection to the relevancy, and allowing the complaint to be amended?" " (3) On the facts admitted and found proved, was I right, following on the motion of accused's agent, in finding that the question of civil right referred to had arisen? (4) If so, and on the authorities submitted,* was I right in dismissing the complaint with £2, 2s. of expenses to accused?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 6th March 1913. †

Argued for the appellant;—(1) There was no necessity to strike out the words "game or" to make the complaint relevant, as the complaint did not libel alternative charges¹ and was in the usual form.² Under section 1 of the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, there was only one offence, viz., trespassing in pursuit of either game or rabbits. These were not two offences, one trespassing in pursuit of game, the other trespassing in pursuit of rabbits; and the section merely referred to two modes of committing the same offence, the essence of which was trespassing with intent to poach. The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1908³ did not affect the question. It was a statute dealing purely with procedure, and could not make alternative offences out of what was a single offence before its date. Moreover, the forms contained in Schedule C were merely illustrations of the specification required to make a valid complaint.⁴ It was unnecessary to insert the words "without leave of the proprietor," as these words were implied.⁵

* All the authorities referred to by the Sheriff-substitute were cited before the High Court, except Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), secs. 24 and 26 (5); Crofters Common Grazings Regulation Act, 1891 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 41); and Johnston on Small Landholders Act, 1911, p. 49.

† At the same time an appeal was heard from a decision of the same Sheriff-substitute at the instance of Charles Neil Macdonald, the complainer in a complaint which charged the same accused with trespassing on certain lands (of which the complainer was the sporting tenant), "in search or pursuit of game or rabbits" contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, section 1. The complainer refused in the Sheriff Court to amend the complaint by deleting the words "game or," and the Sheriff-substitute dismissed the complaint.

(2) The facts stated did not raise a question of civil right, and no such question had arisen at the stage of the proceedings at which the Sheriff-substitute had dismissed the complaint. It might be that the general question whether one of several joint tenants could authorise an outsider to kill rabbits on the joint holding was a question of civil right, but that question had not arisen in the present case, because the accused had failed to prove what was a necessary preliminary to that question, viz., that, on the assumption that the joint tenant was in the same position as a sole tenant, the accused was a person to whom such authority could have, and had in fact, been given. In the present case it was only under the Ground Game Act, 1880,¹ that the tenant could have granted the authority in question, because any common law right of destroying rabbits which a tenant possessed apart from that Act was limited to the case where rabbits were destroying crops, when the tenant could kill them in order to protect the crops² and was founded upon the view that rabbits were vermin,³ a view discountenanced in Lord Advocate v. Young.⁴ Here, however, there was no crop, for hill pasture was not crop, and there was no averment even that the pasture was being destroyed. But under the Ground Game Act the authority had to be in writing, and here no written authority had actually been produced; and further, it was only to a limited class of persons that that authority could be given,⁵ and it had not been proved that the accused fell within that class.⁶ It followed accordingly that the accused's position was hopelessly bad whatever were the rights and powers of the person who granted the authority, and accordingly the question of the rights and powers of the granter was one which did not come into the case, and did not at any rate fall to be settled at this stage of the proceedings.⁷ Being, however, only the tenant of a common grazing, it was clear that he was without the scope of the Ground Game Act and enjoyed none of the privileges conferred thereby.⁸ In any event the case should not have been stopped until the question of civil right, if there was one, had been fully ascertained and developed, which had not been done here.⁹

Argued for the respondent;—(1) A complaint charging a trespass in pursuit of "game or rabbits" was irrelevant, in respect that it libelled alternative offences,¹⁰ viz., trespassing in pursuit of game, or trespassing in pursuit of rabbits. Being brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, it fell to be brought in the precise form given in the Schedule appended to that Act,¹¹ and the presence there of the brackets round the words "or rabbits" indicated alter-

July 16, 1913. native offences. The accused was accordingly entitled to know with which offence he was charged. The complaint was further irrelevant in respect that it did not state that the act had been done without the leave of the proprietor, and section 8 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, had no application to such an omission. (2) The Sheriff had rightly dismissed the complaint because the disclosed facts raised a question of civil right,¹ viz., whether the tenant, being one of five tenants, had a right to authorise the accused to kill rabbits. That was the only question in the case, because no objection could be taken to the form of the authority given. The Sheriff had found it proved that the authority was written, and no objection had been taken in the Court below to the fact that the writing had not been produced. The authority accordingly complied with the requirements of the Ground Game Act, 1880, which applied to the land here in question in respect that it did not fall under the exception provided for in section 1 (2), viz., common or moorland land. But in any event authority in writing was unnecessary, seeing that at common law a tenant had a right to kill rabbits for the protection of his holding, and could delegate that right without writing.² Reference was also made to the undernoted cases.³

At advising on 16th July 1913,—

LORD HUNTER.—The first question which arises in this stated case is as to the form of complaint. The complainer charged the respondent in the complaint, which was brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, with trespassing upon lands of which the complainer is proprietor in search or pursuit of game or rabbits, contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, section 1. Objection was taken to the complaint as irrelevant, in respect that trespassing "in pursuit of game or rabbits" as libelled, is an alternative charge. The Sheriff-substitute sustained this objection. The complainer's agent then moved for leave to amend by deleting the words "game or." Leave was granted and, the amendment having been made, the case went to trial. The necessity for our considering the point arises from the circumstance that in a second case against the same respondent the complainer refused to amend, and the Sheriff-substitute thereupon dismissed the complaint.

It is not disputed that under the Game Act the complaint is relevant, as the offence struck at is trespassing in pursuit of either game or rabbits. The introduction of the word "or" does not introduce two offences, but refers to two modes of committing the offence, the essence of which consists in trespassing. By the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908, Schedule C, the form of complaint given for day trespass in pursuit of game or rabbits is: "You did in the daytime trespass on said land in search or pursuit of game (or rabbits) contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act 1832, section 1." July 16, 1913. The respondent says that the complaint if brought under the 1908 Act must be in the precise form given, and that the presence of the brackets round the words "or rabbits" indicates an alternative offence to trespassing in pursuit of game. For this contention I find no support in the provisions of the Act 1908. On the other hand, as I read section 19 of that Act, the forms contained in Schedule C, in terms of which complaints are to be stated, are given merely as illustrative of the specification which is sufficient to make a valid complaint. It is expressly provided that the description of any offence in the words of the statute contravened shall be sufficient. I find nothing to suggest that what was one offence under the Game Act, 1832, became two offences under the Summary Jurisdiction Act. The case of Connell,¹ to which the Sheriff-substitute refers, does not appear to me to support any such contention. I think, therefore, that the Sheriff-substitute took a wrong view as to the form of complaint, which, in my opinion, was valid and did not require amendment.

The second question arises in this way. The complainer led evidence, the result of which is set forth in the facts which the Sheriff-substitute found proved. The ground over which the respondent was alleged to have trespassed in pursuit of rabbits was pasture ground, over which the respondent's brother had a right of pasturage—his lease as I understand giving him right to sole occupation of a certain amount of arable ground and a right of pasturage over the ground in question along with five other tenants. The respondent adduced his brother as a witness, and he testified, and the Sheriff believed him, that he had given authority to his brother to shoot rabbits. The giving of such a licence involved a claim by the tenant of a right for himself to shoot rabbits or to authorise another to do so for him. Accordingly the Sheriff-substitute held that a question of civil right had arisen, and he dismissed the complaint.

In taking the course which he did the Sheriff-substitute appears to have proceeded mainly, if not entirely, upon the provisions of the Ground Game Act, 1880. Assuming that Act to apply in the circumstances of this case—and I express no opinion upon that matter—I think that the person founding upon a right to shoot over land of which he is not occupier must produce written authority from the tenant. The Sheriff has found that the respondent had such authority; but there is no record of the production of any writing, and the complainer says that no writing was produced. This would probably lead to our having to remit the case to the Sheriff to hear further evidence, unless the course taken by him is justified upon other grounds. In my opinion, however, it was so justified.

At common law the tenant of a farm is entitled in the absence of restriction in his lease to kill rabbits, at all events for the preservation of his crops. He is also entitled to authorise anyone to kill rabbits on his farm—see Calder,² *Stewart*³; and a person prosecuted under the Day Trespass Act may establish such authority without producing any written mandate from the tenant—Jack.⁴ I think it may be a question whether this right

July 16, 1913. on the part of a tenant gives him a right to authorise shooting of rabbits over pasture ground common to several tenants. But, on the respondent's establishing to the Sheriff's satisfaction, as he apparently did, that he had authority from a tenant of the ground to kill rabbits, I think the case assumed a new aspect. It then became no longer a question of trespassing in pursuit of rabbits, but a question whether the tenant had a right to give such authority as he claimed to have given. I therefore think that the third and fourth questions fall to be answered in the affirmative.

Held (in a case before the National Insurance Act, 1913, sec. 41 (5), had come into operation) that the Scottish Insurance Commissioners, established under the National Insurance Act, 1911, had no title under that Act or otherwise to prosecute a complaint under section 69 (2) in respect of failure to pay contributions under the Act; and that the prosecution should have been at the instance of the public prosecutor.

Lord Justice-
General.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Dundas.
Ld. Johnston.
Lord Guthrie.

IN December 1912 William Rintoul, farmer, Kembach, Cupar, Fife, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Cupar on a summary complaint at the instance of "the Scottish Insurance Commissioners, established under the National Insurance Act, 1911, with the concurrence of George Brander, Procurator-fiscal of the Sheriff Court of Fife and Kinross at Cupar, for the public interest," setting forth that the accused had failed to pay (1) on or before 13th October 1912, and (2) on or before 28th November 1912, the contributions payable by him in terms of the National Insurance Act, 1911, section 4, part 1 of the second schedule of the Act, the third schedule of the Act, and section 6 of the National Health Insurance (Collection of Contributions) Regulations, dated 4th and 10th July 1912, in respect of three farm servants, David Allison, Andrew Jack, and Matthew Wilson, employed by him for the period from 15th July 1912 to 28th November 1912, "whereby you are liable in respect of each such default to a fine not exceeding £10, in terms of section 69 (2) of the National Insurance Act, 1911, and in default in payment to imprisonment, in terms of sections 47 and 48 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, and July 17, 1913. you are further liable in terms of section 69 (2) of the National Insurance Act, 1911, to pay to the Scottish Insurance Commissioners the sum of" £1, 15s., "being a sum equal to the amount of the contributions which you have failed to pay, as aforesaid, in respect of the said" employees.*

Rintoul v. Scottish Insurance Commissioners.

The accused objected to the competency of the complaint on the ground, inter alia, that the complainers had no title to prosecute. He also stated objections to the relevancy of the complaint.

The Sheriff-substitute (Armour-Hannay) repelled all the objections. The accused then pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led, was found guilty as libelled. He was fined £3 as a cumulo penalty, and sentenced, in default of payment, to fifteen days' imprisonment, and was also decerned to pay £1, 15s. to the Commissioners, being the amount of the contributions which he had failed to pay.

He asked for and obtained a case for appeal, in which the question of law for the opinion of the Court was, "Was I right in repelling the objections to the competency and relevancy of the complaint?"

The appellant ultimately abandoned all objections except the objection to the instance of the complaint.

The case was heard before the High Court on 19th and 20th March 1913, and was remitted to a full bench, before which it was heard on 28th and 29th May 1913.

The arguments of parties sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Judges. The undernoted authorities were referred to.¹

* The National Insurance Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55), enacts:—Sec. 69. "(2) If any employer has failed to pay any contributions which under this part of this Act he is liable to pay in respect of an employed contributor, or if any such employer, any insured person, or any other person, is guilty of any other contravention of, or non-compliance with, any of the requirements of this part of this Act, or the regulations made thereunder, in respect of which no special penalty is provided, he shall for each offence be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £10, and where the offence is failure or neglect on the part of the employer to make any such contributions, to pay to the Insurance Commissioners a sum equal to the amount of the contributions which he has so failed or neglected to pay, which sum when paid shall be treated as a payment in satisfaction of such contributions."

July 17, 1913. At advising on 17th July 1913:—

Rintoul v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The main question in this appeal is whether the Commissioners appointed by the Treasury under the Insurance Act of 1911 have a title to prosecute for penalties to which persons are liable in certain circumstances in terms of that Act. It is important at the outset to consider what are the recognised qualifications which in Scotland confer the right to prosecute. These are, I think, four in number. First, there is the universal qualification of the Lord Advocate to prosecute by himself or by the officers under him. Second, there is the qualification of a person injured or aggrieved by the criminal act of another, either by an injury caused to himself, or it may be to someone in close relationship to himself, e.g. as where a parent is killed, or a child is injured. Third, where the person has an interest to prosecute from being by law entitled to the whole or part of the penalty, or being a direct sufferer by the offence committed, as in the case of tramcars being driven at a prohibited speed past the complainer's house. (Before leaving this head, which relates to implied authority to prosecute, I would ask leave to say that on looking back at the decisions in cases where there has been held to be power to prosecute by implication, I am inclined to think that some of the dicta in the opinions of some of the Judges, and I do not except myself, have been expressed in terms which might call for some reconsideration and modification. I do not suggest that I have doubt as to the soundness of the decisions given, but I only desire to express my own feeling, that I do not wish to be understood as being perfectly satisfied with some of what may be called the obiter dicta in the opinions given. I think they might well be reconsidered in any case arising where they might be founded on. But I do not think they present any difficulty that can hamper us in the disposal of this case.) Fourth, where by statute power to prosecute is given to someone in a certain position, it being, in the view of the Legislature, expedient to confer the power to prosecute, which would not exist at common law.

The question here is whether the Commissioners under the Insurance Act have a right to prosecute under any of these three last categories. They have, of course, no position as public prosecutors, and cannot claim such merely because they perform duties of a public character.

Are they in any sense in the category of being injured or aggrieved by the delinquency which forms the subject of the complaint? I think it very plain that this cannot be held to be so. They have in their own interest nothing to complain of; no wrong has been done to them. The subject of the complaint is one for which no penalty or punishment could be inflicted at common law. It is only by special statutory enactment that authority is given for presenting a complaint and demanding the infliction of a penalty. Again, it seems to me to be plain that these Commissioners cannot found on any interest in them to prosecute for the penalty. They can have no right to any sum of penalty that may be inflicted by the magistrate. The disposal of such a penalty, unless otherwise ordered by statute, as where it is ordered to be paid in whole or in part to an informer, is a matter by which the Commissioners can take nothing. Penalties go to the Exchequer, unless otherwise ordered. Mr Robertson in the debate stated that the "body of Commissioners had suffered by not getting the contribution money," and July 17, 1913. that they were thus wronged. When the contention is put in that form, it bears its own refutation on the face of it. The idea of a wrong done to the Commissioners is, I think, out of the question.

Rintoul v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

The final question comes, therefore, to be under the fourth head. Does the statute under which these Commissioners are appointed confer on them the power to prosecute for the penalties enumerated in it? It is not disputed that no such power is directly conferred. It is significant that the Act expressly confers upon them the power to sue, and subjects them to liability to be sued, but it is absolutely silent as to any power to institute proceedings in the Courts of criminal jurisdiction. One would certainly expect that, if the Legislature intended to confer such a power, it would be done in express terms, seeing that, as has been shown, there is no interest from which a right to prosecute could be inferred. But although this would be the natural and sensible course, and would prevent difficulties, it is said, and, I think, with justification, that the fact that no direct authority to institute prosecutions is given is not conclusive against the existence of such a power. It is not to be doubted that such a power may be inferred without express words conferring it, if there be words in the statute from which the implication that it was the intention of the Legislature to confer it can be clearly established. But it will not be sufficient that an intention may be conjectured from the general language of the Act, or from the idea of expediency or convenience. Such a conclusion can only be legitimately drawn from the words of the Act, if they, when construed fairly and reasonably, demonstrate the intention and clearly imply that power is given. It is therefore necessary to see whether anywhere in the statute the intention that the Commissioners should have power to prosecute in those cases where prosecutions are authorised is so plainly indicated that it must be held as a necessary inference that the right to prosecute exists. I have accordingly gone over the statute from end to end, and I find that the following are the clauses relating to the matter in question. Section 19 declares that when maternity benefit is paid to a husband and he neglects to provide for his wife at the time of confinement he is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a period not exceeding one month. Section 68, which relates to stay of execution of an ejectment upon medical certificate, contains in subsection (3) an enactment that a person attempting to enforce a judgment of ejectment in contravention of the section "shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds." I pass over in the meantime section 69, to which I shall refer later. Section 101 enacts that if a person "knowingly makes any false statement, or false representation," in certain proceedings he shall be "liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour." Lastly, by section 112, subsection (3), any person delaying or obstructing an inspector in the exercise of any power under the section, or failing to produce documents, or concealing or preventing or attempting to conceal or prevent any person from appearing before an inspector, shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £5.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

It is plain that nowhere in these clauses, and it is the same in section 69,

July 17, 1913. is there any word or phrase indicating that prosecution is committed to the Commissioners. The phrasing is in all cases the same, and it is to be noted that in some of the cases it is not a question of money penalties but of serious crime that is being dealt with, for which imprisonment is prescribed as the punishment to be inflicted. There is nothing whatever to indicate that the duties of these Commissioners extend to prosecuting offences calling for punishment by imprisonment without the option of a fine, the offence being a direct malum in se, as in the case of making false statements or representations under section 101. But, if the contention made for these Commissioners is good for anything, it would entitle them to prosecute in such a case, just as much as in a case relating to mere failure to make payments by stamping cards.

Rintoul v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

It remains only to notice the 69th section, which is peculiar, and which is strongly founded on by the respondents. The first subsection is similar to that in section 101 relating to false statements or false representations. The second subsection is as follows:—"If any employer has failed to pay any contributions which under this part of this Act he is liable to pay in respect of an employed contributor, or if any such employer, any insured person, or any other person is guilty of any other contravention of or non-compliance with any of the requirements of this part of this Act or the regulations made thereunder in respect of which no special penalty is provided, he shall for each offence be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding ten pounds, and where the offence is failure or neglect on the part of the employer to make any such contributions, to pay to the Insurance Commissioners a sum equal to the amount of the contributions which he has so failed or neglected to pay, which sum when paid shall be treated as a payment in satisfaction of such contributions." The latter part of this subsection is certainly peculiar, as it tacks on to the penalty the liability to pay the sum the failure to pay which timeously has given ground for the prosecution, and directs that the accused be found liable to pay the sum to the Commissioners. In short, it authorizes a civil decree for the arrears. It is said that this implies that the Commissioners can prosecute under the complaint. I do not think that this is at all implied. It is a special provision to save separate litigations, enabling the magistrate to order payment into the hands of the Commissioners (whose duty it is to receive them) of the arrears which have been the ground for the prosecution for a penalty. It provides a shorthand way for recovering the arrears. But I cannot hold, if the Commissioners cannot competently prosecute under the Act according to all its other provisions, that this convenient way of enabling arrears to be recovered after conviction presents a case of necessary implication that the power to prosecute in all cases under the different clauses of the Act where penalty or imprisonment is sought to be inflicted is conferred upon the Commissioners. The liability to pay the arrears may be held to follow the conviction of the offence, but it is not a penalty or a punishment which is the purpose of prosecution. It is at best an order to pay the arrears, tacked on by authority of the Act to the conviction, but it could not, I think, be held to be part of the conviction of the offence or its punishment. If on a prosecution for penalty being about to be entered on, the sum in arrear was handed to the representative of the Commissioners or proof was brought that the arrears had been paid, then this latter part of July 17, 1913. clause 69 could not be given effect to, while the penalty might still be awarded. Rintoul v. Scottish Insurance Commissioners. If the arrears are not paid, the Sheriff has power to give a judgment ordering the party to pay. But this is a civil proceeding following upon the criminal prosecution, by an exceptional power conferred by the statute. It is not a matter falling within the prosecution at all. The conviction and infliction of the penalty is one thing, and is a criminal matter. The order to pay the arrears which have been proved in the prosecution is an order of a civil nature, and its sanction on failure to obtemper it is a civil sanction. This is clear from the very words used in this case, the judgment of the Sheriff bearing "as regards said sum of £1, 15s., decerns and ordains instant execution by arrestment, and also execution to pass hereon by poinding and sale after a charge of ten free days." All this is civil in the form of expression and in the effects which are prescribed on failure to pay. I think it would have been quite competent for the Sheriff to have made the two judgments separate and to have signed each separately, the one as an authority for warrant of execution by the officials of the criminal department, the other as a decree under which on non-payment diligence might be done by the officers having power to act in civil process. Lord Justice-Clerk.

I am unable to see that this addendum for civil proceedings to enforce payment of a debt to the Commissioners can be held by implication to constitute the setting up of the Commissioners as competent prosecutors in proceedings which are in their nature essentially criminal. So far from thinking that it affords sufficient ground for such general inference, I feel myself unable to hold that it gives any ground at all for such an inference. If then there is no power conferred to prosecute, it is scarcely necessary to say that the concurrence of the Lord Advocate cannot confer any title on those who have it not.

I therefore hold that the Sheriff should have sustained the objection to the title of the Commissioners to prosecute, and that the first question should be answered in the negative. If this should be the opinion of the Court, there is no need to consider any of the other questions, as the conviction must be set aside on this preliminary ground.

LORD DUNDAS.—A question was mooted at the debate whether or not the Insurance Commissioners ought to be regarded as a Government Department. In *Rex v. Baggallay*¹ the Solicitor-General for England maintained that they were a Government Department within the meaning of the Rules Publication Act, 1893,² and founded, inter alia, upon the words, "some other Government Department," contained in section 112 (4) of the National Insurance Act, 1911. The English Court found it unnecessary to decide the question. At our bar the Solicitor-General and his learned junior argued that the Commissioners are not a Government Department, but I do not think the point arises here for decision. The complaint is not laid as a public prosecution at all; but upon the footing of a private prosecution at the instance of the Scottish Commissioners, with the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal.

Rintoul v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

Lord Dundas.

It seems clear that the Commissioners are not in the position of private prosecutors entitled to complain on the ground of any personal injury or personal interest. When regard is had to the provisions of the statute it is plain that they are not persons aggrieved, or having a substantial and peculiar interest in the issue of the proceedings. I do not mean to indicate that a private prosecution may not competently be brought in regard to a statutory offence—malum prohibitum, not malum in se. On the contrary, such a complaint seems to be quite competent, under given circumstances, if the prosecutor has a sufficient interest. Illustrations of the competency of such proceedings may be found, for example, in the Glasgow City and District Railway cases,¹ where the prosecutors were entitled to a portion of the penalties; in Simpson v. Corporation of Glasgow,² where the prosecutor had a clear personal interest, not only because he might receive part of the penalty, as informer, but also because the Corporation's trams, which were alleged to run at excessive speed, passed close to the house where he and his young family resided; and in Lockwood v. The Chartered Institute of Patent Agents,³ where the Institute had a pecuniary interest because it was entitled to charge registration fees which the appellant declined to pay. In the case before us it seems clear that the Commissioners have no such interest as to give them a title to prosecute.

The question comes to be whether or not the statute of 1911 gives the Commissioners a title to raise and follow forth this complaint. If it does, they do not require the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal. If it does not, his concurrence cannot avail them. The statute does not expressly confer any such title. It could very easily have done so if that had been the intention of the Legislature. But while section 57 (2) provides that the Commissioners may sue and be sued by that name, section 80, which is concerned with the application of the Act to Scotland, is silent as to any right or title on their part to bring complaints or prosecutions. I think one must infer that the Legislature deliberately refrained from giving the Commissioners such right or title in Scotland. I do not say that a statutory title to prosecute must be conferred in express words. It might be held to be given by necessary implication; or even, short of that, by way of clear and definite inference from a reasonable and natural construction of words used in the statute. The Solicitor-General maintained that their title to prosecute this complaint could be so inferred; and he made reference, in support of this view, to a number of scattered sections and subsections occurring in the course of this lengthy and intricate Act. In my opinion his process of inference was much too remote and complicated to be successful. I do not think we are entitled, or that we ought, to infer a title to prosecute from what is, to my mind, at best matter of conjecture, based upon the terms of the statute as a whole, or upon its general scope and purpose, or upon grounds of alleged expediency. I venture to think that in some of the cases in this Court, judicial dicta, if not actual decisions, have gone too far in the direction of inferring a statutory title in private persons to prosecute for penalties; and where, as in this case, a penalty has been created by a public statute, purely in the public interest, it seems to me that we should lend no countenance to the view that any person other than the public prosecutor is entitled to prosecute, unless the statute so provides, either expressly, or as a matter of reasonably clear implication from a natural construction of words used. The mere fact that the public prosecutor is not named in a statute as the party entitled to complain or prosecute is not sufficient to confer, by way of inference, a title upon someone else to do so; the presumption is that, if the statute is silent, penalties are to be recovered by the public prosecutor—(Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908,¹ sec. 27).

Rintoul v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

Lord Dundas.

I am therefore of opinion that the instance in this complaint is bad; and that we should answer the question put to us in that sense.

LORD JOHNSTON.—In the National Insurance Act, 1911, provision is made (section 57 (1)) for the appointment of Commissioners for the purposes of the Act. And wherever in the Act the term “The Insurance Commissioners” is used, in Scotland we are directed (section 80) to read “The Scottish Insurance Commissioners.”

Nowhere in the Act are the Scottish Insurance Commissioners incorporated, nor are they anywhere treated as a public department in the wider and general sense of the term. In fact they are appointed by the Treasury, salaried by the Treasury, and their ramification of branch officers is under control of the Treasury. They have no single official head accountable in his place in Parliament. They are properly Commissioners appointed to conduct a certain limited and statutorily defined class of business for the nation. But the nature of that business renders it necessary that they should be able readily to sue and be sued. And, accordingly, instead of leaving them to depend on the Crown Suits Act, 1857, the applicability of which might be doubtful, section 57 (2) of the Act provides that they may sue and be sued by their statutory name. But the whole expression of this subsection indicates that it has reference to civil actions only, just as has the Crown Suits Act, 1857. Though reliance was placed upon its terms by the Commissioners I do not think that it has any bearing upon the instance in criminal matters.

Where statutory penalties for statutory offences are concerned, we are out of the ambit of civil proceedings. There is no special provision for the Commissioners being statutorily empowered to prosecute for penalties. And that being the case, I see no reason why the common principle which, in the criminal law of Scotland, applies to all prosecutions in the public interest should not apply to the Scottish Insurance Commissioners as well as to Government Departments in the higher or narrower sense. For reasons which I need not repeat, it has been considered right that all such prosecutions should proceed at the instance and therefore on the responsibility of the Lord Advocate or his representatives in the Supreme Courts. And, to be consistent, that principle must be applied in the case of the Scottish Insurance Commissioners. The matter is not I think affected by the fact that, ancillary to the infliction of a penalty, the Court may under section 69

July 17, 1918. (2) order payment of delinquent contributions. The proceeding is primarily and essentially a criminal prosecution for penalties.

Rintoul v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

I need hardly add that, if the instance is bad, the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal does not mend it.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur.

In the absence of express statutory authority, private prosecution in Scotland is only allowed where there is either sufficient private, that is to say personal interest, or where, although the statute in question does not confer express authority, such authority must be inferred. Here there is admittedly no express statutory authority. It is in my opinion clear there is no sufficient personal interest in the Commissioners. The only question is whether such authority must not be inferred. But for decisions already pronounced I should have doubted whether a case could be conceived where such inference would be unavoidable. If, for instance, while no express authority was given, the statute contained directions regulating the conduct of prosecutions by the body claiming the right. The decisions have gone even further than such a case; but it appears to me that the claim of the Commissioners would go beyond any of the cases hitherto decided, and I am not disposed to go further than the cases have already gone.

It will be no public loss if the result of this decision is to lead those responsible for framing and adjusting statutes, if power to prosecute is desired, to see that it is expressly given.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—As your Lordships are aware, I have only a vote in the case of a division among your Lordships, and your Lordships are unanimous. But it is expedient that I should express an opinion upon the matters which have been argued before us, all the more because, having had the opportunity of maturely considering all the cases upon this point, I wish to say that I am satisfied that some of the views I expressed in *Caledonian Railway Company v. M'Gregor*¹ are unsound. I refer to that part of the opinion which draws a distinction between common law crimes and statutory crimes in the matter of interest. I am satisfied that the law is exactly as expressed by my brother Lord Dundas in his review of the cases upon that matter. With that correction, the other remarks in that case by myself, and I think the decision, were right. And I apprehend that, upon the general principles, there is no difference in opinion between myself and your Lordships.

Put shortly it comes to this, that there are four ways in which a title to prosecute exists. There is the title of the Lord Advocate, and there is the title of the private individual with the concurrence of the Lord Advocate, where that private individual can show that he has been personally wronged by the crime or offence complained of. Neither of these cases applies to this case. It is not a prosecution by the Lord Advocate; and I am entirely with your Lordships in holding that it is quite impossible for the Commissioners to qualify a private interest in the sense in which a private interest was declared to exist in the decided cases.

Then, thirdly, there is a title conveyed expressly. Parliament in this July 17, 1913. matter is omnipotent; and if Parliament gives a title, there the title is. Rintoul v. And then, lastly, and here also I understand that your Lordships agree with Scottish Insurance Commissioners. me, there is no impossibility in holding that there may be a title to some one, not the Lord Advocate, conferred by implication. The only question, therefore, that remains is—Is there such an implication in this statute as will give the Commissioners a title to prosecute this prosecution? I say “this prosecution,” because I do not think it necessarily follows that if they had a good title for this prosecution, they would have a good title to prosecute all the offences in the statute. Here I confess I personally have a different opinion from your Lordships. If I had had to decide this case by myself, I should have found myself able to take what your Lordships may consider the leap of holding that there was an implied title conferred under the terms of section 69, and that for the simple reason that the right of the Commissioners to get back the arrears in what I agree may be practically a civil process is only given them under a condition precedent, namely, that there has been a conviction under a prosecution; and I think that the two are so narrowly linked together that I myself should have held that that was sufficient implication to give them a title to institute the criminal prosecution which is the condition precedent to the recovery of arrears. Lord Justice-General.

But although that is my opinion, and your Lordships are of a different opinion, I wish most emphatically to say this, that I do not think this matter ought to have been left thus. This statute contains, among other things, a Scottish application clause, and it is surely not too much to expect that the Scottish law officers should be able to tell what was necessary in Scotland, and to put in a simple addition to the application clause which, by dealing with the right to recover the unpaid instalments, would make the matter lucē clarius.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction, sentence, and decerniture or order appealed against.

CASES

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1912-1913.

EDWARD GORMAN, Pursuer.—J. A. Christie.
MOSS' EMPIRES, LIMITED, Defenders.—J. Macdonald.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1912.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Sufficiency of averments of malice—Master and Servant—Master's liability for servant's slander.

Gorman v.
Moss'
Empires,
Limited.

In an action of damages for slander, brought against a limited company owning a music hall, the pursuer averred that, while he was present at a performance in the hall, he was falsely accused by an attendant of indecent conduct towards a member of the audience, and that he was taken to a private room where the slander was repeated by the attendant of the hall and by the manager. He averred that these slanderous statements "were made and persisted in most recklessly, pertinaciously, and maliciously."

Held that the occasion was privileged, and that, as there was no sufficient averment of facts inferring malice, the action was irrelevant.

Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, 1908 S. C. 928, distinguished.

EDWARD GORMAN brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow 2D DIVISION. against Moss' Empires, Limited, in which he sought damages for (1) Sheriff of an assault committed on him by one of the defenders' servants, and Lanarkshire. (2) a slander uttered by the defenders' servants.

The pursuer averred that on 9th September 1911 he visited one of the defenders' music halls in Glasgow, along with his wife and two friends, and took seats in the gallery. (Cond. 3) "Some time after the entertainment started the pursuer left his friends and went to the back of the gallery to proceed to the lavatory. On his return, the pursuer, as a 'turn' was on the stage at the time, waited for a second or two at the back of the gallery until said 'turn' was finished. Whilst waiting there an attendant in the employment of the defenders, whose duty it was to keep order in said gallery, came up to the pursuer and accused him of having indecently conducted himself towards a young lady who happened to have been at the back of the gallery at the same time as the pursuer, and that he had attempted to persuade her to accompany him into the gentlemen's lavatory. The pursuer indignantly denied the accusation and an altercation ensued, in the course of which he was violently assaulted by said attendant. As a result of said assault, the pursuer sustained a severe contused injury to his eye and general bruising." (Cond. 4) "Thereafter the pursuer was hustled to a private room in said music hall, belonging to the manager or under-manager (the pursuer does not know which), and there said slander was repeated by said attendant. It was also repeated by said under-manager. The pursuer indignantly denied said suggestion and insisted on the police being sent for. On the police arriving inquiries were made, and they refused to take any proceedings against the pursuer." (Cond. 5) "The assault committed on the pursuer was committed by the defenders' said servant in the course of his service with the defenders, and for the defenders' benefit. It was part of said attendant's duty to keep order in said gallery and to put out any person who was creating a disturbance in same. The pursuer believes and avers that the attendants in said gallery were in the habit of assaulting patrons who visited the music hall who interfered with them in the slightest way. This was known or ought to have been known to the defenders and their manager, and for the injuries pursuer sustained defenders are liable in damages as craved in the first conclusion of the initial writ." (Cond. 6) "The defenders are also liable in damages to the pursuer as craved in the second conclusion of the initial writ for the slander uttered by their servants on the occasion in question. The defenders are a limited company, and the whole management and conduct of said music hall is entirely left to their manager, under-manager, and attendants, who are charged by the defenders with the whole conduct of the business. The said false and calumnious statements were of and concerning the pursuer and were made by the defenders' said servants in the course of their service with the defenders for the defenders' benefit, and were made and persisted in most recklessly, pertinaciously, and maliciously."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is irrelevant. They also stated a plea of privilege.

The Sheriff-substitute (Boyd), on 2nd February 1912, pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the defenders' first plea in law, and dismissing the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Millar), who, on 20th May 1912, adhered in regard to the conclusion for damages for assault, and dismissed the action as laid under this head; quoad ultra recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, found that the pursuer had stated a relevant case in support of the conclusion for damages for slander, and with regard to it repelled the defenders' first plea in law, and before answer allowed both parties a proof of their averments.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The defenders' agent maintained, in the first place, that it was not averred that the statement was made by the defenders' servants within the scope of their employment; but the averments of the pursuer are that the false and calumnious statements of and concerning the pursuer were made by the defenders' servants 'in the course of their service with the defenders for the defenders' benefit.' Now, these were the exact words used in the case of Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, 1908 S. C. 928, which was held relevant by the Court of Session. The pursuer says that the words were used by an attendant in the employment of the defenders whose duty it was to keep order in the gallery where the pursuer was. It was while he was performing that duty that he used the words to the pursuer. If it were competent to look at the defenders' answers, answer 5 makes it perfectly clear that according to the bye-laws and regulations of the Magistrates of the city of Glasgow there was the duty on the defenders' representatives to keep order and decorum in the theatre and to put out any person who was creating a disturbance therein, or who was acting in an offensive manner. Accordingly, I think this contention of the defenders must be repelled.—[The Sheriff then dealt with certain contentions for the

The pursuer required the case to be remitted to the Court of Session for jury trial. The case was heard before the Second Division on 15th October 1912 on a motion for the allowance of issues, when the defenders maintained that the summons was irrelevant.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The Sheriff was right in dismissing the action quoad the first conclusion, but he should also have dismissed it as laid on slander. The summons was not relevant unless it appeared that the servant in uttering the slander was acting within the scope of his employment and for the benefit of his master,¹ and this could not be affirmed of the servant's conduct in this case. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited,² was distinguishable in respect that there (a) the servant uttered the slander in presence of members of the audience, and (b) the servant simply made a reckless statement, while here the servant did no more than explain to his superior the reason for his action in regard to the pursuer. (2) Esto that the action was otherwise relevant, it failed because the occasion was privileged, and there was no averment of facts and circumstances inferring malice, or, at all events, of independent or extrinsic facts and circumstances inferring malice.³

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) It was not maintained that the summons was relevant on the case of assault. But so far as it was laid on slander it was plainly relevant. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited,² (which was indistinguishable from the present case) and *Citizens Life Assurance Co. v. Brown*⁴ settled this point in favour of the pursuer. (2) The pursuer did not dispute that malice must be put in issue. The necessary facts and circumstances sufficient to infer malice were set forth in condescendences 3 and 4. There was no general rule that the facts and circumstances must be independent of the words and action complained of⁵; this was insisted on only in cases of judicial slander or in similar cases, such as Chalmers v. Barclay, Perkins, & Company, Limited.⁶ [Lord Dundas referred to M'Adam v. City and Suburban Dairies, Limited.⁷] No question of privilege arose in that case. In regard to the form of issue *Webster v. Paterson & Sons*⁷ was referred to.

LORD DUNDAS.—In this case a proof before answer was allowed in the Court below; the pursuer appealed for jury trial; and the defenders have taken the opportunity of arguing that there is no relevant case.

Mr Macdonald maintained that view upon two grounds. On the first ground I am against him, and I need say no more than that I agree substantially with the way in which that matter has been put by the learned defenders which were not maintained at the hearing in the Inner House.] On the whole matter I think this case comes within the scope of the case of Finburgh already quoted, and that the pursuer is entitled to an inquiry. As the case may raise a question of privilege on the evidence, I think the proof should be before answer."

Oct. 15, 1912. Sheriff. It is said that the pursuer does not aver that the statement complained of was made by the defenders' servants within the scope of their employment; but, as the Sheriff points out, it is averred that "the statements were made by the defenders' said servants in the course of their service with the defenders for the defenders' benefit"; these were the exact words which were used and held sufficient in the case of *Finburgh*¹; and, further, the pursuer's case is that the words were used by an attendant in the employment of the defenders, whose duty it was to keep order in the gallery where the pursuer was; and it was while he was performing that duty that he used the words. Upon that point, therefore, I need say no more.

Gorman v.
Moss'

Lord Dundas.

On the second point I think Mr Macdonald is on much firmer ground, and that his contention must be given effect to. This point does not appear to have been argued in the Court below, no doubt because that Court had not the advantage of having the proposed issue before it; but the learned Sheriff does seem to have had in his mind that a question such as that which has here been argued might be raised, for at the conclusion of his note he says:—"As the case may raise a question of privilege on the evidence, I think the proof should be before answer." The point has been sharply raised before us by Mr Macdonald. He maintained that the occasion was privileged, and as to that I do not understand that any doubt exists or that any objection is taken. This being so, Mr Macdonald proceeded to maintain that malice must go into the issue; and there, again, Mr Christie, quite rightly I think, agreed that this was so. But then Mr Macdonald carried his argument further, and urged that there is no averment on record of facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred, and if that is correct, as I have come to think it is, then the record is irrelevant, and the action must be dismissed upon that ground. When one searches the record one really finds nothing supporting a case of malice except the general averment in cond. 6, that the statements were not only false and calumnious, but "were made and persisted in most recklessly, pertinaciously, and maliciously." I can find nothing in the condescendence in the nature of a statement of any specific fact or circumstance importing malice. But what Mr Christie says we are to infer—because it is nowhere stated—is that there was such recklessness of conduct on the part of the attendant as to amount in law to malice inferring liability against the defenders. I do not doubt that there might be averments of recklessness which the Court might hold to amount to such malice. *Finburgh*¹ was a case of that kind. But I find nothing of that sort here. It seems to me upon the pursuer's own statements that this was the case of an attendant acting within the scope of his duties and acting in bona fide and reasonably, however erroneous he may have been in some of his conceptions. I am of opinion, therefore, that we must recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff; find that the pursuer has set forth no relevant case; and dismiss the action.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am of the same opinion. The case of Finburgh,¹ I think, disposes of the first plea that was maintained by Mr Macdonald for the defenders. But it is in marked contrast to the present on the other matter to which your Lordship has referred—namely, the question of malice. Oct. 15, 1912.

 I observe that in the case of *Finburgh*¹ Lord Ardwall in holding that there was a relevant case of malice, said,—“There are averments charging the defenders’ servants with recklessness sufficient, if proved, to entitle a jury to infer malice, and that because it is a rule of law that where statements are made recklessly without sufficient inquiry, and without ordinary and reasonable regard to the character of others, such words may be held to have been uttered maliciously.” Now, there are no averments here which suggest recklessness on the part of the attendant, or any undue disregard of the character of the pursuer.

Gorman v.
 Moss’
 Empires,
 Limited.
 Lord Salvesen.

On the pursuer’s own averments the slanderous statement was made only to himself, and he says nothing to exclude the case of the defenders that the attendant in making it proceeded on the information of a young lady who had made a complaint to him as to the conduct of the pursuer. It is perfectly obvious that if a complaint of that sort is made and is believed by the attendant, it is his duty to remonstrate with the person against whom the charge is made. It is no doubt said that the statement was repeated, but the circumstances in which it was repeated, as disclosed by the pursuer’s own record, indicate to my mind conclusively that the attendant was not going beyond his proper duty. The pursuer says that he was taken to a private room, and that there the charge was repeated to the under-manager. That is exactly what one would expect where, as here, the charge had been denied by the pursuer in order that it might be investigated, and the proper course to follow determined by a superior authority. Beyond that there is absolutely no averment against this attendant. So far as one can gather from the pursuer’s averments he acted with perfect propriety, assuming that he was in the bona fide execution of his duty, which is the only assumption upon which the pursuer has a case at all against the defenders.

Accordingly, it being now conceded, as was decided in Finburgh’s case,¹ that the attendant was privileged, there are no averments in this record to deprive him of his privilege; there is nothing from which one would be entitled to infer that he acted recklessly, or that would justify the insertion of the word maliciously in the issue. I agree, therefore, that we must dismiss the action.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The pursuer’s pleadings not only disclose a case of apparent privilege on the part of the defenders, but they show that the pursuer is not in a position to meet that defence with the necessary answer, namely, an averment which if proved will destroy the defenders’ apparent privilege.

In the case of a limited company it has not yet been held that antecedent and independent malice on the part of one of their servants will infer liability on them; and in this case it is not necessary to consider that question, for nothing of the kind is suggested. All that is put forward is that there was recklessness in the way of word and conduct which would make the limited company liable. The recklessness in the way of word is

Oct. 15, 1912. in the shape of an alleged repetition of the slander. But that repetition was to the under-manager, who is said by the pursuer himself to have been one of those who were in charge of the establishment. Recklessness in the way of conduct might conceivably infer liability on the part of a limited company. But it does not appear to me that the averment of an altercation, as the pursuer narrates the circumstances, would suggest anything to throw a light back on what the servant had previously said in the way of inferring malice, but rather the reverse.

No. 2. THE PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCIL OF THE BURGH OF ALLOA, Appellants.—Constable, K.C.—D. Anderson.

Oct. 18, 1912.

JAMES DUNLOP OCTAVUS WILSON AND OTHERS, Respondents.—
Sandeman, K.C.—Burn Murdoch.

Magistrates
of Alloa v.
Wilson.

Burgh—Street—Public or private street—Removal of barricade on private street by town-council—Duty of adjoining proprietors to pave the street—Personal objection—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), secs. 103 (5) and 104 (2) (d).

A barricade, which had been erected across an unpaved private street in a burgh by the adjoining proprietors to prevent it being used as a thoroughfare, was removed by the town-council without the consent of these proprietors, who had refused their consent except on condition that they should not be called upon to pave the street. Some years after the removal of the barricade the proprietors, on being called upon by the town-council to level and pave the street under sec. 104 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, maintained that the street had become a public street and so was maintainable by the town-council, or in any event that the town-council were barred from calling on them to pave it.

Held (1) that the street had not become a public street by reason of the removal of the barricade; and (2) that the town-council were not barred by their actings from now calling on the proprietors to pave it, in respect that these actings had not prejudiced the proprietors in their obligation to pave the street.

1st DIVISION. THIS was a case stated by the Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan (Lees), under the provisions of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 and 1903, on appeal between the Magistrates of Alloa and James Dunlop Octavus Wilson and others, the proprietors of properties fronting West Kellie Place, Alloa, a street alleged by the Magistrates to be a private street and by the respondents to be a public street.

The case set forth:—

"On 12th June 1911 the appellants passed a resolution that this street should be 'made,' and that the statutory notices for the formation of the street should be issued. On 8th August following a notice was accordingly issued to the respondents, . . . proceeding on the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 to 1903, and in particular on section 133 of the said Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, as amended by the said Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, calling upon them to cause the carriageway in West Kellie Place, extending from Ludgate to Ochil Street, in the burgh of Alloa, to be freed from obstructions, and to be properly levelled, paved, causewayed, or macadamised, &c., all in terms of certain plans, sections, and specifications specified in the said notice, and deposited in the chambers of the burgh surveyor of Alloa. Oct. 18, 1912.

Magistrates
of Alloa v.
Wilson.

"The respondents appealed to the Sheriff-substitute against this resolution, upon the ground that West Kellie Place is a public street within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 and 1903, and not a private street within the meaning of these Acts, and that the respondents are therefore not liable to pay any part of the costs, charges, or expenses incurred by the appellants in respect of the said works. The Sheriff-substitute took evidence upon the statements and answers made by the parties, and, on 9th February 1912, issued an interlocutor finding that West Kellie Place was a public street, and quashing the resolution appealed against. The appellants thereafter appealed to the Sheriff, but I, on 16th March 1912, refused the appeal, holding that the said road had become a public street of the burgh of Alloa in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 103 (5), and that accordingly the resolution of the appellants complained of was illegal and incompetent.

"West Kellie Place extends between Ludgate and Ochil Street, which are and have for many years been public streets within the burgh of Alloa. Both sides of West Kellie Place have been completely feued under feu-charters, commencing in 1871 and ending in 1886, and have been completely built with dwelling-houses for more than twenty years. . . .

"There is only one feu on the south side of the street, and it runs the full length of the street. It was the first of the feus to be given off, and it was subsequently divided, and is now owned by two proprietors. It is described in the feu-charter as bounded on the north-west and north by a piece of ground laid off to form a street, which is the street now in question. The feus on the north side of the street are described as bounded on the south by the road or street called West Kellie Place. The ground on the north side is feued upon, inter alia, the condition that the feuar and his foresaids 'shall be bound forthwith to construct in a substantial and workmanlike manner at his or their own expense a road or street on the south of said piece of ground to the extent of one-half of the width thereof, with a suitable footpath, kerb, and runchannel, all to the satisfaction of the superior.' The road or street formed has never been bottomed, causewayed, or macadamised. The charters applicable to the south side do not contain such a clause.

"The said road was made and intended only for the owners' use, and accordingly, subsequent to the laying off of the street, a barricade was erected by the authors of the respondents across the roadway, extending between the footpaths on either side, at a place about equidistant from either end of the street, with the view of preventing its being used by the public for through heavy vehicular traffic. Said barricade remained in that position for several years until it was removed as aftermentioned in 1892.

"The road has never been formally taken over by the appellants

Oct. 18, 1912. as a public street under the provisions of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 134, or of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 104, subsection (2) (e).

Magistrates
of Alloa v.
Wilson.

"In 1890 the question of removing the barricade and taking over the street by the burgh was considered by the appellants, who resolved that as 'the street was apparently sufficiently made for any traffic likely in the meantime to pass over it,' they would simply ask Mr Melvin (one of the feuars) to remove the barricade, and 'would not at this time ask it' (the street) 'to be made, and as a matter of course, the adjoining proprietors would be looked to to keep it in order until such time as it was properly made by them and taken over by the Commissioners.' The correspondence was resumed in 1892. On 15th March 1892 the Town-clerk, by direction of the appellants, wrote to Mr Melvin requesting him to remove the barricade. On 11th April Mr Melvin replied, 'I beg to say on behalf of the other proprietors and myself that we are quite willing to take down this barricade at once, on the understanding that we are not called on to form the street in any other way than at present, so long as we keep it in proper repair.' The appellants decided that they could not give any such undertaking, and directed the Clerk to request the removal of the barricade. He accordingly did so, saying 'the Commissioners consider that the removal of the barricade will be for the public advantage.' No agreement, however, was come to, and as the feuars did not remove the barricade, though again called on to do so on 21st September 1892, and would not consent to its removal unconditionally, the appellants, in the month of December 1892, brevi manu, and without the consent of the respondents or their authors, removed the said barricade for the purpose of throwing the road open for through vehicular traffic by the general public of the burgh, and have kept it open for such purpose ever since without opposition being made by the respondents, and without protest except when the barricade was being removed.

"On 3rd August 1904 the Town-clerk, upon the instructions of the Town-Council, wrote to each of the respondents as owners of their respective subjects in West Kellie Place, asking them then to lay the foot-pavement in front of their property, and stating that the Council desired that the foot-pavement should be laid with runchannel, kerb, drains, and gully gratings. All the respondents, upon receipt of the said request, complied therewith, and laid the foot-pavements in the manner desired by the Town-Council.

"On a few occasions between 1892 and the date of the foresaid notice of 8th August 1911, the feuars, or some of them, and on one occasion the appellants, have voluntarily laid ashes on the roadway so as to provide passage dryshod for the former. The surface of the road is still in fairly good condition in dry weather, but becomes soft and muddy in wet or frosty weather.

"In these circumstances I held in law (1) That in consequence of this removal of the barricade and the assumption of the control of the traffic, and of the use of the road for the public general vehicular traffic of the burgh, the Town-Council became responsible for the maintenance of the said road; (2) That on the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act of 1903 coming into force on 15th May following, the said road became, in terms of section 103, subsection (5) thereof, a public street of the said burgh of Alloa; and (3) That accordingly the resolution of the Town-Council of 8th August 1911 complained of, requiring the present respondents and others to causeway said road, Oct. 18, 1912. was illegal and incompetent.*

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—“(1) ^{Magistrates of Alloa v. Wilson.} Whether the appellants acted legally in removing, without the consent of the respondents, the barricade erected by them to preserve West Kellie Place from public through traffic, unless they intended to be responsible thereafter for the upkeep of the street? (2) Whether, if such action on the part of the appellants was illegal, they can now, after exposing the street to deterioration by public general use for nearly nineteen years, call on the respondents to make good the deterioration due to this illegal act? (3) Whether, in consequence of this action of the appellants, West Kellie Place became a public street in virtue of the provisions of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act,

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), enacts:—

Sec. 103. “(5) ‘Public street’ shall, in the principal Act [Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55)] and this Act, mean (1) any street which has been or shall at any time hereafter be taken over as a public street under any general or local Police Act by the town-council or commissioners; (2) any highway within the meaning of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, vested in the town-council; (3) any road or street which has in any other way become or shall at any time hereafter become vested in or maintainable by the town-council; and (4) any street entered as a public street in the register of streets made up under this Act:

“(6) ‘Private street’ shall in the principal Act and in this Act mean any street other than a public street: . . .”

Sec. 104. “(2) In addition to the scheduled amendments, the principal Act shall be amended or extended in the following particulars:—

“(d) For section one hundred and thirty-three shall be substituted the following section:—

“Where any private street or part of such street has not, together with the footways thereof, been sufficiently levelled, paved, causewayed, or macadamised and flagged to the satisfaction of the council, it shall be lawful for the council to cause any such street or part thereof, and the footways, to be freed from obstructions, and to be properly levelled, paved, causewayed, or macadamised, and flagged, and channelled in such way and with such materials as to them shall seem most expedient, and completed with fences, posts, crossings, kerbstones, and gutters, and street gratings or gullies and drains for carrying off the surface water, and thereafter to be maintained, all to the satisfaction of the council.

“If any private street or part thereof, together with the footways thereof, shall at any time be made, paved, causewayed, or macadamised and flagged, and otherwise completed as aforesaid and put in good order and condition, to the satisfaction of the council, then, and on application of any one or more of the owners of premises fronting or abutting upon such street or part thereof, or of the superior or owner of the ground on which such street or part thereof has been formed, it shall be lawful for the council to declare, and if such street or part thereof has been paved and put in good order and condition as hereinbefore mentioned, and if the owners of one-half or more of the frontage of such street or part concur in the application, the council shall declare the same to be vested in the council, and it shall be thenceforward vested in and maintained by the council.”

Oct. 18, 1912. 1903; and (4) Whether the resolution of the appellants of 12th June 1911 complained of was legal and competent?"

Magistrates
of Alloa v.
Wilson.

The case was heard before the First Division on 18th October 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—In 1892 when the Town-Council removed the barricade from the street in question it was unquestionably a private street, and nothing had occurred at that time, or subsequently, to make it a public street. In removing the barricade the Town-Council had not acted illegally, but had acted for the public good in exercise of their powers under the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, the statute then in force; and, indeed, in virtue of that Act the street might at the same time have been formed at the expense of the respondents.¹ If the Town-Council's action were illegal, the respondents should have taken steps by interdict or otherwise to resist the removal; but in any event, an illegal act by the Town-Council could not have the effect of excusing the respondents from the performance of their statutory obligations. The respondents had suffered no prejudice with regard to these statutory obligations; on the contrary, they had had the benefit of not being called upon to pave the street for nineteen years. Nor could the removal of the barricade be construed into an acceptance of the proprietors' condition that they should not be called upon to pave the street. Such a condition could not have been accepted, for it was liable to repudiation by any future Town-Council who chose to put in force their statutory powers. In the register of streets prepared in terms of section 5 of the 1903 Act, this street was entered as a private street, and the onus was on the respondents to show that it was in fact a public street. This they had failed to do. The street had never been taken over formally by the Town-Council in terms of section 104 (e) of the 1903 Act, and when the definition clause, section 103 (5), was looked at it was clear that this was still a private street, for the mere removal of the barricade could not have the effect of vesting it in the Town-Council, or of making it maintainable by them.²

Argued for the respondents;—While the street in question was a private street, the feuars on either side of it were entitled to exclude public traffic, which was done by means of the barricade. When the appellants removed the barricade the street became a public thoroughfare, and passed out of the control of the feuars and ceased to be a private street.³ If it was maintained that the barricade was removed with the consent of the feuars, then its removal implied acceptance on the part of the Town-Council of the conditions on which the feuars were willing to consent to the removal. Thus either by acceptance of the conditions, or by their own arbitrary act, the appellants had taken over the duty of maintenance, and the street had become a public street, "vested in," and "maintainable by the Town-Council" in the sense of section 103 (5) of the Act of 1903. language of the Act made it unnecessary to inquire as to the way in which the street was taken over by the Town-Council, and the appellants were barred from calling upon the respondents to form this street, because their own actings were sufficient evidence of dedication to make it a public street.¹

of Alloa v.
Wilson.

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After narrating the circumstances and referring to the fact that the Sheriff had quashed the resolution of the Town-Council]—The view upon which the learned Sheriff quashed the resolution is stated by him thus. He details the circumstances which I have detailed, and then he says: "In these circumstances I held in law (1) that in consequence of this removal of the barricade and the assumption of the control of the traffic, and of the use of the road for the public general vehicular traffic of the burgh, the Town-Council became responsible for the maintenance of the said road." There is no question that inasmuch as this street by genesis was a private street the requisition of the Town-Council is in terms of the Act and within their powers, provided that it is still a private street. Now, it must be still a private street unless in the meantime it has been turned into a public street. The definition of a public street is to be found in the 5th subsection of the 103rd section of the Burgh Police Act, 1903, and that gives four criteria by which a public street may be recognised. The first is a street which has been or shall be taken over as a public street. That means formally taken over in any way provided for in the Act. In this case that has not been done. The second is a highway within the meaning of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, vested in the Town-Council. That does not apply to this street. The fourth is any street "entered as a public street in the register of streets" under the Act, and that also, we are told, does not apply to this street, which is entered on the register as a private street and not a public street. There is only one criterion left, the third, which is any road or street which has in any other way become vested in or maintainable by the Town-Council. Now, "vested in" points to one of two things, either vested in terms of some statutory provision or vested in terms of conveyance. Neither of these will do in this case, and therefore we are brought to the last question of all, whether it is maintainable by the Town-Council. If I were of opinion with the learned Sheriff that in consequence of the removal of the barricade the Town-Council had become responsible for the maintenance of the road, I should hold that it had become a public street; but I suppose the test of maintainability is a simple one, and it is this. After these events which happened in 1892 and after the correspondence, supposing there had been excessive rainfall, or some accident, and the street had got into shocking disrepair, could the feuars have called upon the Town-Council to repair and maintain it? I am unable to come to any such conclusion. Ex hypothesi it was a private street to begin with, and there is no obligation on the Town-Council to maintain a private street.

Accordingly, I have no difficulty in holding that, if there is any obligation on the Town-Council, it must either rest upon direct contract, or the Town-Council must be barred from saying they are not liable.

Oct. 18, 1912. There was a proposition on the one side and on the other, but neither party accepted the other party's terms, so that direct contract seems to be out of the question, for there was obviously no consensus at all. Then when you come to the question of bar, the essence of that is that owing to the action of one party the other party has been put in a worse position than he otherwise would have been in. All that happened was that the Town-Council knocked down the barricade, and the feuars took no steps to put it up again. Is their position any worse so far as the statute is concerned? As a matter of fact, instead of being the worse they have had their money in their pockets all these years, when they might have been called upon there and then to causeway the street. They were allowed in these years to go on with the street as it was. They seem to be in no worse position through the barricade having been knocked down; and accordingly I cannot agree with the decision that the learned Sheriff has come to. I do not think it is necessary to answer all the questions put, but if the third question is answered in the negative and the fourth in the affirmative, that disposes of the case.

Magistrates
of Alloa v.
Wilson.

Ld. President

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree in all respects with the opinion which your Lordship has just delivered.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur with your Lordship. I think that the question which arises in this case is whether upon the facts stated it can be inferred that there was a contract between the feuars and the Town-Council in which the Town-Council came under an obligation to maintain the street in question. If they did, by force of it, it has become a public street, but I agree with your Lordship that upon the facts as stated such contract did not exist here. As regards the question of bar, I am bound to say that the arguments pressed by Mr Constable appear to me of great weight, that so far from being prejudiced by the delay the feuars are in a better position; because, as your Lordship has put it, they have had their money, which they might have been called upon to expend nineteen years ago, in their pockets all the time, and the fact that they are called upon now to causeway the street puts them in no worse position, because the expense for doing it now has not been made greater by anything that has happened during the past nineteen years.

THE COURT answered the third question in the negative and the fourth in the affirmative, found it unnecessary to answer the other questions, and recalled the judgment appealed against.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF AYR, Pursuers (Respondents).—Horne, K.C. No. 3.
—Valentine.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF WIGTOWN, Defenders (Appellants).— Oct. 25, 1912.
Johnston, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Poor—Settlement.—Residential settlement—Continuity of residence—Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 1. Ayr Parish Council v. Wigtown Parish Council.

In September 1906 a workman obtained employment as a coal-heaver in the parish of A, which was not the parish of his birth settlement. In the summer of 1907, when his employment became slack, he left the parish and went into training with the militia and thereafter worked as an agricultural labourer. After an absence of nearly three months he returned to the parish of A and resumed his former employment. In the summer of 1908 he again absented himself for militia training and agricultural employment, his absence on this occasion lasting for over three months. He then returned to work in the parish of A, and remained there till June 1910, when he became chargeable as a pauper.

Held that he had not “resided for three years continuously” in the parish of A in the sense of sec. 1 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, and accordingly had not acquired a residential settlement in that parish.

Mackenzie v. Cameron, (1858) 21 D. 93, distinguished.

On 9th September 1911 the Parish Council of Ayr brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Wigtown against the Parish Council of Wigtown for recovery of sums disbursed by the pursuers for the maintenance of James Kelly, as a pauper, in the poorhouse at Ayr. 1st DIVISION. Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said James Kelly having been born in the parish of Wigtown, and having no residential settlement in the parish of Ayr or elsewhere, the parish of Wigtown, as the parish of his birth settlement, is liable for his maintenance.

The defenders pleaded;—The said James Kelly having acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Ayr, that parish is liable for his maintenance without any right of relief against defenders, and the present action should therefore be dismissed with expenses.

A proof was allowed and led, the facts ascertained at which were thus narrated by the Sheriff-substitute in his note:—“The question now at issue is whether James Kelly can be said to have resided continuously at Ayr from 27th June 1907 to 27th June 1910.

“There is no conflict of evidence in the case. On returning to Ayr from harvest work in September 1906 Kelly found employment as a coal-heaver with Mr William Allan, coal merchant, Ayr. The employment lasted during the winter and spring, but failed him during the summer months, when the coal trade was slack. Kelly therefore left Ayr in July 1907, went into training with the militia for three or four weeks in Dumfriesshire, and thereafter worked at the harvest in Kirkcudbrightshire for six or seven weeks. He returned, however, to Ayr early in October, as he ‘knew where he had a job to go to,’ and continued in Mr Allan’s employment during the following winter and spring. In the summer of 1908 Kelly again joined the militia for three weeks in Dumfriesshire, and thereafter found work in Kirkcudbrightshire, first in thinning turnips, and latterly at the harvest. About the beginning of October, after an absence from Ayr of over three months, he resumed his employment with Mr Allan. In the summer of 1909 Kelly’s absence from Ayr

Oct. 25, 1912. does not appear to have extended beyond two or three days. He went to Dumfries for the militia training; but, having been discharged as medically unfit, he returned to Ayr, and continued to work in Mr Allan's employment until 27th June 1910, when, owing to illness, he had to apply for parochial relief. While in Ayr during the period in question Kelly resided mostly in a model lodging-house, called the 'Trades Hotel.' When he left in summer for harvest or other work he seems to have taken all his possessions with him; but after commencing work with Mr Allan in September 1906, though he was always only a casual labourer, yet he does not appear to have wavered in his purpose of regularly returning to Ayr as the place where he reckoned on earning his living."

Ayr Parish
Council v.
Wigtown
Parish

On 19th December 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Watson) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Finds in fact (1) that James Kelly was born in the parish of Wigtown; (2) that he acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Ayr, which was subsisting at 27th June 1910, when he became an object of parochial relief: Finds in law that the defenders are not bound to relieve the pursuers of their disbursements on behalf of the said James Kelly: Therefore sustains the plea in law stated for the defenders, and assoilzies them from the crave of the writ."

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Fleming), who, on 24th February 1912, pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the appeal, and finding, inter alia, that the pauper had not acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Ayr, and that the defenders were bound to relieve the pursuers of their disbursements on his behalf.*

* "NOTE.—The doctrine of constructive residence in poor-law cases has been carried very far, but no case was quoted to me, nor have I found any, where there was held to be constructive residence in which there was not some connecting link between the individual and the parish from which he was physically absent. A wife, a family, a parent, and even furniture and other belongings left in the parish have been held to be such a connecting link.

"Here the pauper was unmarried, and a casual labourer paid by the job as he could get one. He was under no obligation to turn out to work, and when he did turn out he took his chance of getting something to do. He lived in a model lodging-house, paying each night for his bed. He had no property or possessions except what he stood up in or carried in his pockets.

"Had his absence from Ayr been merely for the purpose of militia training the result might have been different, but as he continued his absence to undertake work elsewhere I have to consider whether his actual residence elsewhere can be treated as constructive residence in Ayr.

"I think it cannot. When the pauper left Ayr as he did in each year of his residence there he took his whole possessions with him. He had no engagement for work on his return, or even a definite promise. When he had finished his militia training he looked out for a harvesting job and worked at that till the end of harvest. Then he returned to Ayr because, as he says, 'I knew where I had a job to go to in Ayr.' But when he is asked, 'Had you any fixed intention of returning to Ayr if you got a job elsewhere?' his reply is, 'If I had got a job I would have taken it. It all depended on the pay. I went to Ayr because I could make more money in Ayr.'

"If the question to be answered in such cases is, 'Where is the person's home,' I think it is impossible to say of this pauper that when he was harvesting or looking for work elsewhere his home was still in Ayr. And equally would it be impossible if after the harvest was over he had got work

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Cullen) on 25th October 1912.

Oct. 25, 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—Although the pauper had been absent from Ayr for militia training and for harvesting work during periods of slackness in his employment there, he had none the less been continuously resident in Ayr, and had there acquired a residential settlement.¹ It was not maintained that during his absence from Ayr there had been constructive residence there, but the intervals of absence had not been sufficient to break the pauper's continuity of residence, and from the brief duration of his last interval of absence there was clear indication that, during all such intervals, his intention was to return to Ayr.²

Ayr Parish
Council v.
Wigtown
Parish Council.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have no hesitation in saying that I think the learned Sheriff is right. It is a question of fact and a question of degree. I do not think the doctrine of constructive residence arises. In order to lose a birth settlement, a man must acquire a settlement by continuous residence. The question is whether this man ever had such a residence in Ayr as can be said to be continuous residence. I think he had not. Mr Watson quite properly has quoted the case of Mackenzie.¹ That case went a very long way—much further than I should have been prepared to go. But we cannot take that case as a standard and then see whether this one comes so near it that the same result must follow. Each case must be determined by its own circumstances; and what I think distinguishes this case from Mackenzie,¹ if it is necessary to distinguish it, is that the period which in toto was dealt with in *Mackenzie*¹ was very much longer than the period in the present case. In Mackenzie's case,¹ for nearly twenty years of his life the man had shown that the one place where he had got subsistence from his labour was the parish of Blair Atholl, and the only period of the year when he was not there was when he went home to his own parents' house, when employment was slack at Blair Atholl. Here you have not got the same continuity of time. After Mr Allan had once begun to employ him Kelly not unnaturally went back to Ayr, where he thought a job was waiting for him, but he would have been equally happy to go anywhere else if he could have got a better job. You have not got that long period of year after year which would enable you to say that Ayr was the only place where the pauper went for his livelihood, as it was possible to say of Blair Atholl in Mackenzie's case.¹ I am therefore for adhering to the learned Sheriff's interlocutor.

in the same parish and remained at it for the necessary period to say that he was not, during the harvest and his subsequent residence in that other parish, qualifying for a residential settlement there. But no one can retain a residential settlement by constructive residence and, at the same time, by physical residence begin to qualify for such a settlement in another parish.

"I think the defenders have failed to prove that the pauper was continuously resident within the parish of Ayr for three years prior to chargeability."

Wylie v.
Inland
Revenue.

MISS CHARLOTTE ETHEL WYLIE, Appellant.—Mailand.
WALTER JAMES ECCOTT, Surveyor of Taxes, Respondent.—
Sol.-Gen. Anderson—J. A. T. Robertson.

Revenue—Income-tax—Profits—Deduction of expense incurred in earning profits—Profits earned by letting furnished house—Expense of renting house elsewhere—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Schedule D—Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 2, Schedule D.

A lady made a profit by letting her furnished house for two months, and, when assessed for income-tax thereon, claimed to deduct the rent of another house which she had taken to reside in during that period.

Held that this rent was not an expense necessarily incurred in earning the profit, and accordingly that the deduction should be disallowed.

1st DIVISION.
Exchequer
Cause.

THIS was a case for appeal under the Taxes Management Act, 1880, and set forth that at a meeting of the Commissioners for Income-Tax for the county of Haddington, held at Haddington on 10th May 1912, Miss Charlotte Ethel Wylie, residing at Eastfield, North Berwick, appealed against an assessment on the sum of £60 made upon her under the Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Schedule D, Sixth Case; the Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 2, Schedule D; and the Finance Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 48), sec. 14.

The case further set forth:—

“The following facts were admitted or proved:—

“(1) The assessment was made on Miss Charlotte Ethel Wylie in respect of rent received by her for letting her house, Eastfield, North Berwick, furnished for the months of August and September 1911.

“The rent received for said two months was . . . £90 and the following deductions were allowed:—

Valued rent for two months, ...	£14
Proportion of rates, ...	3
Wear and tear of furniture, ...	9
Cleaning, ...	2
Agency, ...	2 30
	£60

“(2) For the appellant it was contended (while the fairness of the above deductions was not disputed) that the rent paid by Miss Wylie for a furnished house at Aberfeldy during the period for which she let and endeavoured to let her house at North Berwick is a proper deduction and the Assessor had not allowed anything for it. The house at North Berwick was the appellant's only house, and she had no other house to which to remove in order to vacate the North Berwick house and so render it a lettable subject. The address of the house so rented by her was Cuilaluinn, Aberfeldy, and the amount paid by her for the use of it for four months was £70 (seventy pounds). Oct. 30, 1912.

Wylie v.
Inland
Revenue.

"(3) The Surveyor of Taxes (Mr W. J. Eccott) maintained that the rent paid by Miss Wylie for the house she occupied during the time her house at North Berwick was let is not a proper deduction for the following reasons:—

"The Income-Tax Acts contemplate the assessment of profit, and are not concerned with the application or destination of the profit when it is made.

"This principle has been repeatedly laid down, and particularly in the following cases:—Paddington Burial Board v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, (1884) 2 T. C. 46, per Day, J., at p. 50; Californian Copper Syndicate v. Harris, (1904) 6 F. 894, per Lord Trayner, at p. 899, 5 T. C. 159, at p. 168.

"The Surveyor further argued that if the appellant contended that no profit could be said to be realised until she had actually returned to her house and had set over her expenditure upon lodging against her receipts from letting her house, she was confusing two totally distinct things. What was sought to be ascertained were the expenses necessarily incurred in the process of letting the house at North Berwick furnished. Now the expense incurred by Miss Wylie in taking another house elsewhere was not such an expense. She might have gone to stay with friends. Or again, supposing she had not let it, but wished to take a holiday abroad or at Aberfeldy, she could not claim to set the expense so incurred against any other portion of her income.

"(4) The Commissioners, having considered the facts and arguments submitted to them, refused the appeal and confirmed the assessment."

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Cullen) on 30th October 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—This was not a question of destination of profits, but of expenditure in earning profits. The appellant did not make a business of letting houses, but in this instance had made a profit by letting her only home, and the expense of meanwhile finding a home elsewhere was a necessary expense to the earning of that profit.¹ The statutory prohibition in Schedule D of the Act of 1842, First and Second Cases, against deduction of living expenses did not apply to the present circumstances, which fell under the Sixth Case.

Argued for the respondent;—It was in the appellant's discretion whether she took another house or not, and the proposed deduction was therefore not in any sense a necessary expenditure. It was in fact a destination of the profits, not a preliminary to the earning of them.² The ground on which the appellant sought to make this deduction came to be that it was a necessary living expense, and therefore the prohibition against the deduction of living expenses directly applied.

Wylie v.
Inland
Revenue.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think there is no doubt about this case. A lady lets her house furnished, and by that means gets a very much larger return for it than the relative amount of the annual value which is in the valuation-roll, and upon which she pays income-tax under Schedule A. Accordingly, the Crown make a claim under Schedule D, and they begin with a statement of the rent which she gets from her tenant. Then they deduct the proportion of the rent in the Valuation-roll upon which she has already paid income-tax under Schedule A, corresponding to the period for which the house is let. Then they take off certain other deductions in respect of rates, wear and tear of furniture, cleaning, and agency, and they bring out the sum which represents clear profit to the lady and on which they propose to charge. She says—and it is contended in this case—that she is entitled further to make a deduction of the rent which she had to pay for a house elsewhere when she turned out of her own house in order to allow it to be let.

If it was the law that you were entitled before reckoning the profits of your business to have a deduction for the necessary cost of your living somewhere (because you must always live somewhere in order to conduct business), the argument would be a good one, but as it is distinctly specified in one of the cases under the Income-Tax Acts that no such charge is permissible, I am afraid that this charge cannot be allowed. This particular expenditure on a house elsewhere has nothing necessarily to do with the letting of her own house. It only represents the necessity of her living somewhere. So far as letting her house is concerned it is a necessity that she should go out, but it is not a necessity of the situation that she should take a house elsewhere. She might stay with friends—she might go to an hotel.

Accordingly, I am of opinion here that the determination of the Commissioners was quite right and should be affirmed.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The claim in question is made under the Sixth Case of Schedule D, and therefore I do not think it necessary to refer to the rules applicable to both the First and the Second Cases upon which argument was addressed to us. There can be no doubt that this lady ex facie made a profit by letting her house, because she received as rent a good deal more than the proportion of the year's assessed rental after making all proper allowances. If then, under the sixth case, the Commissioners have got to ascertain the full amount of profits and gains which she made out of this letting, I cannot see that it is possible to make a deduction in respect of the rent which she paid for another house, the renting of which enabled her to let her own; and for this very simple reason, that what she does when she leaves her own house and provides for her residence during the interval is entirely a personal matter, which it is impossible to reduce to any rule. She may take a smaller house. She may take a larger house. She may take no house at all, but live with friends, or travel. The whole thing is so entirely dependent upon her own personal wishes and circumstances, that it is impossible to found upon the course which she actually took any claim for deduction from the net rent which she received for the house which she let.

LORD CULLEN concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

Ship—Affreightment—Bill of Lading—Exemptions—Condition exempting ship from responsibility for marking on goods—Liability for unmarked goods—Apportionment among consignees of unmarked goods not identifiable as part of any particular consignment—Commixtio.

Bales of jute, consigned to various consignees and specifically marked, were shipped under bills of lading bearing that the bales were received "marked and numbered as per margin," but that "the weight, measure, quality, contents, and value" were unknown, and that the ship was not to be liable for "inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks."

On the discharge of the ship 14 bales were amissing. 11 bales also were found to be through some unknown cause without marks, and could not be identified as belonging to any particular consignment. It was not disputed that these 11 bales formed part of the jute shipped at the port of loading; but the consignees—four in number—who did not receive their full consignments refused to accept any of these bales.

In an action for freight brought by the shipowners against one of the four consignees, held (1) that on the terms of the bills of lading the shipowners were exonerated from responsibility for the absence of markings on the bales; (2) that the four consignees were bound to accept the 11 bales, and that these fell to be allocated among them in proportion to the respective shortages on their consignments; but that each of them was entitled to deduct from the freight due by him the value of his proportion, thus ascertained, of the 14 missing bales.

On 9th June 1910 Tyzack & Branfoot Steamship Company, Limited, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee against Frank Stewart Sandeman & Sons, spinners and manufacturers, Dundee, concluding for payment of £175, 1s. 6d., this sum being the balance of freight due for the carriage on the pursuers' steamship 'Fulwell' of bales of jute, for which the defenders held bills of lading.

The pursuers averred that in August 1909 the "Fulwell" loaded at Calcutta a cargo of 28,002 bales of jute for conveyance to Dundee. The jute was consigned to thirty-seven different consignees; and the defenders were onerous indorsees and holders of bills of lading for eleven parcels of jute, consisting of 2476 of these bales.

The bills of lading were in these terms:—

"Shipped in good order and condition . . . bales of jute at . . . lbs., being marked and numbered as per margin; and to be delivered subject to the exceptions and conditions hereinafter mentioned, in the like good order and condition, from the ship's tackles (where the ship's responsibility shall cease) at the aforesaid port of Dundee. . . .

"(4) The number of packages signed for in this bill of lading to be binding on steamer and owners, unless errors or fraud be proved, and any excess of shippers' marks to be delivered. Any shortage to be paid for at the spot market value on the day of arrival of the vessel.

"(5) The following are the exceptions and conditions above referred to:—Weight, measure, quality, contents, and value unknown. . . .

"(7) The ship is not liable for insufficient packing or reasonable wear and tear of packages; for inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks, numbers, or description of goods shipped, leakage, breakage, loss or damage by dust from coaling on the voyage, sweat, rust, or decay, except through improper stowage. Fines and expenses and losses by detention of ship or cargo, caused by incorrect marking or by incomplete or incorrect description of contents or weight, or of any other particulars required by the authorities at the port of discharge upon either the packages or bills of lading, shall be borne by the owners of the goods.

"(11) On arrival at port of destination, delivery to be made on payment of freight as above and production of the bills of lading in accordance with the endorsements thereon, or against the consignees' suborders for any portion of such bills of lading duly lodged. The cargo to be discharged without delay, and according to the custom of the port for steamers, at any safe dock, wharf, quay, or basin which may be appointed on arrival"

The pursuers further averred that the discharge of the vessel began on or about 14th October on its arrival at Dundee. The bales, as they were discharged, were taken possession of by harbour porters, who wheeled them into sheds on the quay. Of the cargo, 14 bales were unaccounted for, and after the consignees had been engaged in removing bales, it was found that there remained in the harbour sheds 11 unclaimed bales. The defenders had received 2470 bales, and claimed for a short delivery of 6 bales. Three other consignees also claimed for short deliveries, the total shortage claimed for by these parties and the defenders being 25 bales. "The defenders and the other consignees claiming for short delivery decline to regard any of these 11 bales as part of their consignments, alleging that the 11 bales thus remaining unclaimed either bear different marks from theirs or no marks at all; and in the claims for shortage referred to the delivery of the said 11 bales to the consignees has not been allowed for. The pursuers have repudiated the said claims for shortage to the extent of 11 bales, on the ground that the 11 bales left in the shed were bales which the defenders and the claiming consignees were bound to attribute to their bill of lading quantities—the pursuers, by the terms of the bills of lading, not being liable for inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks, numbers, address or description of goods shipped." The pursuers offered "to pay to the defenders, and the other consignees, in such proportions as they may be found to be respectively entitled to the same, the price" of the 14 bales, but explained that "owing to the failure of the defenders and the other consignees to allocate among themselves the 11 bales left in the harbour shed, the pursuers are unable to ascertain what part, if any, of the price of the 14 bales tendered" would fall to the defenders. The sum sued for was the balance of the freight unpaid and still due by the defenders, subject to any deduction to which the defenders might be entitled in respect of the pursuers' tender.

The defenders averred that they had not received six of the bales consigned under their bills of lading; that the 11 bales were not shipped under these bills; and that they declined to take them in Oct. 30, 1912. implement of the bills. They also averred:—"The cargo in question was discharged on to a covered quay or shed in the dock. There is no custom of the Port of Dundee regulating the delivery of jute cargoes. The pursuers' right to freight depends on the right delivery of the cargo, and their lien therefore depends on their retaining possession or control thereof, and the defenders have a right to set off against it any claim for damage they may sustain through short delivery of or damage to their jute, so that delivery cannot be given or taken until the pursuers have assorted and set out the jute in separate parcels according to the marks and quality marks in the respective bills of lading, and afforded the defenders an opportunity of examining the condition of the bales and checking the marks thereof and settling the freight. The pursuers, however, did not do this, or tender to the defenders delivery of the bales referred to in the said bills of lading. On the contrary, they discharged the jute from their vessel promiscuously on to the quay with exceptional rapidity, and very much faster than the bales could be loaded by the defenders on their carts and lorries and removed from the quay. The pursuers never assorted the bales and never tendered them to the defenders in implement of their respective bills of lading, but left the defenders to search out their bales as they best could."

v. Sandeman
& Sons.

A proof was led in the action. The facts proved are stated in the following passage from the opinion of Lord Salvesen:—

"The facts in this case lie within a short compass, and are not seriously in controversy. The pursuers' steamer 'Fulwell' loaded in Calcutta between 11th August and 1st September 1909 a cargo of jute in bales for conveyance to Dundee. The cargo was brought alongside in barges, and the bales of jute were hoisted in slings of five or six at a time direct from the barge into the hold of the steamer. Native tallymen were employed by the ship to tally the cargo at each hold, and to see that the number of bales stated in the boat-note handed by the bargee to the tallymen corresponded with the number unloaded from the barge. The boat-note, besides stating the number of bales on board, also described the marks on the bales. It was part of the tallymen's duty not to receive burst or wet bales; and where any such were returned, a note of the number and the reason for rejecting them was put upon the boat-note, as well as a jotting in pencil of the number of slings and the number of bales which each sling contained, with a summation of the total number received from each barge. The principal boat-note was retained by the ship, a copy being delivered by the bargee. A mate's receipt, made out in accordance with the particulars in the boat-note, was signed by the chief officer, and from this document a bill of lading applicable to the particular parcel was made out by the shippers, containing the same particulars and signed by the ship's agent on behalf of the master.

"The first of the two bills of lading with which we are concerned in this case was for a parcel of 254 bales of jute bearing to be shipped by Ralli Brothers, and having the marks 'Registered, 400 lbs. J.P.S. Naraingunge, 1909-10.' On end, 'R.B.' Of this parcel 127 bales had the quality mark 2 in red, and 127 bales the quality mark 3 in green. The other parcel had precisely similar marks, but consisted of 246 bales of jute, one-half having the quality mark 2 in red and the other half the quality mark 3 in green.

Tyzack &
Branfoot

v. Sandeman
& Sons.

"The evidence shows, and indeed this was not disputed, that the loading was carried on in the customary way and so that it was impossible for the tallyman to check the marks on each bale, although he had an opportunity of seeing, with regard to the top layer of bales in the barge, that the marks, generally speaking, corresponded with those indicated in the boat-note. If, however, occasional bales were unmarked or had different marks, this would almost inevitably escape detection. In order to enable the tallyman effectively to check the marks, every sling would have had to be laid on deck and the bales turned over with the marked side uppermost, the markings being on a piece of gunny or sacking which is on one side of the bale only, and is held in position by a continuous rope wound round it. Such a method of conducting loading is unknown at Calcutta, and would greatly prolong the operation. The practice, therefore, is for the tallyman not to pay special attention to the marks on each bale, but to accept the description in the boat-note as generally confirmed by his own observation before commencing to unload the barge.

"The cargo as described in the bills of lading consisted of 28,002 bales of jute consigned to thirty-seven different consignees, and included bales of many different marks. The 'Fulwell' had a prosperous voyage, and arrived in Dundee about the 14th of October, when the discharge was commenced and extended over rather more than a fortnight. The method of discharge was the one customary at Dundee. The ship's stevedores hoisted the bales in slings by five or six at a time on to a raised platform, from which they were slid singly down an inclined plane which extended to the nearest shed, where the bales were received by harbour porters employed by the consignees as a body and paid by them. These porters assorted the bales according to their marks, and they were then removed by the consignee to whom each lot belonged. The removal was checked by a shipping clerk employed by the ship, by a merchant's clerk employed by the consignees, and by a shore-dues clerk on behalf of the harbour authorities. Of the thirty-seven consignees, thirty-three received their full consignments bearing the marks specified in their respective bills of lading. The defenders received 2470 bales out of a total specified in their bills of lading of 2476. Of the number received there were ten which bore the quality mark of 2 instead of the quality mark of 3, which is an inferior quality; but the defenders naturally made no demur to taking the superior quality instead. On the whole cargo there was a shortage of fourteen bales; and in addition there were eleven bales which on 30th October were discovered to have no marks except certain marks on the ends in individual cases. None of these bales can be identified as forming part of the parcels consigned to the consignees who did not obtain their full bill of lading quantity; and each of them refused to accept any of these bales as forming part of their consignments. The pursuers, while not admitting that there was any shortage in the quantity delivered as compared with the quantity actually shipped, have offered to account for the value of the fourteen bales. The question in the case is whether they are also bound to account for the value of the eleven bales which they actually carried and delivered over the vessel's side, but which do not bear the marks described in the various bills of lading whose holders have not received their full quantities.

"The matter is somewhat complicated by the circumstance that there is a shortage, and that this falls to be distributed over four different consignees; as also that the same consignees must, according to the pursuers' contention, take the eleven bales among them in proportion to the shortage of their several consignments. I shall, however, for the sake of simplicity, treat the case as if there had been one consignment only, and as if of that consignment the whole number of bales had been delivered except the eleven which were found to be unmarked. How the absence of marks occurred is not made the subject of direct evidence, as indeed it could scarcely have been. The marks might conceivably have been torn off in the course of stowing the cargo or of unloading it, but no suggestion of this kind was made at the time when the question first arose; and it was only long afterwards that an examination was made of the bales in the shed, when some of the defenders' experts say that the ropes had in some cases got slack in the middle, pointing to the possibility of the pieces of gunny on which the markings were stencilled having come off. How little importance is to be attached to this examination after the goods had been exposed to the risk of much handling in the sheds may be judged from the fact that two of these bales, each weighing 400 lb., had bodily disappeared, having apparently been stolen in the interval. I entertain no doubt that, as the quality of the jute did not correspond with any of the consignments on which there had been a shortage, the marks were not on the bales when they were shipped at Calcutta, and that this fact escaped the notice of the tally-clerks owing to the manner in which the goods were loaded on board, and the obvious interest that the bargees, acting either for themselves or on behalf of the shippers, would have to conceal the absence of marks on a bale by placing it in the centre of the sling. I should further add that it was admitted by counsel for the defenders that the eleven bales in question had been received by the ship at Calcutta, and that there had been no exchange of bales either at Calcutta or at any of the ports at which the vessel called, a supposition which would, in any case, have been entirely excluded by the evidence."

On 29th August 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders, Frank Stewart Sandeman & Sons, are, under bills of lading held by them, entitled to delivery from the pursuers of 2476 bales of jute, and that they have obtained delivery of no more than 2470 bales: Finds that the pursuers are bound either to deliver the six bales still undelivered, or to establish a 'valid excuse' for their failure to deliver them: Finds that the pursuers have failed to establish any valid excuse for non-delivery of said six bales, and that, therefore, the defenders are entitled to deduct the value thereof from the sum sued for: Assesses the value of said bales at £15, 5s. 4d.: Decerns against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of £159, 16s. 2d. (being the sum sued for, £175, 1s. 6d., under deduction of the said sum of £15, 5s. 4d.), with interest thereon as craved."

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 25th, 26th, and 27th June 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The appellants were only bound to deliver the goods received for carriage. This was the extent of the duty of a shipowner as carrier at common law; and his position was in no way affected by section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855,¹ for that section applied to the person who signed the bill of lading only and not to the shipowner. Thus, although the bill of lading stated that 246 bales were received, it was open to the shipowner to prove as against the shipper and the consignee—whose right was no higher than the shipper's¹—that a smaller number of bales were actually shipped, the onus of this proof being on the shipowner; and similarly, while the shipowner would be prima facie bound if the master had, by custom or otherwise, a mandate to sign, and did sign, a bill containing a representation as to the marks on the bales, in this case also the shipowner might by proof discharge his prima facie liability. In the present case the appellants had proved that they had delivered all the bales which they had received except fourteen, for which they accepted responsibility; and as regards the quality marks on the bales, the master had no authority to bind the owners as to these, for that was no part of his duty as master.² The appellants, therefore, were not bound by the representation in the bills as to the marking of the goods. But, in any case, they were protected by the terms of the bills of lading.³ Clause 5 of the bills exempted them from all liability regarding the contents of the bales, and clause 7 from liability regarding the external marks on the bales. In *Parsons*⁴ it was held that the person who signed the bill of lading would not be liable for the obliteration of a mark from goods shipped, as the presence or absence of that mark did not affect the identity of the goods but merely their identification. The respondents' contention that there had been no delivery of the bales to the consignees was negatived by the decisions,⁵ and also by the provision in the bills of lading that the cargo was to be discharged "according to the custom of the port." That custom had been followed here. The bales having been delivered, it was the duty of the consignees to apportion the eleven unmarked bales among themselves; and the rule for the method of apportionment was established by the case of Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company.⁶ Each consignee was liable in freight for his bales as delivered over the side of the ship, subject to deduction of the value of his proportion of the fourteen bales which had been lost.

Argued for the respondents;—The appellants were bound to deliver goods of the same quantity and description as were stated in the bills of lading to have been shipped. Here they had professed to tally the marks, and had acknowledged receipt of the bales "marked and numbered as per margin." These marks were leading marks; and the master had authority to insert the leading marks in the bills.

This was recognised in Cox v. Bruce.¹ In the case of *Parsons*² the identity of the delivered goods with the goods received by the ship-owner was not questioned: here the whole question was as to the identity of the goods delivered with the goods shipped. On the terms of the receipt in the bill of lading the onus of proving that the goods were not marked rested on the appellants just as the onus of proving a shortage in the shipment would.³ This onus the appellants had not discharged. On the voyage fourteen bales were lost, and for aught that appeared in the evidence all the respondents' missing bales might have been included in these lost bales. It could not, therefore, be said that the appellants had shown that the bales of the respondents were not marked, when they had given no account of the lost bales. As for the special conditions in the bills of lading on which the appellants relied, the fifth condition did not affect the present question. The seventh had no application. That clause could only apply if it were proved that the goods tendered by the appellants were those that were shipped under the bills of lading. Fourteen bales, possibly all correctly marked, had disappeared; and of the eleven unclaimed bales it was not proved that any of these actually were part of the respondents' consignment. Hence the appellants could not invoke the protection of the seventh condition.⁴ Again, the bills of lading acknowledged that the bales were "shipped in good order and condition," and as the bales were not delivered in good condition the appellants could not recover the freight.⁵ Further, there had been no delivery to the respondents of their bales. The porters were acting for all the consignees indiscriminately; and it was impossible to maintain that this was a tender of goods when it was uncertain to which of the consignees the goods belonged. The two decisions as to delivery⁶ on which the appellants relied were not in point, for in these cases there was no question as to delivery to a number of consignees, nor was there any dispute except as to the time of delivery. Here there was no question as to the time of delivery; the only question was as to what had been delivered. In *Spence*⁷ also the goods were all of the same quality, and the decision proceeded on a principle which was inapplicable here, viz., commixtio.⁸ *Smurthwaite*⁹ was really adverse to the appellants' contention. It was held there that a number of consignees could not join as plaintiffs in an action as each had a separate claim under a separate contract. The contracts with the various consignees must therefore stand by themselves; and the appellants could not require the respondents to resort to allocation of the bales with the other consignees under separate contracts.

Oct. 30, 1912. printed supra].—Each bill of lading contains certain exceptions and conditions qualifying the ship's responsibility for delivering the goods specified therein. There is also an express provision with regard to the number of packages in these terms: "The number of packages signed for in this bill of lading to be binding on steamer and owners, unless errors or fraud be proved, and any excess of shipper's marks to be delivered. Any shortage to be paid for at the spot market value on the day of arrival of the vessel." This provision, which is unusual, serves to explain the attitude of the pursuers with regard to the fourteen bales short delivered. Presumably they are unable to point to any particular error or fraud which resulted in the bills of lading being for a larger quantity of bales than was actually delivered at Dundee; although on the evidence there can be little moral doubt that the ship in fact delivered all the bales received.

Tyzack &
Branfoot
Steamship
Co., Limited,
v. Sandeman
& Sons.

Lord Salvesen.

The only exceptions and conditions which have any bearing on the question relating to the eleven bales are as follows:—" (5) Weight, measure, quality, contents, and value unknown "; and " (7) The ship is not liable for insufficient packing or reasonable wear and tear of packages; for inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks, numbers, or descriptions of goods shipped."

It is unnecessary to consider what would have been the liability of the pursuers had these conditions not been embodied in the bill of lading. The primary duty of a shipowner is to carry in safety the goods received by him from the shipper and, if he does so, it is pretty plain that the shipper can have no claim against him because he has induced the ship's agent to sign his name to an inaccurate representation of the marks on the goods so received. There is high authority for the proposition that a consignee is in this respect in no better position than the shipper—Craig & Rose v. Delargy.¹ It is not necessary, however, to enter upon this somewhat vexed question, as it is quite certain that the shipowner may qualify the obligation that he might otherwise be held as undertaking as in a question with the consignees. Thus if the bill of lading bears on the face of it that so many tons of goods have been received, and the obligation is qualified by the words "weight unknown," the owner will not be responsible if a less quantity is delivered to the consignees, although the latter may have paid on the faith of the bill of lading, provided the shipowner, in fact, delivered the quantity of goods put on board his vessel. This was expressly decided in the case of Jessel v. Bath.² The statement as to the weight of the goods contained in the bill of lading, qualified by the words "weight unknown," was construed as being a representation by the shipper of which the master who signed the bill of lading had no knowledge. Baron Bramwell said: "This document, though apparently contradictory, means this—a certain quantity of manganese has been brought on board, which is said by the shipper for the purpose of freight to amount to so much, but I do not pretend or undertake to know whether or not that statement of weight is correct. On a bill of lading so made out I think no one could be liable in such an action as the present."

I am unable to distinguish that case in principle from the present. Reading the bill of lading as a whole, I think it means that the shipper has represented to the signatory that the bales are marked and numbered as on the margin of the document, but that the latter expressly signs on the Oct. 30, 1912. footing that the ship will not be responsible if the marks as so described do not prove to be accurate, or if there is an entire absence of marks, or if the description of the goods turns out not to correspond with that given in the bill of lading. This is made all the more manifest by the subsequent clause that, if expenses and losses by detention of the ship and cargo be "caused by incorrect marking or incorrect description of contents or weight," such losses shall be borne by the owner of the goods. Now, I think it impossible to suggest, in the face of such clauses, that the agent who signed the bill of lading was guaranteeing the correctness of the markings as stated therein. In these circumstances, had there been only one consignee of this cargo, I entertain no doubt that he would have been bound to take delivery of the eleven unmarked bales as well as those that bore the correct markings, and that he would have had no defence to an action for freight.

It is curious that on a matter of this kind, which must be of frequent occurrence, there should be no precise authority in point as to the responsibility of the ship. Two cases were, however, referred to, in both of which the decision was in favour of the shipowner although there was no express exemption in the bill of lading. The first is the case of Cox v. Bruce,¹ where the master had signed a bill of lading for 192 bales described as marked R.C. 2 and 286 marked R.C. 3. The 2 and 3 were quality marks. On delivery it turned out that there were fifty-nine bales short of No. 2 quality and fifty-nine in excess of No. 3. The consignee, who had acquired the bill of lading for value without notice of any incorrectness in the description of the goods, claimed the difference in value between fifty-nine bales of No. 2 quality and the same number of bales of No. 3. It was held that the shipowners were not liable either for breach of contract or on the ground that they were estopped by the representation in the bill of lading. There was a special clause in that bill of lading with which we are not concerned here, which was construed as meaning that the responsibility for correct delivery did not attach unless the quality marks had been correctly inserted in the bill of lading. The ground of the decision appears to have been that the master had no power to bind his owners by an incorrect description of the goods any more than he could bind them by an incorrect statement of the number or weight, and the case is also important as showing that Lord Esher took the same view as Lord President Inglis, in Craig & Rose v. Delargy,² that an indorsee of a bill of lading has no higher rights than the shipper.

The other case is that of Parsons v. New Zealand Shipping Company,³ where certain carcasses had been shipped under a bill of lading which contained a marginal description of them as marked 622 X, whereas a corresponding number of carcasses marked 522 X was tendered. The action was directed against the agents who signed the bill of lading, and not against the shipowners; and yet it was held that the defendants were not liable. A. L. Smith, M.R., put his judgment on a special clause in the bill of lading which ran as follows: "The ship shall not be responsible for correct delivery or loss unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark and number or

He construed this as meaning correctly marked with the mark and number according to the bill of lading, and held that the clause was inserted to meet a case where the goods were not correctly marked according to the bill of lading. In my opinion the clause in the bill of lading we are considering is much more clear and unambiguous, and if so, it follows that the pursuers cannot be answerable for the misdescription.

LordSalvesen. A difficulty arises in the present case from the circumstance that there was a shortage of fourteen bales; and the defenders say that it may be that the whole of the bales in respect of which they claim were amongst those for which the ship admits liability. It appears, however, that exactly the same position is taken up by the other three consignees against whom actions for freight have also been raised (these actions to await the decision in the present case), and I think it is perfectly plain that none of the eleven unmarked bales can be identified with any of their shipments. These eleven bales must, however, have formed part of one or more of the four parcels in question. How, then, are they to be distributed? It appears to me that the answer is furnished by the decision in Spence.¹ In that case the marks on a large number of bales of cotton had become so obliterated by sea water that none of them could be identified as belonging to any particular consignee. It was held that these bales must be attributed to the consignees in the proportion that the quantity to which each was entitled bore to the whole quantity shipped. That was a case against underwriters, the ground of action being that as it was impossible to identify any of the bales as being the plaintiff's he was not bound to receive them, and that, as in a question with the underwriters, there was a total loss of the bales. It was pointed out by Bovill, C.J., that this argument would equally apply if not a single bale had been lost, and if the marks only had been obliterated; and would lead to the strange anomaly that although all the goods which had been put on board arrived safely at their destination there would be a total loss on the whole of them for the purpose of insurance law. In another part of his opinion he says: "There is no authority nor sound reason for saying that the goods of several persons which are accidentally mixed together thereby absolutely cease to be the property of their several owners, and become bona vacantia." Applying this principle to the present case, and on the assumption of the facts above referred to, the just way of distributing the unmarked bales to each consignee is in proportion to the total shortage. Parties are agreed as to the way in which this works out in the case of the present defenders, and the sum to which they are entitled in respect of the six bales of which they have not meanwhile taken possession. If the ship had to make good the value of these bales, the sum would work out, as the Sheriff-substitute has fixed it, at £15, 5s. 4d.; but, on the assumption that the defenders are bound to take their proportion of the eleven bales, this sum is reduced to £8, 11s., which will form a deduction from the admitted freight. I propose, therefore, that we should recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and make appropriate findings in fact consistent with the views above expressed; and should grant decree for the sum of £175, 1s. 6d., under deduction of £8, 11s., with interest, as concluded for. As the whole controversy has turned on the obligation of the Oct. 30, 1912. defenders to take their proportion of the eleven unmarked bales, they must be found liable in expenses both here and in the Court below.

An argument based upon the decisions in the two cases of the *British Shipowners' Company v. Grimond*¹ and the *Knight Steamship Company*² I have no doubt these two cases were well decided, and, in any event, they are binding upon us; but, except in so far as it appears from them that the customary method of discharging jute cargoes at Dundee was followed in the present case, they appear to me to have no application. The mere fact that the harbour porters took delivery of certain bales from the ship's side on the instruction of the general body of consignees has, in my opinion, no bearing on the question whether any particular consignee is bound to pay freight on these bales if they turned out not to form part of the parcel for which he held a bill of lading. The question would still be open whether the tender of these bales by the shipowners to any particular consignee or consignees was a tender which they were bound to accept. If, for instance, it had been established that the bales in question had been substituted by the shipowners for other bales which were in fact consigned under one or more of the bills of lading, the provisional delivery to the harbour porters would not affect the right of the consignees in question to reject the bales. According to the recognised method of discharge at Dundee it would be quite impracticable to ascertain, during the course of unloading and before the bales were delivered across the ship's rail, whether they formed part of the consignment which the harbour porters were authorised by their constituents to receive. The decisions quoted are merely to the effect that where bales so received do form part of the cargo belonging to consignees who have instructed the harbour porters to attend to their interests, the risk of damage from exposure on the quay or otherwise falls to be borne by the receivers whose property they ex hypothesi were, but delivery per se could not in the circumstances effect a transfer of property of goods which were not in fact shipped by any of the merchants from whom the holders of the bill of lading derived their right.

Entail—Provisions to younger children—Free rent—Deductions—Interest on debt—Interest on Estate-duty—Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 130), secs. 6 (8) and 9 (1).

Mackintosh v. Mackintosh.

By a deed of entail power was conferred upon the successive heirs of entail in possession to make provisions for widows by way of annuities, not exceeding a certain proportion of the free rents of the estate to be computed "after deduction of all annual public and parochial burdens and interests of debts and provisions affecting the same at the time"; also to make provisions for younger children, not exceeding a certain number of years' free rent of the estate, the rent "to be computed and taken as at the date of the deed granting the provisions, after deduction of all annual public and parochial burdens affecting the same at the time," no mention being made of interest of debts as a deduction.

An heir of entail, on succeeding to the estate, made provisions for younger children, the deed of provision being executed before the date arrived when, under the Finance Act, 1894, payment of certain estate-duties due in respect of the estate could actually be demanded.

Hold that in estimating the "free rent" for the purposes of the provisions to younger children there fell to be deducted:—

(1) Interest on debts affecting the estate, in respect that "free rent" meant rent free from such interest, and that this was not affected by the fact that in the deed of entail interest on debt was not specifically mentioned as a deduction with regard to such provisions.

(2) Interest on estate-duty, in respect that, although the estate-duty was not actually payable till after the date of the deed creating the provision, it was already an existing statutory burden on the estate.

On 5th March 1912 Ian Keith Mackintosh, with consent and concurrence of his mother, Mrs Alice Mary Mackintosh, widow of Lord Hunter. William Alexander Mackintosh, as his curator and administrator-at-law, presented a petition under the Entail Acts, 1824 to 1882, and relative Acts of Sederunt, and the Finance Act, 1894,* for authority to charge the entailed estate of Usan with estate-duty, settlement estate-duty, and children's provisions.

The petition set forth:—"That the petitioner succeeded to the said lands and estate on 17th July 1911 on the death of his grandmother, the deceased Mrs Helen Keith or Keith Mackintosh of Usan

"That the said deceased Mrs Helen Keith or Keith Mackintosh, the former heir in possession, succeeded to the said lands and estate on 1st February 1909, upon the death of her brother the deceased George Keith, Esq. Secundus of Usan, and she was at the date of her death duly infeft in the said lands and estate

* The Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 6, which deals with the collection and recovery of estate-duty, enacts:—Subsection (8).

"Provided that the duty due upon an account of real property may, at the option of the person delivering the account, be paid by eight equal yearly instalments . . . with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the date at which the first instalment is due, . . . and the first instalment shall be due at the expiration of twelve months from the death. . . ."

Sec. 9 enacts:—Subsection (1). "A rateable part of the estate-duty on an estate . . . shall be a first charge on the property in respect of which duty is leviable. . . ."

Oct. 29, 1912. "That in respect of the passing of the said lands and estate to the said Mrs Helen Keith or Keith Mackintosh on the death of the said Mackintosh v. George Keith, Secundus, estate-duty and settlement estate-duty Mackintosh. became exigible in terms of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the value of the said lands and estate. The estate-duty (at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent) amounted to £1481, 12s. 6d., and the settlement estate-duty (at the rate of 1 per cent) amounted to £276, 4s. 8d. These duties together amounted to £1757, 17s. 2d.

"That at the date of the said Mrs Helen Keith or Keith Mackintosh's death the said duties were unpaid, and that by her trust-disposition and settlement, dated 23rd December 1907, and with three holograph codicils thereto, dated respectively 24th February 1909, 29th June 1910, and 2nd February 1911," she, inter alia, bequeathed to her executors her right to charge the entailed estate of Usan with the duties.

By the deed of entail under which the estate was held the successive heirs or heiresses of entail were empowered to make provisions for wives or husbands by way of annuity equal to one-fourth part of the free rents of the estate, "to be computed and taken as at the date of the deed granting the annuity, after deduction of all annual public and parochial burdens and interests of debts and provisions affecting the same at the time."

Power was also given to the successive heirs in possession to grant bonds in favour of younger children, and to burden succeeding heirs of entail therewith, for provisions not exceeding two years' free rent of the estate, in case there should be one child other than the heir succeeding to the estate, and up to five years' free rent in case there should be three or more such children, "the rent in all such cases to be computed and taken as at the date of the deed granting the provisions, after deduction of all annual public and parochial burdens affecting the same at the time, but not of the existing liferents to wives or husbands."

The petition further set forth:—"That by bond of provision, dated 16th March 1909, the said Mrs Helen Keith or Keith Mackintosh, on the narrative that she was heiress of entail in possession of the said lands and estate . . . that the free rental of the said lands and others at the date of the said bond of provision amounted to the sum of £1628, 6s. 5d., and that she was desirous of exercising the powers conferred on her by the said disposition and deed of entail by securing the sum of £8140 sterling to the said Thomas Mackintosh, Archibald Mackintosh, and Mrs Jane Christina Mackintosh or Tod, wife of William Leonard Tod, residing at Glenesk, Polton, being her whole children then in existence other than and besides the said William Alexander Mackintosh, her eldest son and then apparent heir in the said lands and estate (who thereafter died predeceasing her),—inter alia, bound and obliged herself and the heirs of entail succeeding to her in the said lands and estate, on the day after her death, to content and pay to the said Thomas Mackintosh, Archibald Mackintosh, and Mrs Jane Christina Mackintosh or Tod, the said sum of £8140, being under five years' free rent of the said lands and estates as at the date of the said bond of provision, after deduction of all legal and public burdens, in terms of the said disposition and deed of entail."

On 16th March 1912 a remit was made to Mr W. S. Haldane, W.S., to enquire into the facts, and to report, and he reported, inter al'ia, as follows:—"A point which has arisen in connection with the ascertainment of the precise amount of the younger children's provisions is whether interest on the estate-duties now proposed to be charged on the estate in respect of the late Mrs Mackintosh's succession, and which, by section 9, subsection 1, of the Finance Act of 1894, became first charges on the estate, falls to be taken into computation. The reporter is of opinion that in the circumstances of the present case it does not, the duties not having become exigible until one year after her succession, in terms of section 6, subsection 8, of the Finance Act, 1894, which in this case would mean that the first instalment of duty became due on 1st February 1910—the year following the creation of the provisions. Moreover they have not in point of fact been yet created charges on the estate. . . .

Oct. 29, 1912.
Mackintosh v.
Mackintosh.

"In computing the free rental, as stated in the said bond of provision, on which the said Mrs Keith or Keith Mackintosh fixed the amount of her younger children's provisions, no deduction apparently was made in respect of interest on debt affecting the estate, which the reporter understands amounted to £5575, created subsequent to the date of the entail. The deed of entail itself only expressly excludes from computation 'existing liferents to wives or husbands,' but having regard to the terms of section 4 of the Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. cap. 87), and to the reasoning of the Judges in the case of Lord Lovat v. Fraser, &c., June 30, 1885, 12 R., p. 1179, it appears to the reporter that interest on debt affecting the estate falls to be deducted in ascertaining the 'free rent.'"

On 22nd May 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Finds (1) that the interest on debts charged upon the entailed estate falls to be deducted in calculating the free rent on which the amount of the provision to younger children is to be based; (2) that interest on the amount of the estate-duty (including settlement estate-duty) payable in respect of Mrs Keith Mackintosh's succession also falls to be deducted in calculating the said free rent; and (3) that the expenses of the bond or bonds and dispositions in security for the amounts of the said younger children's provisions, and the said estate-duty, cannot form a charge upon the entailed estate."*

* "OPINION.—This is an application by an heir of entail in possession to charge the entailed estate with estate-duty, settlement estate-duty, and provisions to children. Mr Haldane, to whom a remit was made, has raised certain questions which were argued before me. They arise in this way.

"Mrs Keith or Keith Mackintosh, the former heir in possession, succeeded to the estate on 1st February 1909. On 16th March 1909 she executed a deed of provision in favour of her younger children for the sum of £8140, a sum said to be under five years' free rent of the estate, and therefore competent under the deed of entail. In calculating free rent no deduction was made in respect of interest on debts charged upon the estate. The reporter is of opinion that this was wrong. I agree with him.

"Under the deed of entail it is provided that the heir of entail in possession may, in the event of there being three children other than the heir—the case in point—grant a bond to his said younger children burdening the succeeding heirs for payment of provisions not exceeding 'the sum of five years' free rent of the whole lands and others'—'the rent to be computed and taken after deduction of all annual, public, and parochial burdens affecting the same at the time, but not of the existing liferents to wives or husbands.' If these words stood alone, I do not think it could be success-

Mackintosh v.
Mackintosh.

Thomas Mackintosh and Archibald Mackintosh, two of Mrs Keith Mackintosh's younger children for whom provision had been made, reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Mackenzie) on 26th June 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) In considering the effect of an exercise of powers to grant provisions by an heir of entail, it was important to distinguish between powers conferred by the Aberdeen Act,¹ and those conferred by the deed of entail.² In computing free rent for the purpose of children's provisions under the present deed of entail, the Aberdeen Act did not determine the appropriate deductions, because these were prescribed by the deed itself.³ In the deed interest on debts was not specified as the subject of deduction for the purposes of younger children's provisions, and, accordingly, it did not fall to be deducted.⁴ This was all the more evident when the clause dealing with younger children's provisions was contrasted with that dealing with widows' annuities, in which interest of debts was specififully contended that interest upon debt charged upon the estate did not form a proper deduction from the rental to be taken as the basis for calculating the amount of the provision to younger children. The expression 'free rent' would appear to be used in the same sense as it is used in the Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. cap. 87, sec. 4). It was, however, contended on behalf of the younger children that an examination of the different provisions of the deed showed that the entailer intended that the free rental should be ascertained, after deduction of public and parochial burdens payable annually, and without any deduction for interest payable on debt. This argument is founded mainly, if not exclusively, upon the circumstance that, in providing for a widow's annuity, free rent is to be computed 'after deduction of all annual, public, and parochial burdens and interests of debts and provisions,' while nothing is said about deducting 'interest of debts and provisions' in the case of a provision for younger children. I do not, however, think that the mere absence of these words in the later part of the deed necessarily leads to what appears to me to be an unnatural construction of the actual words used. It has to be kept in view, as pointed out by the Lord President in the case of Lovat, (1885) 12 R. 1179, at p. 1185, that it would be difficult to suppose that the entailer used the expression free rent 'in a sense which would allow the whole rents of the estate to be covered by provisions to widows and children so as to leave nothing at all for the heir in possession.' After he has expressly provided for the deduction of interest of debts and provisions from rental in computing a widow's annuity, the entailer speaks further on in the deed of 'annual burdens as aforesaid' as including the more detailed enumeration he had previously given. I think the same significance was intended to be given to the shorter expression when used in dealing with provisions to younger children. Besides, on the construction put forward on behalf of the younger children, I do not think there would be any necessity for the words 'but not of the existing liferents to wives or husbands.' These words are introduced as an exception from what has already been dealt with, and presumably because otherwise such liferents would have been deducted as annual burdens.

"The next question is whether interest on the amount of the estate-duty (including settlement estate-duty), payable in respect of Mrs Keith Mackincally stated to be a deduction. (2) Even if interest on debts were deductible, interest on the estate-duty payable in respect of the succession of the grantor of the present provisions could not be deducted. That duty was not a debt affecting the estate at the date of the deed whereby the provisions were granted, viz., 16th March 1909, because the duty had not then become payable; and interest on deferred payments only ran from the date when the duty became payable, and, even when running, such interest fell to be added to the duty.¹ There could be no charge by one heir of entail for duty leviable on the succession of another unless that duty had already been paid, and when the present heir succeeded the duty in question here was still unpaid.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) It was impossible to construe the deed of entail as containing any expressed intention to draw a distinction between widows' annuities and children's provisions so far as concerned the deduction of interest on debts, and, accordingly, such interest fell to be deducted in computing free rent for the purpose of provisions to younger children, just as much as in the case of annuities to widows. (2) It was immaterial that the estate-duty was not actually exigible at the date of the granting of the deed of provision, for it had already, in terms of the statute,² become a first charge upon tosk's succession, ought also to be a deduction from the rental on which the younger children's provision is calculated. The reporter thinks that it ought not, because the rental to be taken is that at the date of the deed granting the provision after deduction of annual burdens then affecting the same, and by section 6 (8) of the Finance Act, 1894, the duty was not exigible for a year after Mrs Keith Mackintosh's succession opened, i.e., subsequent to the date of granting the provisions in favour of younger children. I am unable to agree with the reporter. By section 9 (1) of the Finance Act the duty is, in a question with the Crown, made a first charge upon the estate in respect of which it is leviable. It was therefore a statutory burden upon the estate as at the date when the succession to Mrs Keith Mackintosh opened. Such a burden diminishes the annual value of an estate so burdened. The amount of the annual diminution is practically the interest that has to be paid to the heir of entail, his executors or others who pay the duty and get a bond over the estate for the amount. I do not think the circumstance that the Crown postpones the demand for a year entitles the heir in possession to disregard the duty in providing for younger children. Under section 6 (6) of the Finance Act interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum falls to be paid from the date of the death up to the date of the Inland Revenue affidavit or account or the expiration of six months after the death. As pointed out in the late Mr Hanson's work on Death Duties (5th edn.), p. 160, the effect of subsections (6) and (8) of section 6 is to leave an interval of at least six months during which interest is not payable. Apparently, therefore, at the date when the bond of provision was executed interest was running. In calculating the annual rate perhaps some allowance ought to be made for the period in respect of which interest is not exacted; but I doubt if it is sufficient to make an appreciable difference upon the stipulated rate in the bond.

"The last question argued was as to whether the petitioner is entitled to a charge on the estate in respect of the bond or bonds to be granted. Upon this point I agree with the reporter that, in view of the decision in Laurie, 25 R. 636, and the opinions there expressed, the petitioner's claim cannot be allowed."

Mackintosh.

Oct. 29, 1912. Mackintosh v. Mackintosh. the property in respect of which it was due. It accordingly burdened the yearly rents of an entailed estate in the sense of the Aberdeen Act,¹ which supplied a correct analogy for application to the present case. Such a burden constituted the same obligation on the estate as that imposed by a bond for the amount of the duty,² and, as the estate could be charged with such a bond, the interest thereon fell to be deducted.³

At advising on 29th October 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I find it unnecessary to say anything more than he has said in his very careful note. I think that it is obvious that the expression “free rent” must be construed as the Lord Ordinary has construed it, and that in both branches of the case. Upon the second branch of the case—I mean the part of the case which deals with the estate-duty, about which the Lord Ordinary has disagreed with the view that the reporter brought before him—I think the Lord Ordinary is clearly right. I add one remark, because his Lordship has not made it, that this decision is a necessary consequence of the view which will be found expressed in my opinion, which was concurred in by Lord Halsbury, Lord Davey, and Lord Macnaghten, in the case of the Earl of Moray's Trustees.² I think the views I expressed there as to the effect of the Crown charge of estate-duty are right, and the necessary sequitur is that the Lord Ordinary's view in the present case is also right.

Trustees.

On the trustees continuing to administer the fund independently of the Free Church, the latter brought an action to have it declared that the trustees were bound to pay over the income of the trust to them to be administered for any of the purposes for which the provision of £250,000 had been made.

Held that the effect of the Act and of the Order of the Commission had been to alter the administrative powers of the trustees and to render it necessary that the income of the trust should be administered through the Free Church; and declarator granted as craved.

On 13th March 1911 the Free Church of Scotland brought an action against Hugh Martin, S.S.C., and others, the trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Alexander Edward MacKnight, Advocate, for declarator (as amended) "(first) that the defenders, as trustees foresaid, are bound to pay over to the pursuers or their treasurer for the time being, or to such other person as may be authorised by them to receive the same, the whole free annual income of that portion of the means and estate of the said Alexander Edward MacKnight which, under the directions contained in the codicil dated 13th May 1898 to his said trust-disposition and settlement, was appointed to be administered and applied for the promotion of one or other or both of the missions therein described as '(1) the Mission to the Miners of Scotland promoted or being promoted by the Reverend James Hood Wilson of Edinburgh, and (2) the Home Mission in connection with the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland,' for which missions it is declared in the said codicil that the residue is to form 'the capital fund for the same,' being the fund or moneys dealt with by the order of the Commissioners appointed for the purposes of and acting under the Churches (Scotland) Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII. cap. 12), No. 1252, entitled 'Alexander Edward MacKnight's Trust,' and dated 10th day of November 1909, and also referred to in a further order of the said Commissioners of the same date, numbered 1253, entitled 'Provision for support of ministers and itinerant preachers, and for administration and management of the Free Church,' in order that the said income may be by the pursuers or their said treasurer, or other duly authorised representatives, applied for such one or other or more of the purposes specified in the said order of said Commissioners, numbered 1253 (being those enumerated under heads 4 (a) and 4 (b) in the first column of the First Schedule to the Churches (Scotland) Act, 1905), as the pursuers shall from time to time direct; or otherwise (second), that the defenders, as trustees foresaid, are bound themselves to disburse the said income in making such payments for the promotion of the said objects, or one or other or more of them as they may be required to make by the pursuers or those authorised to act on their behalf; and further, and in any event (third) that the defenders, as trustees foresaid, are not entitled, except for one or other of the purposes specified in the said order, No. 1253, to apply the income of the estate foresaid, and in particular that they are not entitled to apply the same in the conduct of missions not forming part of the organised work carried on under the authority of the said the Free Church of Scotland, nor in payment of salaries to missionaries, even though members of the Free Church of Scotland, who are not duly appointed and recognised by the said Church as its agents for the purposes of Home Mission work."

By the codicil to his trust-disposition above referred to the late Mr MacKnight provided:—"I direct my trustees after payment of all debts annuities legacies and expenses and the laying aside of the above sum of two hundred pounds for deserving families or persons as above provided to expend the free annual income of my estate in manner aftermentioned for the promotion of one or other or both of the following missions the residue of my estate to form a capital fund for the same, viz., (1) The Mission to the Miners of Scotland promoted or being promoted by the Reverend Dr James Hood Wilson of Edinburgh and (2) The Home Mission in connection with the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland but not with the Established Church of Scotland which will be ultimately abolished such Church holding the Westminster Confession of Faith and standards declaring that should it depart from the said Confession and standards or adopt the false principle of abstinence and tamper with the administration of the Lord's Supper such grant from my estate shall cease and determine and in that event my trustees shall pay the free annual income of my estate to such religious or charitable purposes as they may think proper: Declaring that it shall be in the power of my trustees to engage Free Church missionaries or in their discretion other workers including laymen and lady missionaries or workers being members of the Free Church in the promotion of the above missions or either of them in such way as they may think proper either through the Church or independently of it such missionaries or other workers receiving suitable remuneration, or my trustees may should it be deemed by them more expedient pay over the free annual income of my estate to the respective treasurers of said missions or one or other of them to be applied to the purposes foresaid: Declaring further that should the said Mission to the Miners of Scotland be now or become non-existent the whole of said income shall be applied to the promotion of the said Home Mission."

The pursuers averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 4) "The defender, Hugh Martin, having made up title to and entered upon the management of Mr MacKnight's estate as trustee, and having implemented the purposes of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicils, so far as capable of immediate implement, found it necessary, on 1st March 1900, to raise an action of multiplepounding for the determination of certain questions. . . ." (Cond. 6) "On 4th April 1901 an interlocutor was issued by the Honourable Lord Low, Ordinary, in which he decided that the Home Mission in connection with the 'Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland' fell to be interpreted as meaning the Home Mission of the Free Church of Scotland, and that by the expression the 'Mission to the Miners of Scotland' was meant the Miners' Mission then carried on by the Free Church of Scotland as a branch of its said Home Mission and under the charge of its Home Mission Committee." (Cond. 7) "After the formation of the United Free Church of Scotland on 31st October 1900, the fund under Mr MacKnight's trust-disposition and settlement was for some time administered by his trustee in promoting the objects of a Miners'

Mission carried on in various places in Scotland under the charge of Oct. 26, 1912. the Home Mission Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland. By judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun and Others (7 F. (H. L.) 1, [1904] A. C. 515) ^{Free Church of Scotland v. MacKnight's Trustees.} as subsequently applied by the Court of Session, it was, inter alia, found and declared that the Free Church of Scotland, the present pursuers, are and lawfully represent the Free Church of Scotland; and the said Free Church of Scotland was held entitled to have applied for its behoof all property held for behoof of that Church." (Cond. 8) "By the Churches (Scotland) Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII. cap. 12) provision was made for the appointment of a Commission to allocate between the Free Church and the United Free Church all 'property in question,' as defined by the said Act, in such manner as should appear to the Commission fair and equitable, having regard to the circumstances of the case, but subject to the provisions of the Act. . . ." (Cond. 9) "By section 1, subsection (3), of said Act it was further provided that 'The Commission in making their allocation of property under this Act shall, having regard to congregational contributions and other income of the Free Church, make adequate provision . . . for the support of the ministers of Free Church congregations to which congregational property has been allocated under this Act, for itinerant preachers, and for the general purposes of administration and management of that Church. The funds and property out of which provision may be made for each of the above-mentioned objects shall be those set out in the second column of the First Schedule to this Act, opposite the description of the object in the first column of that Schedule.' In the first column of the said First Schedule, item 4 is in the following terms:—'(a) Support of ministers of Free Church congregations to which congregational property has been allocated under this Act and of itinerant preachers. (b) General purposes of administration and management of the Free Church'; and the corresponding entry in the second column of said Schedule showing the funds and property out of which provision for these objects falls to be made is in the following terms:—'(4) Sustentation Fund; Home Missions Fund; Highlands and Islands Fund; any moneys which the Commission regard as applicable for these or similar purposes. . . ." (Cond. 10) "By Allocation Order No. 1252, dated 10th November 1909, and bearing to relate to 'Alexander Edward MacKnight's Trust,' the Commissioners appointed by his late Majesty King Edward under the said Act . . . did thereby make an allocation in the following terms:—'Therefore the Commissioners acting under the Churches (Scotland) Act, 1905, hereby allocate as from and after the thirtieth day of October Nineteen hundred, to the Free Church of Scotland and the Home Mission Committee of that Church the whole rights and interests which the Free Church of Scotland (otherwise the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland), or the Home Mission Committee of that Church had at that date in the trust-estate of the said Alexander Edward MacKnight under his said codicil, dated 13th May 1898, and hereinbefore partly quoted: Declaring that the allocation hereinbefore contained shall to the extent of

In this order the Commissioners did, inter alia, 'allocate to the Free Church of Scotland and the general trustees thereof, the following sums, viz., . . . (Second) the sum of £220,664, 10s. 1d. to meet pro tanto the provision of £250,000 hereinafter referred to, and which sum of £220,664, 10s. 1d. along with the further sums amounting to £29,325, 9s. 11d. specified in the schedule hereto annexed and to be allocated by the orders therein referred to make up a total of £250,000, being the amount of capital fixed by the Commissioners as a provision for the support of the ministers of Free Church congregations to which congregational property has been allocated under the said Act, for itinerant preachers, and for the general purposes of administration and management of the Free Church.' In the schedule referred to in the said order occurs an entry of the order referred to in the preceding article 'No. 1252 Alexander Edward MacKnight's Trust,' as allocating wholly to the Free Church the trust fund amounting to £9340, 11s. 5d. for the purposes specified in the order to which the said Schedule was appended, viz., Order No. 1253. As at, and for some time prior to the date of Oct. 26, 1912. the said allocation orders, the Miners' Mission in question had ceased to be carried on as a separate mission in connection with the Free Church and had thereby become, in the sense of Mr MacKnight's codicil, 'Non-existent'; and, in accordance with the further provisions of the codicil, the whole of the income had become 'applicable to the promotion of the said Home Mission.' . . ." (Cond. 13) "Notwithstanding the said allocation orders, the defenders, as trustees of the said Alexander Edward MacKnight, have continued to administer the fund constituting the said bequest, and they claim right to do so. The pursuers, at an early stage, requested the trustees to meet a deputation representing them, with a view of coming to some arrangement whereby, while not excluding the defenders from the actual administration of the trust, the income of the funds might be effectually applied towards the support of ministers and itinerant preachers, and for the expenses of administration and management of the Free Church, in terms of the orders; but the defenders declined to have such a meeting. . . ." (Cond. 14) "The pursuers have so far received no benefit whatever for the purposes specified in the order from the application of the income of the fund in question by the defenders. The income has been applied by them in connection with a mission in Bathgate, which is the centre of a mining district. Said mission is not in any sense a Free Church Mission. It is not under the control of or in connection with the Free Church, although it is believed that the defenders have, since the date of the said allocation order, employed as a missionary in their service a missionary who, being originally a member of the United Free Church, became sometime after the judgment of the House of Lords a member and probationer of the Free Church. As such he has occasionally been employed to furnish temporary pulpit supply by the Church, being paid the usual fee for this. He is not, however, either a minister or an itinerant preacher of the Church. This employment at Bathgate has never been sanctioned by the Church, and the payment of a salary to him by the trustees who employ him is not an application of the bequest in terms of the allocation orders. The pursuers have no mission in Bathgate, and their Church has no following there."

The defenders admitted the averments quoted above, with some explanations, and referred to section 2 (5) of the Act, whereby it is sioners approved of a scheme in the following terms for providing the sum of £66,000 hereinbefore referred to, which was to be secured from 'Certain Special Funds,' viz:—

provided that the orders or proceedings of the commission "shall not prejudice or affect any rights, duties, and liabilities as regards any property in question as defined by this Act other than those of the Free Church and the United Free Church." They also averred:— (Ans. 14) "Denied that the pursuers have not received the full benefit contemplated in their favour under said orders, in so far as Mr MacKnight's trust is concerned. Admitted that the trustees have been carrying on a mission in Bathgate which is a mining centre. Explained that said mission has been carried on in terms of the trust purposes. Since the beginning of the year 1905, the date at which they commenced missionary work in terms of said bequest, the trustees have promoted Home Mission work and employed Free Church workers. The missionary, the Rev. J. Hood Wilson Macleod, who entered on his duties as missionary in January 1905, and who has carried on the mission work, became a licensed probationer of the Free Church of Scotland in the year 1890. He is an ordained preacher of the Free Church of Scotland and has ever since he entered on his said duties as missionary been a member of that Church. . . . The mission at Bathgate has been carried on in accordance with the doctrines and observances of the Free Church of Scotland."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The fund in question having been by virtue of the Churches (Scotland) Act, 1905, and the allocation orders of the Commissioners under said Act founded upon, affected with a statutory trust for the purposes enumerated under the fourth head in the first column of the First Schedule to said Act, and being now applicable thereto, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of one or other of the first two declaratory conclusions. (2) In any event, the pursuers are entitled in virtue of the said orders of allocation to decree in the terms of the last declaratory conclusion.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuers being irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (2) The averments of the pursuers being in so far as material unfounded in fact the defenders should be assilized. (3) On a sound construction of Mr MacKnight's will, and of the statute and orders founded on by the pursuers, the defenders are entitled to apply the trust revenue at their own hand, and in their own discretion, for the purposes specified by the testator. (4) The defenders having administered said bequest in accordance with the said trust purposes, and in terms of law, they should be assilized from the whole conclusions of the action.

The documents lodged in process by the parties included, inter alia, correspondence between the agents of the defenders and the secretary of the Churches (Scotland) Act Commission with reference to the allocation by the Commission affecting Mr MacKnight's trust. On 13th February 1909 the agents wrote to the secretary as follows:—"We observe in Thursday's newspapers that, amongst the funds which your Commissioners have allocated to the Free Church, there is stated 'A. E. MacKnight's Trust, £9340, 11s. 5d.' We would point out that, as mentioned to you before, there is no gift of the residue of the estate to the Free Church or to the missions, the trustees being directed to hold the same in trust and to expend the free annual income as directed in the truster's settlement. Looking to the fact that there is no gift at all to the Church, and that the income from residue is being administered by the trustees independently of the Church in virtue of the powers conferred upon them by the truster, Oct. 26, 1912. we cannot understand why the Commissioners have taken it upon themselves to make any allocation in reference to this trust. We shall, therefore, be glad to hear from you on what grounds the Commissioners claim to allocate the above, which, as we stated before, seems to us not to be a subject within the powers of the Commissioners to allocate as nothing was bequeathed to the Church." In reply the secretary of the Commission wrote as follows, on 16th February 1909:—"I duly received your letter of 13th inst., and in reply have to point out that my Commissioners' allocation affecting this trust will operate merely to identify the Church referred to in the late Mr MacKnight's settlement as being the Free Church and not the United Free Church."

Free Church
of Scotland v.
MacKnight's
Trustees.

On 6th December 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) sustained the fourth plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the facts his Lordship proceeded]—The pursuers maintain that the effect of these orders is to sweep the bequest from Mr MacKnight's estate into the general Church funds, so that it is no longer exclusively available for the purpose for which Mr MacKnight intended it, but may now be used for any of the specified purposes, viz., either for the support of ministers or itinerant preachers or for general purposes of administration and management, and accordingly that the defenders have no longer the right to administer the trust fund independently of the Church, as they have hitherto done; that they have been deprived of their discretion, and that it is now for the Church to decide how the money should be applied; and they conclude for declarator (1) that the defenders are bound to pay over to the pursuers or their treasurer the whole free annual income of the residue of Mr MacKnight's estate; or (2) that the defenders are bound to dispense the said income among the objects referred to in the said allocation order in such manner as the pursuers may direct; and (3), and in any event, that the defenders are not entitled to pay missionaries who are not duly appointed and recognised by the Church as its agents for the purposes of Home Mission work.

"It may be true, as the pursuers say, that the Church can administer the funds quite as efficiently and perhaps more economically without the assistance or interference of the defenders, but that is not the point. The question, and I think the only question, is whether the allocation orders have deprived the defenders of the discretion which Mr MacKnight reposed in them. I am of opinion that they have not.

"By Order No. 1252 the Commissioners allocate the 'whole rights and interests' which the Free Church had in Mr MacKnight's estate at 30th October 1900. And the codicil sets forth what these rights and interests were. The trustees are directed to 'expend the free annual income' of the residue of the estate in manner aftermentioned for the promotion of the said missions, and the manner in which it is to be expended is left absolutely to the discretion of his trustees: ' . . . It shall be in the power of my trustees to engage Free Church missionaries or, in their discretion, other workers including laymen and lady missionaries or workers . . . in such a way as they may think proper either through the Church or independently of it, such missionaries or other workers receiving suitable remuneration, or my trustees may, should it be deemed by them more expedient, pay over the free annual income of my estate to the respective treasurers.' Mr MacKnight desired to benefit Free Church Missions, but he did not give the Free Church control of the fund, he did not even think it prudent to permit the Church to have control of the income. He seems to have had more confidence in his trustees than in those who

of Scotland v.
MacKnight's
Trustees.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Cullen), on 24th and 25th October 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The beneficial interest in Mr MacKnight's trust, which had been allocated by the Churches Commission was undoubtedly "property in question" under the Churches (Scotland) Act,¹ and as it was destined to Home Missions, it was available for any of the purposes described in head 4 in the first column of the First Schedule to the Act. To this extent the trust purposes had been enlarged by the operation of the Act and the orders of the Commission, which fell to be read "as if enacted" in the Act.² The trust funds here, however, had really been diverted, not so much by the order of the Commissioners, as by the provisions of the Act itself, because the Act made the truster's codicil operate in favour of the purposes specified in the Schedule opposite the description of "Home Missions Fund." Accordingly, the Act placed it within the powers of the defenders to "pay over the annual income" in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, and the pursuers were entitled to force them to do so, as that was the only way in which the orders could receive due effect. In any event, the attitude of the defenders, as disclosed in their agents' letters on the subject of the Commissioners' allocation, entitled the pursuers to declarator in terms of the second or third conclusion of the summons. Section 2 (5) of the Act and the saving clause in the order of the Commissioners were to be read only as preserving the rights of third parties, if any, such as liferenters. It was a necessary consequence of the legislation dealing with these funds that the defenders should be deprived of their full administrative powers. If the annual income continued to be administered by them at their discretion, the allocation by the managed the affairs of the Church. This may have been because he thought it possible that the Church might 'depart from the Confession of Faith, or adopt the false principles of abstinence.' But in any case he made it abundantly clear that he wished his trustees to administer his bounty, and he accordingly circumscribed and limited his bequest to the Church. All he gave was the right to have the annual income from his estate applied in the promotion of Church work at the discretion of the defenders, and it is this limited 'right and interest' which is allocated by Order No. 1252, and it is this limited 'right and interest' also which is declared by Order 1253 to form part of the fund of £250,000 which may be used for support of ministers, itinerant preachers, or general Church purposes. If the Commissioners had intended to extinguish the defenders' right to exercise their discretion in the manner in which the bequest should be applied, I think they would have said so in express words, or at all events it would have been clear by necessary implication that such was their intention. But I can find nothing to suggest this in either order. On the contrary, it is specially provided that 'Nothing in this order shall prejudice or affect any rights, duties, and liabilities as regards the property hereby allocated other than those of the Free Church and the United Free Church.' Now, it is both the right and the duty of the defenders under the codicil to use their discretion as to the manner in which they shall apply the income from the trust fund, and to act independently of the Church if they think proper. They have decided to act independently, and I do not think that the pursuers can interfere with them, and I accordingly sustain their fourth plea in law and assolve them from the conclusions of the summons."

Churches Commission of £250,000, in terms of Order No. 1253, would be defeated quoad the sum of £9340, being the capital value of that income, because to that extent the allocation would be illusory. Apart from all other considerations, the pursuers were entitled at common law to be relieved of the management by a trust of the income to the benefit of which they were entitled, seeing that such management had become cumbrous, unnecessary, and expensive.¹

Free Church
of Scotland v.
MacKnight's
Trustees.

Argued for the respondents ;—It was the duty of the defenders to exercise the discretion conferred upon them by the truster in administering the income in question for the mission selected by him, and their duty was not affected by the Churches Act or the orders of the Churches Commission. The intention of the Act was that the orders of the Commission should be limited in their operation to discrimination between the Free Church and the United Free Church, and the allocation here in question had been made with that object only in view, as was clear from the letter of the Commissioners' secretary to the agents of the trust. Very direct provision would have been necessary in the Act to warrant interference with the rights and duties of third parties, and so far from there being any such provision these rights and duties were expressly safeguarded.² That the preservation of existing trusts was intended by the Act was clear from the language of the preamble in referring to the inability of the Free Church to carry out all the trusts affecting the property, and the orders of the Commission were consistent with that expressed intention. The orders now before the Court were to be read as having allocated, for purposes described under head 4 of the first column of the Schedule funds set out under that head in the second column which the Commissioners considered applicable by reason of trusts, if any, affecting them. Thus, in allocating to the Free Church the beneficial interest in the trust administered by the defenders, the Commissioners, having held that interest to be "Property in Question" under the Act, were to be understood as having so allocated with a view to preservation of the trust. In exercising the discretion conferred upon them by the truster the defenders could only pay over the annual income of the trust funds to the Free Church for the purposes of the trust. Therefore it could not be paid over in terms of the first conclusion of the summons, because it would thereby be made available, as indeed was maintained by the pursuers, for purposes outwith the trust, viz., any of the purposes described in the first column of the Schedule. For the same reasons decree could not be granted in terms of the second or third conclusion. There was no ground at common law for depriving the defenders of the rights conferred and duties imposed upon them by the truster, whereby he had attached limitations to his gift to the Free Church in giving his trustees power to act independently of the Church. The beneficial interest allocated by Order No. 1252 was to be regarded as so allocated subject to these limitations, and it would be inconsistent with the orders pronounced by the Commission in knowledge of the terms of the trust to construe the orders as making the benefit to be taken available for purposes other than those of the trust, particularly as it was expressly provided that that benefit was enjoyable subject to a forfeiture. It was not suggested that Home Mission work had ceased to be part of the work of the

Oct. 26, 1912. Free Church, and it might be said to be embraced in each of the purposes described in the fourth head of the Schedule. Therefore the defenders were carrying out the trust for the benefit of the Free Church wherever they paid a Free Church missionary. The trustees were quite willing to consider the application of the funds to districts other than that of Bathgate, though they were bound to exercise their discretion as to where the work was to be done.

Free Church
of Scotland v.
MacKnight's
Trustees.

At advising on 26th October 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Mr MacKnight, advocate, left a trust-disposition and settlement in which, with regard to the residue of his estate, he directed his trustees to expend the free annual income thereof for the promotion “of one or other or both of the following missions.” I leave out the first mission, because it has disappeared. The second mission was the Home Mission in connection with the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland. There was a multiplepointing at the instance of Mr MacKnight's trustees, in which it was held that the Free Presbyterian Church was the body more correctly known as the Free Church of Scotland. This was at a time when the question which all of us know so much about was only just mooted. The question between the Free Church, as it is now known, and the United Free Church, as it is now known, took, as all of us are well aware, some years to decide. After being decided in the House of Lords, it was followed by the Churches (Scotland) Act of 1905.

The Churches (Scotland) Act of 1905 established a Commission, and by section 1 the Commission is directed to allocate between the Free Church and the United Free Church the property in question as defined by the Act. The definition of property in question is given in section 4 (1), and is “All property which,” on a certain date, “was vested in or held by or in trust for, or was payable to or for behoof of, the Free Church, or was held for the purposes of any school, scheme, mission, or other special object of the said Church.” Indubitably the Home Mission was a mission of the Free Church, and therefore it was held by the Commission—and I think rightly held—that Mr MacKnight's trust funds fell within the definition of “property in question,” and that therefore it became the duty of the Commissioners in terms of section 1 to allocate these funds between the Free Church and the United Free Church.

Now, by subsection (3) of section 1 the Commission, in making their allocation, are directed to make an adequate provision for the Free Church—I am reading the section shortly. The scheme of the statute was that, inasmuch as the Free Church was held by the decision of the House of Lords to be the Church which had what I may call the legal right to continuity with the old Church, and also as it was very much the smaller body, provision should be made to them out of the funds before the balance was given to the United Free Church. Then the section goes on to say the funds or property out of which provision may be made for objects mentioned shall be those set out in the second column of the First Schedule of the Act opposite the description of the object in the first column of that Schedule. Turning now to the First Schedule, one finds in the second column, heading 4, “Sustentation Fund; Home Missions Fund; Highlands and Islands Fund; any moneys which the Commission regard as applicable for these or similar purposes." That is a category of the different classes of funds out of which, inter alia, the Commission were to make the provision. Oct. 26, 1912.

The next question is therefore, Did Mr MacKnight's trust, being part of the property in question, fall within this heading 4? Clearly, again, I think it did, because, although it is not in terms a Home Mission fund, it is money which the Commission regarded as applicable to that purpose. The Commission are made judges of that; and therefore I have no doubt that they quite rightly dealt with Mr MacKnight's fund under this head. The provision, as the Act of Parliament says, is to be to the objects in the first column opposite this heading. Now the heading 4 in the first column (that is, opposite heading 4 in the second) is "(a) Support of ministers of Free Church congregations to which congregational property has been allocated under this Act and of itinerant preachers. (b) General purposes of administration and management of the Free Church."

Free Church
of Scotland v.
MacKnight's
Trustees.
Ld. President.

Accordingly, the Commission, upon 10th November 1909, made an order in connection with Mr MacKnight's trust, wherein they set forth, after reciting their powers, the following allocation: They "hereby allocate, as from and after" a certain date, "to the Free Church of Scotland, and the Home Mission Committee of that Church, the whole rights and interests which the Free Church of Scotland . . . or the Home Mission Committee of that Church had at that date in the trust-estate of the said Alexander Edward MacKnight." They estimate that interest as of the capital value of £9000 odds, and it is to form an aliquot part of a sum of £250,000 which they are allocating under this head by a further order. A further order was pronounced which set out categorically the whole sum which they dealt with under this provision of Schedule I., heading 4. I need not call attention to it, because various sums are dealt with. It is enough to say that in the £250,000 Mr MacKnight's trust enters in computo for the £9000 odds.

Now, there was also in Mr MacKnight's settlement a sentence which I have not read, which provided that if the Church in the future deviated from what he considered correct doctrine and practice in the matter of the Holy Communion, they should forfeit the legacy. And inasmuch as there is a saving clause in very ample terms in the Act in section 2 (5), which provides that the orders or proceedings of the Commission "shall not prejudice or affect any rights, duties, and liabilities as regards any property in question as defined by this Act other than those of the Free Church and the United Free Church," the Commission did not attempt to transfer the capital sum away from the trustees. The trustees are still bound to hold the capital sum in order to make good this forfeiture if the occasion for it should ever arise.

What has happened is this. The trustees have not handed over the income to the present Free Church in order to allow them to spend it on the purposes mentioned in the Act of Parliament, but they have at their own hands instituted and continued a mission, of the character of a Home Mission, in the town of Bathgate, using for their missionary a Free Church preacher. The Free Church are anxious that the money should be transferred to them, and they allege two reasons for that. They say, in the first place, it is much more economical that there should not be separate

Oct. 26, 1912. administration of money; and they say, secondly, that it does not fit in with their schemes that there should be a mission in Bathgate. They say there are not many adherents of the Free Church in Bathgate, and that the mission which is held in Bathgate can in no sense be said to be a mission in connection with their Church.

Free Church
of Scotland v.
MacKnight's
Trustees.

Ld. President.

The reason that the trustees have been in any way able to do this at all is that, after the provision of the trust-deed dealing with the application of the residue, which I have already read, there is added a declaration to this effect: "Declaring that it shall be in the power of my trustees to engage Free Church missionaries or in their discretion other workers including laymen and lady missionaries or workers being members of the Free Church in the promotion of the above missions or either of them in such way as they may think proper either through the Church or independently of it." So that, as the trust stood originally, there is no question that the action of the trustees would have been well within their powers. I feel quite sure that the action of the trustees is not based upon any antagonism to the Free Church, but is in the exercise, according to the best of their abilities, of the discretion which was conferred upon them by the truster, and the exercise of which, for reasons which commend themselves to their minds and with which I have nothing to do, has led them to take the step that they have taken.

The question that is raised in this case, however, is whether their position is really now in accordance with what may be called the law of the case, and accordingly this action has been brought to try that question. It is an action of declarator at the instance of the Free Church asking that, as the first conclusion, the yearly proceeds of the trust funds should be handed to them in order that they may be enabled to apply these proceeds for the purposes for which the sums were allocated to them under the order—in terms, in other words, of the fourth head of the first column of the First Schedule.

I am of opinion that they are entitled to have their demand granted. The steps by which I reach that conclusion are really very simple. First of all, I think that one has to consider whether the fund in question fall within the powers of the Commission at all. If it did not, the whole matter would be ultra vires; and I take it that this Court, although under the Act and the section which I have already partly read we cannot interfere with the orders of the Commission, would naturally be able to check any ultra vires action. But my judgment upon that point is that it was not ultra vires, and I have already, by way of recital, said why. I think there is no question that this fund falls within the definition of "property in question."

The next step is, Does it fall within the enumeration in column two of the First Schedule as to which what may be called special statutory directions are given? There again I have given my reason in my recital. I think it does, because, although it is not actually a Home Mission fund, it is money which the Commission have regarded as applicable to that purpose. I do not think that we can interfere with the Commission there. I think the Commission are the judges of that. But if I may be allowed respectfully to say so, I think the Commission were clearly right, because, although not actually part of a Home Mission fund, it is certainly for the purposes of a Home Mission and, therefore, under the terms of the Act of Parliament it was applicable for that or a similar purpose.

If that is so, the next step is one in which the Commission cannot help themselves. They have got to do what the Act of Parliament tells them—that is to say, if, out of this class of funds, they take this particular item which was entirely in their hands—and they have taken it—then the use to which that item is put really does not depend upon them or their order, but it depends upon the Act of Parliament; and the use to which it is to be put is the use which we find in the first column of the Schedule under head 4 thereof. Of course, they need not have touched Mr MacKnight's fund at all. If they had liked they could have made up the £250,000 out of other sums, because nobody supposes that the £250,000 exactly and precisely exhausts to a penny the funds of the category in the fourth heading of the First Schedule; but as they did touch it, and they were entitled to touch it, then the way in which they operated upon it really did not lie in their hands but was determined by Act of Parliament.

Accordingly, I hold that their proceedings being regular and intra vires, this fund of Mr MacKnight's is, by force of Act of Parliament, allocated to the Free Church for the support of ministers, of itinerant preachers, and for the general purposes of administration and management of the Free Church. Now, no doubt, that is to a certain extent an alteration of the trust purposes. That was inevitable. The trust purpose as it existed in all these trusts could not remain intact; for, after all, these trusts are constituted in favour of a Free Church. I think it is only the French Republic that was one and indivisible. The Free Church has shown that it was not indivisible, in one sense. Parliament had to deal with the new state of affairs where, although by law the continuity of the body was held to go on in what is now known as the Free Church, still there was the very large body known as the United Free Church, in which were the majority of the people who had been in the Free Church before the amalgamation with the United Presbyterian Church had been made. Parliament held that it was expedient in the interests of the kingdom that an allocation of property should be made between these two. So that, although it is true, as was argued for the defenders, that this is an alteration of the trust purposes, it is just one of those things that cannot be helped, and the alteration is effected by an Act of Parliament and therefore binds us.

But what of the discretionary power conferred upon the trustees? My answer to that is that the discretionary power is not, in one sense, superseded; it would be more accurate to say that it is inapplicable to present circumstances, for, although there could be independent action at the time when Mr MacKnight made his trust, there cannot be independent action now in the case of money which is allocated by Act of Parliament for a particular thing which must be done by the Church itself. Support of ministers of Free Church congregations of course must mean support of ministers through the Church. It does not mean that the Commissioners were to say that Mr A. B. was to have a stipend of £100 or £200, or whatever it may be; it is support through the Church. The itinerant preachers must be appointed through the Church, and the general purposes of admini-

Free Church
of Scotland v.
MacKnight's

Ld. President.

Accordingly, I think that the saving clause in the Act has really no application. The saving clause saves people who are outside. But this question is not outside; it is inside. It is not a question of what rights these trustees have which may possibly be contrary and antagonistic to the rights of the Church. That class of right is evidenced, for instance, by the forfeiture clause which survives and is still saved to them; but this right is an administrative right in connection with the trust purposes. It was an administrative right which was workable in connection with the old trust purposes. It is an administrative right which is not workable, in my judgment, in connection with the new trust purposes, which are the Parliamentary purposes, and supersede the old.

Upon the whole matter I come to the conclusion that the Free Church here is entitled to the declarator which it seeks under the first head. As to expenses, I think the trustees here have acted in perfectly good faith. It was quite a fair question to try, and I think parties ought to get their expenses out of the income.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I agree. The litigation which determined the rights of the Free Church and of the United Free Church of Scotland was concluded in 1904, and immediately thereafter a Royal Commission, which was appointed to inquire, reported that the Free Church could not adequately carry out all the trusts or administer all the property which the result of the judgment in the original action left in their hands. The Commission recommended that provision should be made for the allocation of that property, with this important rider, that provision should be made thereout for the equipment of the Free Church. I think it is essential and necessary to have regard to that word "equipment" in considering the meaning and effect of the Act which followed in the year 1905, and which provided for the allocation which the preamble of it indicates is desirable.

The property, roughly speaking, consisted of two different kinds. There were heritable subjects, consisting of churches, manse, schools, &c.; and there were income-producing funds—some of them in the hands of the Church itself, or, rather, of general trustees for the Church, and some of them in the hands of private trustees, but devoted notwithstanding to the purposes of the Church. I think that, dealing, as we are dealing here, with the second class of the second kind of assets, it must be perfectly apparent that Parliament approached this subject knowing that necessarily, if there was to be a practical allocation between the two Churches, it was impossible that the purposes of standing trusts should not require, to a certain extent, to be interfered with. The bare trust might remain, and yet to carry out the object of the statute it might be absolutely necessary to abrogate certain of the trust purposes or of the trust directions. I think it is also perfectly clear that in carrying out the object of the statute, to a certain extent the application of a broad axe was necessary. But Parliament did not apply the broad axe itself; they put it into commission for the purpose of doing that which the preamble set forth.

There are two provisions contained in the statute which I would refer to, Oct. 26, 1912. one of which your Lordship has referred to, but the other is of equal importance. In section 2 (1) it is said that any such orders of the Commission—referring to the orders necessary for giving effect to allocation—"shall have effect as if enacted in this Act." Accordingly the orders of the Commission come by force of the statute to have themselves the force of statute. It is also said, section 2 (5), as your Lordship has pointed out, that no Court shall have power to review or interfere with the orders or other proceedings of the Commissioners.

Free Church
of Scotland v.
MacKnight's
Trustees.

Ld. Johnston.

Now, acting under this statute, the Commissioners have allocated, for certain of the purposes for which they were directed under the statute to provide, the funds under Mr MacKnight's trust. In doing so they have acted with the greatest discrimination. They have observed that these funds were held under an irritancy, and that it might so happen that they became forfeit; and accordingly they have not taken the fund itself and transferred it to, or even left it to be held simply in trust for, the Free Church. But they have very carefully worded their order so as to deal only with the interest of the Free Church in the fund. They have therefore left standing what I referred to as a bare trust in the trustees, but they have left the real interest of the Free Church to be held for the Free Church, but for the statutory purposes. And that real interest was in the income of the fund, subject, as I have said, to an irritancy.

I concur, therefore, in the judgment which your Lordship proposes.

LORD CULLEN.—I agree. Mr MacKnight devoted the income of this fund to the promotion of the Home Mission of the Free Church of Scotland, and he gave to his trustees an administrative power to expend the money themselves in Home Mission work as an alternative to paying it into the Home Mission Fund. The trustees have so far exercised this power. But now that the income has been appropriated by the allocation orders to the purposes mentioned under heads 4 (a) and 4 (b) of the first column of the First Schedule of the Act of 1905, it seems clear that this discretionary power given to the trustees of expending the money themselves on Home Mission work is inapplicable and is necessarily displaced, and that the pursuers are entitled to have the income applied in the manner formulated in the first conclusion of the summons as now amended.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—

"Allow the pursuers to amend the first conclusion of the summons as proposed at the bar, and the same having been done, of new close the record, recall the said interlocutor [of 6th December 1911]: Find and declare in terms of the first conclusion as thus amended: Quoad ultra find it unnecessary to deal with the other conclusions, and decern: Find both parties entitled to expenses out of the income of the trust funds in the hands of the defenders, and remit," &c.

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, enacts:—Sec. 11. "Every person who intends to form or lay out any new street . . . shall present a petition for warrant to do so to the town-council. . . . The Dean of Guild shall not grant warrant for the erection of any buildings abutting on any new street until warrant for the formation of such street has been granted."

Held that a proprietor in a burgh who proposed to build upon his own property a block of three-storey tenements, fronting upon and having access to a public footpath or esplanade lying without the boundary of his property, did not thereby propose to form the public footpath into a new street in the sense of the Burgh Police Act; and, accordingly, that the Dean of Guild was not justified in refusing his sanction to the proposed buildings until warrant for the formation of a new street had been obtained.

1st DIVISION.
Dean of Guild Court, Dunoon.

IN July 1910 Walter Mason junior, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court, Dunoon, for warrant to erect certain buildings.

The petitioner was proprietor of a piece of ground in Dunoon, being a feu on the estate of Milton, bounded on the north by Clyde Street, one of the main streets of Dunoon, on the east by a side street, known as Jane Street, leading from Clyde Street down to the seashore at the West Bay, and on the south by a footpath or thoroughfare known as the "Esplanade" or "Baugie Place," which lay between the southern boundary of the petitioner's property and the seashore of the West Bay, and on the west by the property of another feu. This site was occupied by a villa and garden, the villa having its main access from Clyde Street, the garden stretching to the south between the villa and the Esplanade, and having access to the latter by a door. The petitioner proposed to pull down the villa and to erect upon this site a set of three-storey tenements, forming three sides of a square, occupying the whole length of the north, east, and south boundaries of his feu, and fronting upon and having access from each of the three respective bounding thoroughfares already mentioned.

Various objections to the petition were lodged for William Rodger, Master of Works of the burgh of Dunoon, for Robert Paterson, C.A., Glasgow, another feu on the Milton estate, and for the trustees of the late Mr Moir of Milton.

The nature of the objection which is the subject of this report appears from the following statements made by the Master of Works, and answers thereto by the petitioner:—(Stat. 2) "The exact position of Baugie Place, described in petitioner's title as his south boundary, is not precisely known to the objector, but the present path along the West Bay of Dunoon is not a street within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 to 1903." (Stat. 3) "The said path is admitted to be a public passage for foot-passengers, but not for any other form of traffic, and it is or forms part of a bank created by the tides and the silt of the Balgie Burn between the old bed of the burn and the sea. This bank is the only protection against the sea for the garden grounds belonging to petitioner and other proprietors in the West Bay. It consists of shingle and gravel, and was artificially strengthened some time ago in parts by wooden piles and by stones, and ultimately by a low concrete wall on the sea front to prevent encroachment of the sea and destruction of boundary walls by storm. The surface has been covered with tar-macadam to make it more comfortable for people to walk on, but in winter it is often covered with shingle and wreck, and boat hirers haul their boats on to it during storms or high tides." (Stat. 4) "The said passage has never been taken over or maintained by the Commissioners of Police or the Town-Council of the burgh as the road authority. The original strengthening was done by the owners of feus abutting on the shore. A further improvement was made by public subscription. In 1891 the then Town-Council approached the proprietors of houses fronting the West Bay with reference to constructing a new street along the said bank, but were unable to come to any agreement, and the matter dropped. The tar-macadam surface was afterwards laid by the Town-Council, and paid for from the general improvement rate of the burgh. Petitioner's answers to statements 2, 3, and 4 are denied so far as inconsistent therewith." (Ans. 2, 3, and 4) "Admitted that the petitioner's property is bounded on the south by a public thoroughfare or passage, 15 feet 10 inches or thereby in width, known as the Esplanade, which has been for a large number of years paved and maintained, lighted, and cleansed by the Town-Council out of the burgh rates. The Town-Council have a notice on said Esplanade prohibiting vehicular traffic thereon. Said Esplanade is a street within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 to 1903. Quoad ultra not known and not admitted." (Stat. 5) "The petitioner proposes to treat the said bank as a street, but he has not applied to the Town-Council in terms of section 11 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903,* for warrant to form or lay out this new street, or to widen, extend, or otherwise alter the present path." (Ans. 5) "Admitted, and explained that the petitioner is under no obligation to apply to the Town-Council for the warrant specified, as the said Esplanade is not a new street within the meaning of the Acts specified, nor does he intend to form, lay out, widen, extend, or otherwise alter the same."

The objector the Master of Works pleaded, inter alia ;—1. (1) The petitioner, not having obtained authority from the Town-Council to make a new street along the West Bay of Dunoon, is not entitled to warrant for the erection of any buildings fronting or abutting thereon until warrant for the formation of such street has been granted. (2) Alternatively, petitioner not having obtained permission from the Town-Council to widen, extend, or otherwise alter the passage or path along the West Bay, is not entitled to erect buildings until the

The Dean of Guild Court shall not grant warrant for the erection of any buildings abutting on any new street until warrant for the formation of such street has been granted."

Mason v.
Rodger.

On 11th April 1911 the Dean of Guild Court pronounced an interlocutor finding:—“(1) That the general question of the loss of amenity is not one which the Dean of Guild Court can take cognisance of; (2) that the petitioner's property is, according to his title, bounded on the east by Jane Street and on the south by the walk or road called Baugie Place; (3) that Jane Street is a public street within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 to 1903, and that it extends from Hillfoot Street to the public thoroughfare or passage along the West Bay; (4) that the building proposed to be erected by the petitioner in Jane Street has not immediately adjoining it on the further side of the building from that fronting the said street on which it abuts an open space for light and ventilation equal in breadth at the narrowest part to the height of the building; (5) that the public passage, footpath, or Esplanade which runs along the foreshore of the West Bay and now forms the southern boundary of the petitioner's feu is not a street within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 to 1903; (6) that the buildings proposed to be erected by the petitioner along the said south boundary of his property will convert the said existing public passage into a new street; (7) that the Dean of Guild Court cannot grant warrant for the erection of any buildings abutting on a new street until warrant for the formation of such street has been granted by the Town-Council; therefore sustain the first plea in law for the respondent the Master of Works; sist procedure in the cause to enable the petitioner to present the necessary petition to the Town-Council for warrant to form a new street along the southern boundary of his feu in terms of section 11 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903; reserve all other questions as well as the question of expenses, and decern.”

The petitioner appealed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 19th June 1911, when it was continued to await the decision of a case then depending before the House of Lords, which, it was stated, might affect the question at issue. The case was again heard on 9th July 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—Section 11 of the Burgh Police Act had no application here, because there was no proposal to form a new street or to alter a street. Nothing that the petitioner proposed would affect the Esplanade; it would remain exactly as it was before. All he proposed to do was to erect buildings on his own ground adjoining the Esplanade, and it was absurd to contend that by that act he was forming the Esplanade, which did not belong to him and which he did not propose to touch, into a new street.¹ The Dean of Guild, therefore, was wrong in ordering a sist.

Argued for the respondents;—It was clear from the petitioner's plans that what he intended was in effect to convert this Esplanade, which could not at present be called a street in the ordinary sense of the term, into a street in such a sense²; and it was immaterial whether the Esplanade was or was not at present technically a street according to the definition of the Burgh Police Acts. Accordingly, the provisions of section 11 of the Burgh Police Act when reasonably construed applied, and the Dean of Guild had followed the proper course. The fact that the petitioner's proposed operations were confined to his own property and were not to affect the solum of the Esplanade was not conclusive of the question whether by these operations he disclosed an intention to form a new street. That question must in every case be one of circumstances.¹

Oct. 29, 1912.
Mason v.
Rodger.

At advising on 29th October 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal from the Dean of Guild Court of Dunoon, and the question arises upon a petition for a lining, the applicant desiring to put up on the frontage to the West Bay some buildings which are certainly of a very different character from those which have been built there hitherto. The buildings proposed to be erected would form the corner at the junction of a road or passage fronting the sea—known sometimes as West Bay Esplanade, and sometimes, apparently, by the name of Baugie Place—with the street called Jane Street, which comes from inland right down to the sea. I know it is a matter of controversy whether the street where it actually comes to the sea and joins this Baugie Place is Jane Street or a continuation of Jane Street. At any rate the street comes down to the sea in a straight line at that point.

The Dean of Guild's judgment is contained in certain findings. He first of all finds that the loss of amenity is not a matter of which he can take cognisance. Then he describes the locus, and he finds that Jane Street is a public street within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, and that it extends from Hillfoot Street to the public thoroughfare or passage along the West Bay. Then he finds that the building proposed to be erected by the petitioner has not an open space for light and ventilation equal in breadth at the narrowest part to the height of the building; and then that the public passage, footpath, or esplanade, which runs along the foreshore of the West Bay and now forms the southern boundary of the petitioner's feu, is not a street within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 to 1903. And then the interlocutor proceeds:—“(6) That the buildings proposed to be erected by the petitioner along the said south boundary of his property will convert the said existing public passage into a new street; and (7) that the Dean of Guild Court cannot grant warrant for the erection of any buildings abutting on a new street until warrant for the formation of such street has been granted by the Town-Council; therefore . . . sists procedure in the case to enable the petitioner to present the necessary petition to the Town-Council for warrant to form a new street. . . .”

Now, the argument before your Lordships turned upon this last matter. There was really no argument upon the question of Jane Street, because the question of open space for light and ventilation can be put right by modification of the plans, and is really not before us.

The theory of the Dean of Guild's judgment is really based entirely upon the provisions of the 11th section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903.

¹ Mair v. Police Commissioners of Dumbarton, 25 R. 298, per the Lord Justice-Clerk, at p. 302.

Oct. 29, 1912. This Court has already considered that section very carefully and given judgment upon it in the case of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company v. Hutchison.¹ I may say that I adhere to the opinion that I there formed; and I am afraid that, if that opinion is carefully looked at, it is really destructive of the Dean of Guild's view here. I have reconsidered the matter, and see no reason to doubt the soundness of my opinion. In other words, section 11, when it speaks of "every person who intends to form or lay out any new street," is speaking of the physical act of laying out or forming a street; and it follows from that that it can only refer to an operation upon a man's own ground. Accordingly, as soon as one finds—as one finds here—that the petitioner's ground is bounded by the street and that therefore the street is not in the petitioner's ground, it is quite impossible to hold that he is forming or laying out a new street.

Mason v.
Rodger.

Ld. President.

In so holding I am not, I think, running counter to the English cases that were cited; and in particular, if I may say so with respect, I entirely agree with the remarks of both the Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) and also Lord Justice Brett in Robinson's case,² which was quoted. It is always to be kept in view that the word "street" has two significations. It may mean a street by definition, or a street in the ordinary popular sense. You must go to the particular Act of Parliament concerned. The definition of a street in the set of statutes known as the Burgh Police Acts in Scotland might not be—and probably is not—the same definition of street as in the Local Government Acts in England with which the learned Judges were dealing. But you may have a street by definition which is not a street in the ordinary sense of the word at all; and by practical operations a place that is a street by definition may become a street in the popular sense of the word. When precisely it becomes a street—whether it becomes a street by the erection of three or four houses, or whether it can so become by the erection of one house—is really a practical matter associated with the old puzzle known as the sorites; and nobody can lay down a general rule as to when a street by definition becomes a street in the popular sense of the word; each case would have to be judged on its own merits. But the English Judges were really dealing with that kind of case. They were dealing with a power in a Local Authority to make certain regulations as regards streets; and they held, in those cases, that "street" meant street in the popular sense of the word, and they also held, in the case before them, that the time had come at which what had been merely a street by definition should be held to be also a street in the popular sense.

That reasoning would, I think, apply to any provisions of our set of statutes which give certain powers as regards streets, but it obviously does not apply to the expression, "Every person who intends to form or lay out any new street." I do not think, with the utmost straining of language, you can truly describe a man as forming a street who simply proposes to build a house upon his own ground, although there is contiguous to it something that may be a street by definition. The opposite view, as we pointed out in Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company v. Magistrates of Ayr,³ would really lead to most inconvenient and unjust consequences, because then you would be entitled to build up to the boundary of your own ground Oct. 29, 1912. and proceed to form a street on somebody else's ground.

Now that being so, I am afraid the Dean of Guild's judgment sisting the cause in order that this gentleman may present a petition to the Town-Council cannot stand, because I do not think he is in a position to present a petition. He has no ground upon which he can form a street, and it is not necessary for him to form it. Nor does he come under the following words of the clause by proposing to widen, extend, or alter a street, upon the hypothesis that Baugie Place is a street already.

I think myself it is inadvisable, at this time, to pronounce on the question as to what is the precise position of Baugie Place. I do so for this reason: It may be a mere public passage, without being a street, of the class that we had to deal with in this Division, not long ago, in a case from Saltcoats.¹ On the other hand, it may be that it is within the definition of private street, in which case the Council, if these buildings are to be erected, might be in a position to call upon the owner to put the private street bounding his ground into a proper state. I do not want to take away from the Council the power of considering that matter. Therefore, I would propose that we should recall the fifth, sixth, and seventh findings, not thereby meaning that the fifth finding is necessarily wrong, but merely giving the Dean of Guild Court an opportunity to consider the matter now that the fifth finding cannot really form the basis upon which the sixth is rested. With that I think the case must go back to the Dean of Guild Court.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship, but upon somewhat different and probably narrower grounds. The appellant in this case is the proprietor of a long and narrow strip of ground in Dunoon, bounded on the north by a main street called Clyde Street, on the east by a side street leading down to the shore called Jane Street, and on the south by what is termed the Esplanade, lying between his boundary wall and the shore. He holds in feu of the estate of Milton, and his west boundary is another feu—similar to his own—on the Milton estate. The feu to the east, and therefore on the opposite side of Jane Street, also holds of Milton. In the original charters of these three feus, executed between 1824 and 1829, the south boundary of the eastmost of the feus is described in 1824 as a public road to be made along the seashore of Baugie Bay, and in 1829 the south boundary of the appellant's and of the westmost feu is described as the walk or road called Baugie Place. It is obvious, therefore, that Baugie Place, now called the Esplanade, lies outside the appellant's south or seaward boundary.

At present there stands on the appellant's feu a villa residence at the end next Clyde Street, having its main entrance from that street, and the ground between this house and the Esplanade is in garden, with, I think, a door opening on to the Esplanade. The appellant, having these three open frontages, proposes to utilise his ground by pulling down the villa and Mason v.

Rodger.

Ld. Johnston.

The municipal authorities in Dunoon are not unnaturally concerned about the interference with the amenity of the town's sea frontage which the appellant's proposals would cause, and when his application for approval of his plans came before the Dean of Guild Court there was opposition. The Dean of Guild Court rightly held that they had no concern with the question of amenity, their functions being statutory only. When the case came before the Court the appellant's proposal was at his own hand to widen both Jane Street and the Esplanade by throwing a portion of his ground into these accesses. But, when he found that he could not do this without the authority of the Town-Council under the Burgh Police Act, 1903, section 11, he asked leave to amend his plans and application so as to show no widening or alteration of either Jane Street or the Esplanade, and this leave was granted.

Two points arose before the Dean of Guild Court. The first depended shortly upon whether there was sufficient width in the appellant's ground to admit of his proposed buildings facing Jane Street being erected without a breach of the statutory provisions with regard to free space behind. This matter is left by the Dean of Guild Court in such a position that it is not properly before this Court. We are only concerned with the question raised regarding the Esplanade and the buildings proposed to be erected ex adverso of that frontage. The Dean of Guild Court have come to the conclusion (1) that the public passage, footpath, or esplanade along the foreshore of the West Bay, which forms the southern boundary of the appellant's feu, "is not a street within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892-1903"; (2) that the erection of the buildings proposed on this frontage "will convert the said existing public passage into a new street"; (3) that the Dean of Guild Court cannot grant warrant for the erection of buildings abutting on a new street until warrant for the formation of the street has been granted by the Town-Council; and they therefore sisted procedure to enable the appellant to present the necessary petition for warrant to form his new street in terms of section 11 of the Burgh Police Act, 1903. It is these conclusions of the Dean of Guild Court which we are called upon to review.

It is pretty clear that the appellant is seeking to force the hand of the Town-Council into the opening of the Esplanade as an ordinary means of access to his proposed buildings, and that the municipal authorities would like to checkmate him in some way or another. Whether their effort is justified in the public interest or not, we are not concerned with considering. The question before us is whether the Dean of Guild Court have rightly understood the situation, and are justified, by anything in the statutes, in the conclusion at which they have arrived.

It may be unnecessary for the purpose of this case to determine finally what are the rights of parties in the Esplanade. But a joint minute of admissions has been lodged, and a consideration of this and of the statements on record lead, I think, without doubt to the conclusion that the footpath, and, as I have already said, that it was no part of the appellant's Mason v.

Esplanade was nothing but a passage for foot-passengers, in other words, a Oct. 29, 1912.
property. The appellant may or may not be entitled to build ex adverso of Rodger.
it in its present condition. But his proposing to do so will not make it a Ld. Johnston.
new street in the sense of the statute. If he proposes to widen, extend, or otherwise alter it under section 11, he may apply to the Town-Council, and then it will be decided whether he can compel the turning of an existing foot-passage into an ordinary street for vehicular traffic for his benefit, and, if so, on what conditions. But he is not proposing to do anything to the Esplanade except to utilise it as an access to his houses. If he attempts to use it without widening or alteration as anything but an access for foot-passengers, the municipal authorities, under whose control the passage now is, will no doubt take steps to prevent him, unless he can establish a right, which does not at present appear on the papers, so to do.

But the Dean of Guild Court appears to me to have approached the matter from a wrong point of view. The question before them is whether a lining should be granted for the erection of certain buildings which will have a frontage to, and whose only access will be from, a footpath. There may be other objections to the proposed buildings, but the power of the Dean of Guild Court is statutory, and I do not find anything in the statute which justifies the Dean of Guild in refusing sanction to the erection of a building simply because the access to it is from a footpath, or in compelling a new street in the proper sense to be made by the intending builder on his own ground.

To arrive at a complete understanding of what is a public street and what a private street in the sense of the statute is no easy task, and it is rendered none the easier by the new definition in the Act of 1903, section 103. But I think that we are relieved from considering whether the Esplanade is a street, and what kind of a street, by section 128 of the Act of 1892 as amended by section 104 (2) (c) of the Act of 1903. The Esplanade is certainly a public footpath. The Town-Council, by that section as so amended, have "the sole charge and control" of it, and it is thereby vested in them accordingly.

Now, the Town-Council's authority in the matter of new buildings is derived from the Act of 1892, section 166. It requires the applicant for a lining to accompany his petition with a plan of the site, showing "the immediately conterminous properties, and also the position and width of any street, court, or footpath from which the property has access, or upon which it abuts." This clearly recognises that a new building may have its access from a footpath as well as from a street or court. If that be so, and there is no express enactment—and I can find none—empowering the Town-Council to enforce the substitution for the footpath of a "street" in the statutory sense as an access to the buildings as a condition of granting a lining, then it follows that the appellant may erect his buildings, if otherwise unobjectionable, with no access other than the footpath or Esplanade upon which his property abuts.

It follows that the judgment of the Dean of Guild Court falls to be recalled, though I doubt whether its recall will much advantage the appellant.

Oct. 29, 1912. LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

Husband and Wife—Divorce for adultery—Process—Sisting of alleged paramour—Right of party sisted to judgment as to his guilt or innocence—Act of Sederunt, 17th July 1908.

In an action of divorce for adultery an alleged paramour, who has not been called as a defender and against whom there are no direct conclusions, but to whom the action has been intimated in terms of the Act of Sederunt of 17th July 1908 and who has appeared and been sisted to defend, is entitled to a decision as to his guilt or innocence.

Circumstances in which the Lord Ordinary (Dewar), while granting decree of divorce, assoilzied an alleged paramour, thus appearing, from the conclusions of the summons so far as implicating him.

EXTRA
DIVISION.
Lord Dewar.

ON 29th June 1911 Daniel Raeside brought an action of divorce for adultery against his wife, the conclusion of the summons being that "the Lords of our Council and Session ought and should find facts, circumstances, and qualifications proven relevant to infer guilt of adultery of the defender, Elizabeth Miller or Raeside, with C D, and therefore find her guilty of adultery with him accordingly; and our said Lords ought and should divorce and separate the defender from the pursuer and from his society, fellowship, and company. . . ." The defender did not enter appearance to defend the action.

On 15th July 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar), in terms of the Act of Sederunt 17th July 1908,* appointed the dependence of the

* The Act of Sederunt of 17th July 1908 enacts:—Sec. 1. "In every action of divorce on the ground of adultery in which appearance has not been entered, and in which the person with whom the defender is stated to have committed adultery has not been cited as a co-defender, the Lord Ordinary before whom the action depends shall, before fixing a diet of proof, unless cause be shown to the contrary, appoint intimation to be made to such person in the form, or as nearly as may be in the form, contained in the Schedule hereto annexed; and such person, if he or she desires to dispute the truth of the averments made against him or her, shall be entitled to lodge a minute craving to be sisted as a party to the cause, and setting forth answers to the averments contained in the summons, so far as affecting his or her character and conduct; and on such person being sisted he or she shall become a party to the cause and be subject to the same procedure as if he or she had originally been cited as a co-defender, and with the same rights and liabilities as to the expenses occasioned by such intervention."

action with a double of the summons to be intimated to C D, and allowed him to lodge a minute with answers to the statements contained in the condescendence in so far as they related to him.

Oct. 31, 1912.
Raeside v.
Raeside.

C D thereafter lodged a minute in which, after craving to be sisted as a party to the cause, he denied the charge of adultery, and averred that the charge was made by the pursuer and defender acting collusively to extort money from him.

On 12th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary fixed a diet of proof, and sisted C D as a party to the cause.

On 13th April 1912 the Lord Ordinary having taken the proof, at which C D was represented by counsel and led evidence, pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—" . . . Finds facts, circumstances, and qualifications proved, relevant to infer the defender's guilt of adultery: Finds her guilty of adultery accordingly, and therefore divorces and separates the defender from the pursuer, his society, fellowship, and company in all time coming: Finds and declares in terms of the conclusion of the summons, and decerns." *

The minuting defender, C D, reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on 31st October 1912.

Argued for the reclamer;—The reclamer, after being sisted by the Lord Ordinary, became a party to the cause just as effectually as if he had been originally cited as a co-defender.¹ The result of that was that, by the ordinary rules of law and justice, he was entitled to have the judgment of the Court on the conclusions of the action so far as these were conclusions directed against him. The Lord Ordinary had not intended to pronounce any judgment upon the case so far as regarded him, but he had in fact, although inadvertently, pronounced an adverse judgment owing to the form of his interlocutor, which granted declarator in terms of the summons. With regard to the reclamer

* "OPINION.—This is an action at the instance of Daniel Raeside against his wife for divorce on the ground of adultery with C D. Mrs Raeside does not defend the action. She has admitted the adultery both by extrajudicial confession and on oath. But C D has appeared in the case, and has lodged a minute of amendment denying the adultery, and averring that the action is collusive, and that the pursuer and defender are acting in concert together for the purpose of extorting money from him.

"But for this minute the case would have been simple, because there is such strong presumption that a person will not admit adultery unless it is true that very little corroborative evidence is necessary to enable an injured spouse to obtain the remedy of divorce. Mrs Raeside's confession and certain letters she wrote, to which I shall presently refer, although not evidence against C D, are, I think, conclusive against her. But the averments contained in the minute are of such a grave character that it is necessary to examine them with great care in the light of the evidence. If they are true, divorce is, of course, out of the question; but if they are untrue the pursuer is entitled to a clear and unequivocal judgment to that effect. As there is no conclusion against C D in the summons, I do not require to consider how far the evidence is good against him. The only question I have to decide is whether it is proved that this action is really a collusive conspiracy between the pursuer and defender brought for the purpose of extorting money from C D. I am very clearly of opinion that it is not. [His Lordship then examined the evidence, and concluded]—There is no foundation for the grave charges which have been brought against the pursuer, and I am accordingly of opinion that he is entitled to decree with expenses."

Oct. 31, 1912. the only possible judgment here was a judgment in his favour, because it was admitted by the pursuer that the case against the reclamer had not been proved. That being so the only just and equitable decree was one assolzieing¹ the reclamer from the charges which had not been proved. A decree of dismissal did not meet the situation. The fact that the word "dismiss" was used in the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861,² was quite immaterial. That Act in its terms and effect was different from the Act of Sederunt,³ under which the reclamer came. The Act of Sederunt made the party sisted a party to the cause in the fullest sense of the term with, accordingly, a right to demand the ordinary decrees: whereas the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act did not make the party cited a party to the cause, but merely conferred certain powers on the Court with regard to him, viz., a power to mulct him in expenses or to "dismiss" the action so far as regarded him. That being so there was no good reason why the Court should not now pronounce the decree craved. The pursuer admitted that he had not proved his case against the reclamer, so there was nothing to be gained by examining the evidence at length or sending the case back to be disposed of by the Lord Ordinary.

Argued for the respondent;—The pursuer admitted that in the present action he had not led evidence which proved that the reclamer was guilty of adultery. The only object, however, of the action, and the only point to which he had directed his evidence, was proof of his wife's adultery. The proper decree accordingly was a decree of dismissal, and not a decree of absolvitor. It was quite illogical that a party should be assolzied for ever from a matter which had not been the subject of the action to which he had voluntarily become a party. Suppose, for instance, that hereafter the respondent should raise an action of damages against the reclamer, it would surely be unjust that his action should be barred by a decree in a case in which he had not necessarily had occasion to lead all his evidence upon the question of the reclamer's guilt. The Act of Sederunt was not meant to turn an action of divorce against a wife into an action of damages against the party with whom she had committed adultery. It was significant that in section 7 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1867, the word used was "dismiss"; and it was a decree of dismissal that was pronounced in Miller v. Simpson.⁴

LORD KINNEAR.—I think this case is in a somewhat unfortunate position but I cannot say I have any doubt as to the proper way of dealing with it. The action is one of divorce, and the Lord Ordinary has pronounced the decree of divorce which is brought before us on a reclaiming note by C D, who is not called in form as a co-defender but whose name is set out in the first conclusion of the summons as being the person with whom the pursuer alleges that his wife committed adultery. The first conclusion is that the Court should find "facts, circumstances, and qualifications proven relevant to infer guilt of adultery of the defender, Elizabeth Miller or Raeside, with C D." The action was intimated to C D. He put in a minute denying his guilt and, at the same time, making certain other averments material to the cause which I need not further consider now. Oct. 31, 1912.

The Lord Ordinary has pronounced an interlocutor, in the first place, finding that the defender's adultery is proved and, therefore, divorcing her, and then finding and declaring in terms of the conclusion of the summons. The first part of that interlocutor is not reclaimed against, but the second part is on the ground that the declarator in terms of the conclusion of the summons means that it is proved that the defender had committed adultery with C D. C D reclaims against that finding and, as I understand, counsel for the pursuer and respondent does not maintain that he could hold it except under certain qualifications which, at present, I do not think it necessary to consider.

Raeside v.
Raeside.

Lord Kinnear.

Now, parties are chiefly in dispute as to whether the finding—whatever it be—which affects C D should be followed up by a dismissal of the action or by an absolvitor of C D from the conclusions of the action. I think there is a preliminary question which must be decided before the Court can possibly determine whether the form of judgment should be absolvitor or dismissal, and that is whether it is or is not proved that C D committed adultery with the defender. Now, upon the form of the interlocutor, I should have thought the Lord Ordinary had held it proved, and I think the interlocutor says so in plain words; but, then, his Lordship explains in his note that he had not in fact applied his mind to that question at all. He says: "As there is no conclusion against C D in the summons, I do not require to consider how far the evidence is good against him. The only question I have to decide is whether it is proved that this action was really a collusive conspiracy between the pursuer and the defender for the purpose of extorting money from C D."

Now, I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that there is no conclusion of the summons directed against C D. I think there is a declaratory conclusion which necessarily and directly tables the question for judicial determination whether he is or is not guilty of adultery with the defender in this action. The Lord Ordinary, when the procedure reached the proper stage, taking that view, directed that the action should be intimated to C D to give him an opportunity of appearing and attending the proof. C D accordingly put in a minute to the effect I have already mentioned, and I think that the result of that was that he and the pursuer joined issue upon a question of fact which is of vital importance to C D, namely,—whether he is or is not guilty of adultery with the pursuer's wife. I am of opinion that he is entitled to have a judgment upon that question, and that it is not reasonable or fair treatment of C D to say that it is not a question arising for decision because there is no operative conclusion in the shape of a money claim made against him. There is the declaratory conclusion which very clearly affects him.

Now, we are asked to supply the deficiency in the Lord Ordinary's judgment and to pronounce a finding, without having considered the evidence, that will relieve the minuter of the judgment in fact that has already been pronounced against him. We are asked, in some form or other, to find that the case is not proved against him. I think it quite impossible for this Court to do anything of the kind. We could pronounce

Oct. 31, 1912. no finding upon that question of fact without having the evidence properly brought before us and fully argued. But, even if that had been done, I think we ought to pronounce no such finding without knowing the Lord Ordinary's mind upon it. It is a question to which, in the opinion before us, his Lordship has not applied his mind. The first thing to be done is that he should be asked to apply his mind to it and to say whether, in his judgment, the case is proved against C D or whether it is not. I think it quite necessary to have that question distinctly decided before we consider whether the proper course is to dismiss or assolzie. The latter is quite a minor question, though, still, one of material importance; but the first step towards it is to find what is really proved or not proved against him.

Raeside v.
Raeside.

Lord Kinnear.

Therefore, what I should move your Lordships to do is to adhere to the first part of the interlocutor, but to recall it in so far as it finds and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and to remit to the Lord Ordinary to consider and decide the question whether the case is or is not proved as against the minuter, C D, and to proceed as shall be just. I do not mean that the Lord Ordinary is to do nothing beyond finding the effect of the proof as regards C D's guilt or innocence. Having determined that question he should then proceed as shall appear to him to be just and decide whether the final disposal of the action should be by way of dismissal or by way of absolvitor, provided always he thinks the case is not proved against C D.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. The dependence of this action was intimated to C D in terms of the recent Act of Sederunt—a very wholesome and useful Act of Sederunt, as I humbly think. C D was allowed to lodge a minute, if so advised, and did lodge a minute; and, in terms of the crave of that minute, he was sisted on 12th January 1912 as a party to the cause. The only position as a party which he could possibly occupy was, of course, that of co-defender; and, accordingly, in terms of the Act of Sederunt, on being sisted, he became a party to the cause and subject to the same procedure as if he had been originally cited as co-defender.

In that state of matters, C D being thus a co-defender, I think the Lord Ordinary ought to have decided the question and expressed an opinion as to whether the allegations made concerning him were or were not proved in fact. It was pressed upon us by the learned Dean that, although that had not been done in the Outer House, it might now be done here. I agree with your Lordship that that is impossible. The suggestion that we should proceed, without hearing any evidence, to make such a finding as is desired seems to me to be quite extravagant. And the alternative view—that we might have heard the Dean or his junior open the case, and then dispose of the matter—does not meet the situation either, because this is obviously a question where the Court is entitled to have the benefit of the views of the Judge of first instance. I therefore agree that the case should go back as your Lordship has indicated. If the Lord Ordinary should hold that the allegations made by the pursuer so far as concerning C D are not proved by competent and sufficient evidence, he will, of course, proceed to consider and decide whether the proper course would be to assoilzie C D or Oct. 31, 1912. to dismiss the action so far as laid against him.

Raesside v.
Raesside.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that the course that the case has taken shows quite distinctly that one of the parties to the case is C D. He was sisted as a party to the case by the interlocutor of 12th January 1912, after having been allowed to lodge a minute by interlocutor of 15th July 1911. In that minute he denied the truth of the averments made with reference to him, which are contained in the third, fourth, and sixth articles of the condescendence. Having joined issue on those questions of fact, I think he was entitled to the judgment of the Court upon them; and that, the Lord Ordinary not having disposed of them, the case should go back to his Lordship in order that he may say whether, in his opinion, they are proved or not, as in a question with the minuter.

We were asked by the learned Dean of Faculty to make a finding that there was no evidence relevant to infer C D's guilt of adultery with the defender in this case, and it was suggested that the way was open for this Court making that finding by the admission that Mr Blackburn tendered at the bar. Mr Blackburn's admission was to the effect that he was prepared to admit that no evidence had been led which would justify him, as in a question with C D, arguing in this case that he had proved the averments made against him. But it was carefully pointed out that that admission was limited to the purposes of this case and he made it quite evident he desired to safeguard himself with regard to any future action of damages he might raise. In my opinion we cannot proceed to make a finding with regard to evidence as to the import of which we are entirely ignorant; and, in a case of this kind, I should entirely demur, for my own part, to expressing any opinion without knowing what impression that evidence made on the Lord Ordinary who heard and saw the witnesses. I agree with what your Lordships have said.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to said interlocutor [of 13th April 1912] in so far as it finds facts, circumstances, and qualifications proved relevant to infer the defender's guilt of adultery: Find her guilty of adultery accordingly, and therefore divorces and separates the defender from the pursuer, his society, fellowship, and company, in all time coming: Recall said interlocutor in so far as it finds and declares in terms of the conclusion of the summons: And in place thereof find and declare the defender to have forfeited all the rights and privileges of a lawful wife, and that the pursuer is entitled to live singly or to marry any free woman, as if he had never been married to the defender or as if she were naturally dead: Quoad ultra adhere to said interlocutor: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to consider and dispose of the first conclusion of the summons so far as directed against the minuting defender, and to proceed as may be just, and decern."

THEREAFTER the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, on the motion of the minuting defender, C D, for absolvitor from the conclusion of the summons so far as directed against him, in respect that the pursuer admitted that no sufficient evidence had been led to infer that the said C D had been guilty of adultery with the defender—the pursuer not opposing the said motion—assoilizes the said C D from the said conclusion, and decerns.”

Reparation—Slander—Master and Servant—Liability of master for verbal slander uttered by servant on privileged occasion—Personal malice of servant.

In an action of damages brought against a railway company on account of a verbal slander uttered by the manager of one of their station bars, the pursuer, who had been employed as a barmaid at this bar, averred that, on the occasion of her dismissal from this post, the manager (who had the control of the servants employed at the bar) uttered the slander complained of—a charge of appropriating the company's funds—knowing it to be false and with the object of gratifying his private ill-will towards her. The occasion was admittedly privileged.

Held that the action was irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer's averments disclosed that the malice alleged as actuating the slander was personal to the manager and in no way connected with the business of the defenders, and, accordingly, that the defenders could not be held responsible.

Citizens' Life Assurance Company v. Brown, [1904] A. C. 423, and Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, 1908 S. C. 928, distinguished.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Dewar.

ON 3rd April 1912 Miss Annie Aiken brought an action of damages for defamation against the Caledonian Railway Company.

The pursuer averred that in July 1911 she was engaged as one of the barmaids at the defenders' Princes Street Station, Edinburgh, by Mr Kennedy, the submanager, with the consent of Mr Brown, the manager of the defenders' hotel and bars at that station; and that Mr Brown was empowered by the defenders, and it was part of his duty, to engage and dismiss, as well as to control, the persons employed at the station bars.

She further averred:—(Cond. 6) “The pursuer entered upon her duties in terms of her said engagement as barmaid at the second-class bar in Princes Street Station. At the same bar two other barmaids were also employed, namely Miss Stewart and Miss W., the latter being the head barmaid. Between Miss W. and Mr Brown a special friendship and intimacy existed, and he accorded to her privileges which were denied to the other barmaids. Each barmaid was supplied with a National Cash Register, in which to place cash received, and these registers automatically recorded and checked the cash received at each sale. . . .” (Cond. 7) “Early in the course of the pursuer's service under the defenders Miss W. conceived a dislike for her, and this dislike soon grew into an ill-will which manifested itself in many small ways. Miss W.'s ill-will towards the pursuer arose largely from the fact that certain customers who had formerly been special friends of Miss W. now preferred to be served Nov. 6, 1912. by, and were specially friendly towards, the pursuer. To one of these customers the pursuer gave a credit for the sum of 7s. on an occasion ^{Aiken v. Caledonian Railway Co.} in July, receiving payment the following day. It is a recognised and usual custom for the defenders' barmaids to give credit to regular customers, and Miss W. frequently gave credit in this way. On this occasion, however, she attempted to make trouble for the pursuer, and reported the matter both to Mr Kennedy and to Mr Brown. Mr Kennedy paid no heed, but Mr Brown bore the matter in mind, and by this and similar tales carried regularly to him by Miss W. his mind was poisoned against the pursuer, and he also conceived a dislike and ill-will towards her, siding always with his friend, Miss W., and against the pursuer. The pursuer, although her relations with Miss W. remained strained, began to think that Mr Brown felt more favourably disposed to her (the pursuer) than he had done. On or about the 23rd day of December 1911, in one of the corridors of the Caledonian Hotel he attempted to take liberties with the pursuer and put his arms round her neck and tried to kiss her. This she resented and prevented, with the result that Mr Brown became very angry and ever after manifested an ill-feeling towards her." (Cond. 8) "On or about Saturday the 3rd February 1912, Miss W. informed Mr Brown that she suspected the pursuer of selling a flask of whisky and keeping the price, at the same time omitting to record the sale on her register. Mr Brown immediately sent for the pursuer, and said to her: 'You have not been ringing up your sales.' He thereby represented, and intended to represent, that the pursuer had received money from customers in payment for goods, and had not handed over the said money to the defenders, but had stolen the same. The said charge of theft was false, and was made by Mr Brown recklessly and maliciously, and without making any previous inquiry whatever. Mr Brown knew Miss W.'s ill-will towards pursuer, and that no reliance whatever was to be placed on her alleged suspicions. The pursuer denied the said charge. She had, however, been made aware previously that Miss W. was maliciously expressing unfounded suspicions concerning her, and went on to explain to Mr Brown the circumstances which Miss W. had maliciously expressed as being suspicious. He, however, refused to listen to any explanations or to make any inquiry. He said to the pursuer: 'This sort of thing has been going on too long,' meaning thereby that the pursuer had been engaged in a course of theft from the defenders. He then went on to say: 'You made a sale for 1s. 10d.; rang up the 10d. and put the 1s. in your own pocket.' He further said: 'You sold eight bottles of whisky for £2, when the proper charge was £2, 4s.' He further accused her of misconduct in connection with the credit given by her as above-mentioned in the previous July. The pursuer denied all the accusations made against her, which were in fact untrue, and called on Mr Brown to make proper inquiry and investigation. He, however, refused to do so, but suspended the pursuer at once from her duties, telling her to come back to him on the following Monday morning. . . . In connection with the credit sale of the previous July the pursuer gave Mr Brown the exact date of the sale, and told him without concealment precisely what happened." (Cond. 9) "On the following Monday the pursuer again called on Mr Brown at his office as instructed. Mr Brown then and there dismissed her from the service of the defenders, and said to her, as his reason for the

Nov. 6, 1912. dismissal: 'You have misappropriated the funds of the Company.' The pursuer protested that this was untrue, but he would not listen to her. He went on to say that the pursuer was not entitled to receive any wages on account of the reason of her dismissal, but offered to pay her what he termed her lying money (consisting of two days' wages), which the pursuer refused to accept. On the same day, and in his office at the Caledonian Railway Station, Mr Brown said to pursuer's mother, Mrs Aiken, who resides at 9 South St Andrew Street, Edinburgh, that the pursuer was 'dishonest, and had misappropriated the money of the Company,' or used words of the like import and effect. Both Mrs Aiken and the pursuer requested that full inquiry and investigation should be made, and in particular that Miss W. should be made a party to the interview. Mr Brown, however, refused to call in Miss W. or conduct any inquiry, but repeated his charges against the pursuer, and said in presence and hearing of the pursuer's mother that the pursuer was being dismissed 'for dishonesty.'" (Cond. 10) "Following on her dismissal the pursuer applied to Mr Brown for a reference. He replied that he would answer any inquiries made as to the pursuer. Thereafter the pursuer applied to a Mr Mackinnon for a situation, and referred him to Mr Brown. Mr Mackinnon thereupon wrote to Mr Brown in the matter but received no reply." (Cond. 11) "On 24th February 1912 the pursuer wrote to the secretary of the defenders' Company complaining of the circumstances in which she had been dismissed. He replied by letter of 5th March 1912, stating that inquiry had been made into the circumstances of her dismissal, and adding 'there does not seem to be any reason for interfering with the discretion of the hotel manager in the matter.' Thereafter the pursuer's agent wrote a letter direct to Mr Brown, and on 16th March he received a reply from the solicitor for the defenders in which it was for the first time stated 'Miss Aiken's services were dispensed with because they were no longer required by the Company.' The defenders' solicitor by the same letter offered payment of the sum of 18s. 6d. as a fortnight's wages in lieu of notice." (Cond. 12) "The pursuer has suffered very deeply in her feelings and in her reputation through the foresaid slanderous imputations of dishonesty made against her by Mr Brown. The said slanderous statements were made by Mr Brown maliciously in order to gratify the ill-will which, in common with and as an intimate friend of Miss W., he had conceived towards the pursuer. Moreover, the said slanderous statements were made and persisted in by Mr Brown most maliciously and recklessly without any inquiry as to their truth or falsehood, although inquiry was sought and pressed for both by the pursuer and by her mother, and would have at once revealed that there was no ground whatever for the said charge. Further, the said slanderous statements were made by Mr Brown in the course of his duties for the defenders, and ostensibly in their interests, as setting forth a reason for which alone he was entitled, in the exercise of his functions for the defenders, to discharge the pursuer, as he did discharge her, without notice and without adequate wages in lieu of notice. Further, the defenders through their secretary have homologated and adopted Mr Brown's actings in dismissing the pursuer and the slanderous statements of his reason for so doing, as above narrated. The said Mr Brown, though ostensibly dismissing the pursuer for dishonesty, knew well that it was a groundless charge, and himself afterwards gave information to the secretary of the defenders' Company upon which, as above narrated, he admitted in Nov. 6, 1912, writing that the pursuer was not dismissed for dishonesty. The pursuer will be greatly prejudiced in obtaining further employment if she does not vindicate her character. She has called on the defenders to withdraw the statements made concerning her, and to make adequate compensation, but they refuse or delay to do so, and the present action has accordingly been rendered necessary."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, and the action should therefore be dismissed.

On 21st June 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar), without delivering an opinion, approved of issues for the trial of the cause.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 16th and 17th October 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The respondent's averments were irrelevant. In *Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank*¹ Willes, J., in a passage which had been approved by high authority,² laid it down that a master was liable for his servant's wrongful act only if the act was (a) within the scope of the servant's authority, and (b) for the master's benefit.³ In *Lloyd v. Grace, Smith, & Company*⁴ Farwell, L.J., observed that, in order to infer liability on the part of the master, both of these conditions must be satisfied, and that the words "for the master's benefit" in Willes, J.'s, statement of the law could not be disregarded; and, although in Lloyd's case⁴ the decision of the King's Bench had been reversed, the available reports⁵ of the opinions in the House of Lords indicated that the reversal proceeded on the facts of the case. In numerous actions laid on slander issues had been refused because one or other of these conditions had not been satisfied.⁶ It might be that an employer would be liable for a statement made recklessly by his servant, as in *Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited*⁷; but there was a plain distinction between such cases and the class of case in which the servant was actuated by private malice.⁸ The present case fell within the latter category, for the pursuer distinctly averred that Brown's motive was the gratification of his spite towards her. The slander was, therefore, not uttered for the master's benefit. Citizens' Life Assurance Company v. Brown,⁹ which was first followed in Scotland in Ellis v. National Free Labour Association,¹⁰ was distinguishable inasmuch as there the servant was acting in the furtherance of his employer's business. In any event the occasion was privileged, and no facts and circumstances sufficient to infer malice on the part of the defenders were averred.

Argued for the respondent;—The slander was uttered in the course of Brown's employment, and this was enough to infer liability on the part of the reclaimers. All that was meant by Willes, J.'s, statement that the servant's act must be for the benefit of the master was that the servant should be ostensibly acting in the interest of his master. It was not meant that the act must actually benefit the master. If, as Farwell, L.J., observed in Lloyd's case,¹ the act was within the scope of the servant's employment, "then such act was by legal intendment done" for the master's benefit. The Court would not inquire into the actual motive in the servant's mind when he did the act or spoke the words complained of. The fact, therefore, that the slanderous words were averred to have been uttered for the gratification of the servant's ill-will could not render the action irrelevant. Malice included "every wrong feeling in a man's mind,"² and if a master were relieved of liability where his servant acted maliciously, there would be few cases in which a master could be made liable for a servant's wrongous act. But in point of fact masters had been made liable even for their servant's criminal offences.³ In Finburgh's case⁴ the servant's act was reckless, and as regarded the master's liability no distinction could be taken between recklessness and deliberate intent. The master had put the servant in a position which enabled him to do the wrong. The Citizens' Life Assurance Company's case⁵ was an instance of the employer being made liable where the servant acted with deliberate malice. The principle of that decision was extended to verbal slander in Finburgh's case.⁶ The case of *Riddell*⁶ was not in point, for the decision there proceeded on the ground that the statement was made by the servant outwith the scope of his employment. It was not disputed that there was privilege in the present case; but the facts and circumstances averred on record were amply sufficient to infer malice.

At advising on 6th November 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The Lord Ordinary has approved of issues for the trial of this case by jury. I am sorry that in doing so he did not see fit to give us the benefit of his reasons for holding the action to be relevant, as I have reached an opposite conclusion from his Lordship on that matter. The case raises an interesting and rather important question as to the vicarious liability of an incorporated company in damages for a slander uttered by one of their servants. The defenders are the Caledonian Railway Company. The pursuer entered their service about the end of July 1911 as a barmaid at the second class bar in Princes Street Station. She was engaged by, or at least with the authority and approval of, Mr James Brown, who admittedly was manager of the defenders' hotel and bars at that station, and was authorised to engage, control, and dismiss the employees at these bars. On 5th February 1912 Brown dismissed the pursuer from the defenders' service, Nov. 6, 1912. stating as the reason that she had misappropriated the funds of the Com-pany. The pursuer brings this action against the Company for slander. The slanders are alleged to have been uttered by Mr Brown on three occasions on 3rd and 5th February 1912 in presence of the pursuer, and, on the last occasion, of her mother also, and were to the effect that she had stolen money from the defenders and misappropriated their funds. The pursuer admits that the occasions were privileged, and that if issues are to be allowed malice must be put in them. It is important to emphasise at the outset that the action is one of slander pure and simple. It may well be that if the pursuer's averments are true the Company might be made liable to her by an appropriate action in the pecuniary consequences of the termination by Brown of her contract of service without notice. But that is another matter. The question here raised is whether the Company is to be held liable, upon the averments presented, in damages for Brown's alleged slander. In order to solve that question one must consider whether the pursuer has relevantly averred malice. Her averments are specific, and very peculiar. She says that a special friendship and intimacy existed between Miss W., the head barmaid in the second class bar, and Mr Brown; that Miss W. conceived a dislike and ill-will towards her, and carried tales about her to Brown, whose mind was thereby poisoned against her, so that he conceived a dislike and ill-will towards her. She states that on an occasion in December 1911 Brown attempted to take liberties with her, and that, on her resenting this, he became very angry and ever after manifested an illfeeling towards her. The pursuer goes on to aver that the "slandorous statements were made by Mr Brown maliciously in order to gratify the ill-will which, in common with and as an intimate friend of Miss W., he had conceived towards the pursuer"; that the "statements were made by Mr Brown in the course of his duties for the defenders and ostensibly in their interests"; and that Brown, "though ostensibly dismissing the pursuer for dishonesty, knew well that it was a groundless charge." These averments would clearly be relevant to support an action of slander against Mr Brown. The slandorous statements are said to have been to his knowledge false, and made with the sole object of gratifying his private spite and ill-will towards the pursuer. But it is, to my mind, almost equally clear that the averments do not support a case of malice as against the defenders. They exclude the idea of mere recklessness on the part of Brown, or of a mistaken overzeal in furthering his employers' interests. Brown's alleged malice was calculated and deliberate, to further his own private end: there is no room for dubiety in the pursuer's averments.

I think the case ought not to be sent to trial. There is no precedent for such a course, and there are many precedents against it. In my opinion the defenders cannot be held liable for a slander uttered by their servant upon a privileged occasion when, upon the pursuer's own showing, the malice she is at pains to allege was of a purely personal and private character, quite unconnected with the affairs and purposes of the Company.

There is, I think, now no doubt that an employer, whether an individual or a corporate company, may be liable in damages for slander uttered by a servant—just as he may be in the case of any other wrong done—if the

Nov. 6, 1912. slander was uttered, or the wrong done, in the course and within the scope of the servant's employment, and in the interest of the employer. This doctrine is supported and illustrated by a number of decisions, Scots and English, to some of which I shall refer. It has been held to apply even when the servant's act amounted to a crime, e.g., assault.¹ But in order to found such liability it must be clear upon the facts, or in a question of relevancy it must be at least consistent with the pursuer's averments, that the wrong was done subject to the limitations above indicated. The matter is well illustrated by the case of Limpus v. London General Omnibus Company.² The driver of an omnibus belonging to the defendants drove it across the road in front of a rival omnibus belonging to the plaintiff, which was thereby overturned. The defendants had instructed their drivers not to obstruct any omnibus. The report bears that at the trial Martin, B., directed the jury that a master was responsible for the reckless conduct of his servant in the course of the service; that if the jury believed that the defendants' driver, being dissatisfied and irritated with the plaintiff's driver, acted recklessly and wantonly and improperly, but in the course of his service and employment, and in doing that which he believed to be for the interest of the defendants, then they were responsible; that if the act of the defendants' driver, although a reckless driving on his part, was nevertheless an act done by him in the course of his service, and to do that which he thought best to suit the interest of his employers, and so to interfere with the trade and business of the other omnibus, the defendants were responsible; that the instructions given to the defendants' driver were immaterial if he did not pursue them; but if the true character of the act of the defendants' servant was that it was an act of his own, and in order to effect a purpose of his own, the defendants were not responsible. A Court of six Judges in the Exchequer Chamber held, with one dissentient voice, that the direction was right. Crompton, J., observed that the criterion is whether the act was done "in the course of the service and for his master's purposes."

The general rule of the matter has never, I suppose, been better expressed than it was by Willes, J., in the well-known case of Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank.³ "The general rule," said his Lordship, "is that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved." The rule thus expressed has since been repeatedly approved and adopted in the House of Lords, the Privy Council, and the Courts both in England and Scotland, e.g., Mackay,⁴ Houldsworth,⁵ British Mutual Banking Company,⁶ Brown,⁷ Ruben,⁸ Ellis,⁹ and Finburgh.¹⁰ In Ruben's case⁸ Lord Davey said that "Every part of the legal proposition stated by Willes, J., . . . is of the essence of it." I do not think that proposition has ever been successfully impugned or materially qualified. We were referred by the pursuer's Nov. 6, 1912. counsel to some observations by the Lord Chancellor (Loreburn) in a recent case, Lloyd (26th July 1912, only as yet reported in 28 T. L. R. 547),¹ Aiken v. Caledonian Railway Co. which counsel represented as negating, or at least qualifying, the effect, of the words of Willes, J., "and for the master's benefit." It appears Lord Dundas. to me that Lord Loreburn in what he said was only guarding against an interpretation of Willes, J.'s, language as meaning that an employer will be entitled to escape liability for his servant's fraud if he can show that he in fact derived no actual benefit from it; and pointing out that the employer, though wholly ignorant of the fraud and in no way benefited by it, may under given circumstances be liable for its consequences if he has held out the fraudulent servant to the defrauded plaintiff as authorised by him to transact the business in the course of which the fraud was perpetrated. Barwick's case² was one of fraud. But Willes, J., broadly stated that "with respect to the question, whether a principal is answerable for the act of his agent in the course of his master's business, and for his master's benefit, no sensible distinction can be drawn between the case of fraud and the case of any other wrong." Accordingly in *Citizens' Life Assurance Company v. Brown*³ the "general rule" was expressly applied to a case of libel. The decision, setting at rest some previous uncertainty upon the point, finally established that "a corporation cannot be held to be incapable of malice so as to be relieved of liability for malicious libel when published by its servant acting in the course of his employment." It is important for present purposes to note that the libel circulated by Fitzpatrick, a servant of the appellants, about the plaintiff, who had left their service and entered that of a rival life assurance company, was plainly written in the interest of the appellants and for their benefit, for it was "in order to counteract the mischief which Brown was doing to the business of the Company." In the Scots case of Ellis,⁴ where the "master" was a voluntary association, it was held (expressly following the rule in *Barwick*²) that "a master is liable for a slander uttered by his servant while acting within the scope of his employment although without special instructions." There was a dispute between the parties upon their pleadings whether the letter complained of was one falling truly within the scope of the secretary's employment or, as the defenders alleged, a private letter of his own, of which they had no knowledge and for which they were not responsible. An issue was accordingly adjusted in terms designed to leave open at the trial the respective contentions of parties upon that vital point. The case in this respect seems to me to afford a marked and useful contrast to the pleadings before us.

Agnew v. British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited,⁵ was an action of damages against a company for a verbal slander uttered by one of their servants. The case was thrown out as irrelevant, on the ground that the statements complained of were not slanderous; but the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall) expressed the opinion that even on a contrary view the action could not be maintained against the company. His Lordship, after referring

Nov. 6, 1912. to some of the reported cases, said—and I concur in his remarks:—"To hold that a company or corporation or other large employer is liable for all or any libellous language rashly used by anyone in their employment in the course of such employment would be to introduce an appalling extension of the law of defamation. I take it to be the sound rule that it is the person who utters or writes the defamatory matter who is alone responsible for it, and that it is only in very special circumstances that the principal may be held responsible for the language of his agent." The views thus expressed by Lord Ardwall were repeated and approved by this Division in M'Adam.¹ Other recent cases where actions against companies based on slanders by their servants have been thrown out as irrelevant are Eprile v. Caledonian Railway Company,² Nicklas v. The New Popular Café Company, Limited,³ and Riddell v. Glasgow Corporation.⁴ The pursuer's counsel sought to derive aid from Riddell's case.⁴ He pointed out that the ground upon which the House of Lords held the pursuer's record to be irrelevant was that the slander was uttered by the tax collector under circumstances in which he had no authority to express any opinion to the pursuer as to the genuineness, or the reverse, of her receipts; and he urged that here the slander was uttered by Brown under circumstances which not only authorised but bound him to state a reason for the pursuer's summary dismissal. There is nothing, I think, in this point. I do not see that Brown was bound to state a reason for the dismissal. As already said, it may be that the defenders are liable in the pecuniary consequences of that act; but assuming that to be so, it has no apparent connection with the uttering of the slander.

The only case, so far as I know, in which the Scots Court has allowed an issue against a corporate company in an action based on a verbal slander by its servant is Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited.⁵ The case is an instructive one. I agree with Lord Ardwall when he said that "in applying the principle of liability to any particular case, the greatest care must be taken to secure that a principal is not made liable for a slander uttered by a servant or agent, unless it be made perfectly clear that the slander was uttered directly in the interests of the master's business and in the course of executing such business, and that the words or some of them complained of in any particular case were not merely the outcome of heated or hasty temper on the part of the servant, or spoken with a view to gratifying his own private spite or malice. . . . And not only must the words of the alleged slander be strictly scrutinised with the view of determining whether the expressions used were such that the principal can in fairness be held responsible for them, but it is incumbent on the pursuer in such action to set forth distinctly and specifically on record facts from which it may be inferred that the verbal slander complained of is a slander that should be held in law to be imputable to the principals, so as to justify the issue that it was a slander uttered by them by or through their servant."

The words I have quoted seem to me not only to be sound, but to afford a Nov. 6, 1912, useful comment upon the present pursuer's record. I think the weight of the authorities to which I have referred, at perhaps too great length, goes to support the view I stated at the outset, that the action is irrelevant. I cannot see how Brown's slander can be held to be the Company's slander. It was uttered, it may be, in the course of his employment, but its utterance was not, in my judgment, in any true sense within the scope of that employment, nor for the purposes or the benefit of the defenders.

For the reasons now stated, I think we ought to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustain the defenders' first plea in law, and dismiss the action as irrelevant.

LORD SALVESEN.—This case raises an important question as to the liability of a corporation for a verbal slander uttered by a servant. The pursuer is a barmaid, and she was engaged as such by a Mr Brown, who was the manager of the defenders' hotel and bars at Princes Street Station, Edinburgh. Shortly stated, her averments are that Mr Brown, having conceived an ill-will against her because she refused to permit him to take certain liberties with her and on other grounds which need not be detailed, on 3rd February 1912 made certain statements to her, charging her in effect with misappropriation of the Company's funds, and suspended her from her duties; that two days later he dismissed her from the defenders' service, after repeating the slanderous statements already referred to. She avers that it was part of Mr Brown's duty to engage and dismiss as well as control the persons employed by the defenders at their station bars, and admits that the statement he made as to the cause of her dismissal is prima facie privileged. She seeks, however, to elide this privilege by averments of personal malice against Brown. In Cond. 12 she says: "The said slanderous statements were made by Mr Brown maliciously in order to gratify the ill-will which, in common with and as an intimate friend of Miss W., he had conceived towards the pursuer"; and again, "The said Mr Brown, though ostensibly dismissing the pursuer for dishonesty, knew well that it was a groundless charge, and himself afterwards gave information to the secretary of the defenders' Company upon which, as above narrated, he admitted in writing that the pursuer was not dismissed for dishonesty." Interlarded between these statements there are averments that Mr Brown acted recklessly without inquiry as to the truth or falsehood of the slanderous statements he made; but I am unable to see how these are consistent with the very pointed allegation that Mr Brown, in making the statements, knew that they were false, and made them for no other purpose than to gratify his own private spite.

I do not doubt that the pursuer's averments disclose a relevant case against Mr Brown if he had been the defender in the action. The question is whether they disclose any relevant case against the defenders as Brown's employers. It was decided in the case of the Citizens' Life Assurance Company, Limited,¹ that "a corporation cannot be held to be incapable of malice so as to be relieved of liability for malicious libel when published

Nov. 6, 1912. by its servant acting in the course of his employment." This decision was followed by this Division in the case of Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited,¹ which, like the present, was an action based on a verbal slander of a privileged kind. In each of these cases, however, there were facts which in my opinion create a material distinction. In the *Citizens' Life Assurance Company*² the slander was published, not indeed with the employer's knowledge or consent, express or implied, but with the intention of benefiting his business. The writer of the letter had no object of his own to serve. His purpose was to counteract the mischief which the plaintiff, a former employee, was doing to the business of the company. In Finburgh's case¹ the slander complained of was uttered by an attendant in a theatre, part of whose duty it was to remove from the theatre women of immoral character. There was no allegation that the attendant acted otherwise than in good faith and in the intended performance of his duty towards his employers; but it was held that there were sufficient allegations that he had acted without due inquiry and without ordinary and reasonable regard to the character of the pursuer, so that a jury, if the statements were proved, might have drawn the conclusion that he had acted with such recklessness as to infer malice. The case is in this respect very analogous to those with which we are familiar of railway servants who, in the course of performing their duty of removing from the train a passenger who is travelling without a ticket, act with unnecessary violence so that their conduct in law amounts to an assault. For conduct of this kind the employers are responsible, because they have appointed the servants to perform this duty, and must take the risk of their performing it otherwise than in a lawful manner.

The present case does not appear to me to be ruled by either of these, the only reported cases in which an employer has been held responsible for a slander uttered by his servant. It is, of course, true that an employer may be liable for a criminal act of his servant which he has neither directly nor indirectly authorised. That was established by the case of *Barwick*³ where Willes, J., laid down the rule in terms that have often been quoted with approval. The ground of the decision there was that the fraud which gave rise to the action had been committed for the bank's benefit; and I apprehend that the judgment would have been otherwise if this fact had not been established. It may be that the words "for the master's benefit" must be construed as including a case where no actual benefit has been realised; but to my mind it is plain that they cannot be left out of account, and that the fraud of the servant for which the master may be liable must at least have been intended by the servant to effair to the master's benefit. If it were otherwise, all that would have to be proved would be that the servant had committed a crime in the ostensible performance of his duties although with the intention of benefiting himself personally, and, it may be, of injuring his employer. I know no principle which supports such a view; and indeed the contrary is implied in the reasoning by which the master's liability has been affirmed in the reported cases. In all of these the facts were either (first) that the wrongful act was committed in discharging a duty which the servant owed to his employer, or (second) that the wrong was deliberately planned with the definite intention of benefiting the master. Were it otherwise we should have to affirm the master's liability where (1) a coachman deliberately drove over a person or animal that he could easily have avoided; or (2) a railway servant made the performance of his duty in removing a passenger, whom he knew that he had no right to remove, a pretext for avenging a private injury; or (3) a bar tender threw a customer into the street because they differed on some political issue. Such liability has been expressly or impliedly negatived in the earlier cases of which *Gilespie v. Hunter*¹ *Robson*² and *Wardrope*³ are fairly typical. We were referred to the case of *Lloyd*⁴ where the judgment of the Court of Appeal has recently been reversed in the House of Lords, and the dissenting judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J., given effect to. I see no difficulty in reconciling that decision with the views already expressed, although I do not find myself in entire accord with all the obiter dicta of the Judges. The view of the Lord Chancellor that a lawyer who employs a managing clerk to attend to the business of his clients contracts that he shall perform his duties faithfully and honestly was a sufficient ground for inferring responsibility. And I rather think that I should have reached the same result on the simple ground that the master had received the money of the client by the hands of a clerk and must account for it although it had in fact disappeared through the clerk's fraud. It is unnecessary, however, to pursue the matter further, because the decision has no bearing on the facts here. I have accordingly no hesitation in holding that the Lord Ordinary has erred in allowing an issue against the defenders, and that they are entitled to have the action dismissed.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. This is a question of relevancy. It seems to me that the whole actings of Mr Brown which are complained of by the pursuer, namely, the dismissal, the slander, and the antecedent malice, are alleged to have been originated, and to have been carried out, by Brown, without any intention of furthering the purposes or interests, real or imaginary, of the defenders. It was suggested that the averments did not exclude the case of Brown having acted from a conviction that, in the interests of the defenders, either the pursuer or Miss W. must go, and that he thought Miss W.'s retention most in the interest of the defenders. But no such case is made by the pursuer. The only case on record involves the proposition that a limited company, defending an action of damages brought for a slander uttered by its manager in the course of his employment, loses its right to plead that the occasion was privileged, not because of any malice on the part of the company itself, or of any person or persons with a general and unlimited authority to act for it, but because the manager who uttered the slander did so knowing that the charge it contained was groundless, and solely with a view to revenge himself for a private grudge against the person slandered. This is the only case which the record discloses, and it seems to me that none of the cases cited, which have been fully commented on by

Grant's
Trustees.

Succession—Heritable and Moveable—Jus Relictæ—Bond of trust company—Ex facie absolute assignation of bond in security of advances—Nature of cedent's reversionary interest.

A bond or deed of security of a trust company for £4000 bore that this sum was payable to A "or to his executors or assignees" at a term five years after its date, and that interest was to be paid by the company till repayment of the capital. A assigned this bond to the extent of £2500 to a bank; the assignation being ex facie absolute, but in reality (though there was no back-letter) in security of advances by the bank. On A's death his trustees paid up these advances, amounting to £1000, and obtained a re-assignation of the bond.

In an action to enforce her jus relictæ A's widow maintained that the bond was moveable; or, if this were not so, that quoad the £2500 A had, after the assignation, merely a claim for an accounting against the bank for the balance of that sum, and that this balance was therefore moveable.

Held that the widow was not entitled to jus relictæ to any extent out of the sum secured by the bond, in respect (1) that the bond was heritable quoad her claim; and (2) that the assignation to the bank did not alter the character of A's interest in the sum secured by the bond or any portion of it.

Executor—Incidence of debts—Liability of heritable bonds for debts—Debt secured on particular subjects—Succession—Jus Relictæ—Debts chargeable against jus relictæ fund.

A bond, which was moveable quoad the creditor's succession but heritable quoad his widow's jus relictæ, was assigned by him to a bank in security of advances.

Held (1) that, in a question with his widow claiming jus relictæ, the ordinary moveable debts of the deceased were chargeable solely against the fund available for jus relictæ, no portion of them being chargeable against the bond; but (2) that advances made by the bank on the security of the assignation formed a charge against the bond.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Hunter.

ON 25th May 1911 Mrs Mary T. G. Thom or Grant or Heath, with the consent and concurrence of her husband, Charles Johnstone Heath, brought an action against James H. T. Grant, the child of her former marriage with the deceased William Grant, farmer, Arbroath, and Mrs Jane Easton Beattie or Grant and others, the trustees acting under William Grant's trust-disposition and settlement. The conclusions of the action were, inter alia, for declarator that the pursuer was free and entitled to elect to take her legal rights as widow of William Grant out of the whole estate of which he died possessed, and for count and reckoning, and for payment by the trustees of such sum as should be ascertained to be due by them as the balance of their indebtedness to her in name of jus relictæ, terce, and whole other rights as widow foresaid.

Heath v.
Grant's
Trustees.

On 31st January 1912 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor finding that the pursuer was free to take her legal rights as widow of William Grant, and appointing the defenders as his trustees to lodge in process an account of their intromissions with his estate in order that the true balance due to the pursuer in name of jus relictæ, terce, and otherwise, from the estate might be ascertained.

An account was thereafter lodged by the trustees. In this account the amount of the moveable estate was brought out as £14,104, 5s., from which were deducted certain items including "bonds which are heritable as regards the widow, in virtue of the Act 1661, cap. 32, viz," two bonds or debentures of the Alliance Trust Company, Limited, for £1000 and £4000 respectively. These deductions being made, there remained a sum of £6604, 5s., from which were deducted in the account the debts due by the deceased per schedule of debts annexed to the inventory of the deceased's estate, funeral expenses, the expenses of confirmation, and other items, leaving a sum of £3289, 2s. 4d., which was available for, and to one-third of which the pursuer was entitled as, jus relictæ.

The bonds of the Alliance Trust Company for £4000 and £1000 were dated respectively 26th November 1907,* and 15th May 1908. Each bond contained an obligation by the company to pay interest half-yearly until the repayment of the principal sum. The term of repayment under the bond for £4000 was Martinmas 1912, and that under the bond for £1000 was Whitsunday 1912. Mr Grant died on 15th August 1909.

* This bond was in these terms:—"We, The Alliance Trust Company, Limited, a company duly incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, grant us to have borrowed and received from William Grant, Baronhill, Forfar, the sum of Four thousand pounds sterling, which sum we bind and oblige ourselves to pay to the said William Grant, or to his executors or assignees, within our registered office at Dundee for the time being, at the term of Martinmas Nineteen hundred and twelve, or upon such subsequent day as may hereinafter be mutually agreed on, with a fifth part more of the said principal sum of liquidate penalty in case of failure, and the interest on the said principal sum at the rate of four per centum per annum to the term of payment before specified, and in the event of the said loan being continued as aforesaid, at such rate thereafter, for the period of such continuance as may be agreed on, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment of the said interest at the term of Whitsunday next, for the proportion thereof which shall be due at that date, and the next payment of the same at the term of Martinmas following for the half year immediately preceding, and so forth by equal payments at the said two terms, yearly, termly, and continually thereafter, so long as the said principal sum shall remain unpaid, with a fifth part more of each of the said termly payments of liquidate penalty in case of failure in the punctual payment thereof. . . ."

Heath v.
Grant's
Trustees.

The pursuer lodged a note of objections to the defenders' accounts in which she stated, inter alia, the following objections:—(Obj. 1 (2)) "The bonds p. £1000 and £4000 with the Alliance Trust Company, Limited, are moveable estate, and would have been moveable estate according to the law prior to 16th November 1641. They ought, therefore, to be added to the jus relictæ fund." (Obj. 1 (3)) "To meet the event of the said bonds p. £1000 and £4000 being held not per se to form part of the fund for the pursuer's jus relictæ, it is explained that the bond p. £4000 was on 7th July 1909 assigned to trustees for the Royal Bank to the extent of £2500 by absolute assignation. An advance of £1000 was granted by said bank to the deceased on the faith of said assignation, and the bank undertook to account to the deceased and his executors for the balance of the sum recoverable by them under said bond after deducting the amount of the advance and interest thereon. The total amount of said advance at the date of deceased's death with interest accrued thereon was £1000 and interest £2, 10s. This sum forms a deduction from the sum recoverable by the bank under the bond assigned, and does not therefore fall to be deducted from or to diminish the fund for jus relictæ. Further, the balance of £1497, 10s. being a claim by the deceased against said bank is moveable as regards the deceased's succession. Pursuer is entitled to her third thereof." (Obj. 3) "The pursuer objects that the debts affecting the moveable estate are charged against the jus relictæ fund entirely; as the result of which the general moveable estate is relieved entirely of the debts which would naturally affect it. Pursuer claims that the debts which fall upon the executry fund should be borne by it proportionally, and that only a proportion thereof should be laid upon the fund which yields jus relictæ."

On 25th June 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) pronounced the following interlocutor:—" . . . (2) Finds that the bonds p. £4000 and £1000 respectively granted by the Alliance Trust Company, Limited, in favour of the deceased William Grant, do not pertain to the pursuer jure relictæ to any extent; (3) Finds that the pursuer is not entitled to claim jus relictæ out of the £2500 portion of the bond p. £4000, which the deceased on 7th July 1909 assigned in security of advances to trustees for the Royal Bank of Scotland, or out of the proceeds thereof in the hands of the bank or of the said trustees; (4) Finds that the said bank advanced to the deceased William Grant on the faith of said assignation £1000, and that the balance due by the deceased in respect thereof (after taking into account sums standing at the credit and debit of the deceased in the books of said bank), viz., £867, 15s., is a charge upon the portion of said bond p. £4000 assigned as aforesaid, and does not diminish the fund available for payment of jus relictæ; . . . (7) With reference to the third objection, finds that in a question with the pursuer the debts affecting the moveable estate fall to be borne entirely by the fund available for jus relictæ, and that exclusive of the said bonds p. £4000 and £1000, and all bonds and dispositions in security pertaining to the deceased William Grant: Therefore repels said objection"

* "OPINION.—In the course of the discussion which took place upon the objections for the pursuer and answers thereto for the defenders to the account, lodged by the defenders, showing the amount of the legal rights of the pursuer as widow of the late William Grant, a considerable number of

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, and Lord Cullen) on 22nd October 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—(1) The bonds were moveable quoad the pursuer's legal rights. This appeared from the fact that the bonds were taken payable to Mr Grant and "his executors or assignees" (which meant his personal representatives or assignees¹); and this feature of the deeds distinguished the present case from Dawson's Trustees v. Dawson,² and Bennett's Executrix v. Bennett's Executors.³ *Downie v. Downie's Trustees*⁴ was distinguishable in respect that there, as appeared from the Scottish Jurist report, the term for repayment of the bond occurred during the husband's lifetime. (2) Esto that the bonds were not in themselves moveable, the assignation to the bank withdrew £2500 from the bonds; and, thereafter, Mr Grant's right in that sum was a "personal right consisting in obligations."⁵ He had then points were adjusted by the parties. As, however, there must be a material alteration in the account to which effect will fall to be given by agreement or remit, I think it right to take brief notice of all the objections. . . .

"The second head of the first objection raised the most important point that has to be determined. Part of the estate of the late Mr Grant consisted of two bonds for £4000 and £1000 respectively, granted by the Alliance Trust Company, Limited, in favour of Mr Grant, his executors or assignees. The defenders have left these bonds out of their statement of the fund available for payment of jus relictæ on the ground that by the common law of Scotland such bonds are heritable, and that, although by the Act 1661, cap. 32, they are made moveable for certain purposes, they remain heritable so far as the fisc and widow's claims are concerned. The pursuer, on the other hand, maintains that the bonds would have been moveable according to the law prior to 16th November 1641, the date taken in the Act 1661.

"The bonds are granted by a Scots company, and bear interest from their date, interest being paid periodically prior to the date stipulated in the bonds for repayment of the principal sum. Interest had in fact been paid on both bonds during Mr Grant's lifetime. According to the institutional writers—I quote from Erskine, ii. 2, 9—'Personal bonds bearing interest were, by a general rule of our ancient law, accounted heritable, as quasi feuda because, by the fixed yearly profits arising from them, they bore some degree of resemblance to rights properly feudal.' The author then points out that bonds payable on a determinate date are deemed moveable, as the creditor is presumed to have an intention of realising his bond upon that date. This rule also obtained where there was a stipulation for interest being paid along with the principal sum. 'But if the bond was so conceived as to make the term of payment of the interest prior to the term of payment of the bond the sum descended to the heir, if the creditor survived the period at which the interest fell first due, though he died before the principal sum was payable; because he was, after the first term of payment of the interest, presently entitled to a yearly profit on his bond, which was accounted sufficient to make the bond heritable.' These words appear to me to be entirely applicable to the two bonds in this case. The pursuer, however, relied upon the circumstance that the sums in the bonds are made payable to the executors or assignees of the creditor, no merely a right to call upon the bank to account to him for that sum. *Bartlet v. Buchanan*¹ was not in point, for there the assignee had granted a recorded back-bond. (3) The Lord Ordinary was right in holding that the debt to the bank was chargeable against the bond assigned to it, but he was wrong in holding that the bonds were not liable for any part of the testator's debts. The bonds were moveable quoad succession; the testator's debts were chargeable on his succession; and, therefore, the bonds must be made available with the rest of the estate in payment of the debts.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The cases of Downie,² Dawson's Trustees,³ and *Bennett's Executrix*⁴ decided that bonds such as the present remained heritable as regards a widow's rights. (2) The question raised as to the £2500 was concluded against the reclamer by the decision in Bartlet v. Buchanan.¹ As the assignation here was in fact in security only, the absence of a back-bond was immaterial.

mention being made of heirs. She founded upon this as evidence that the creditor himself must be taken as having considered the sums in the bonds as moveable, and that therefore the rule as to their heritable character did not apply. I do not doubt that the ordinary destination in a personal bond was to A and his heirs, executors, or assignees. But the not mentioning of heirs does not exclude them; and I do not see why the destination actually used should not be read as giving the property to the executors in the event of there being no heir. The law as to the heritable character of personal bonds has been fully considered in the three cases of Downie,⁴ Macph. 1067, Dawson, 23 R. 1006, and Bennett, 1907 S. C. 598. In the first of these cases a mortgage by the Glasgow Waterworks Commissioners in favour of A B, his executors, administrators, and assigns, payable at a term three years after its date and bearing interest at 4 per cent payable half-yearly, was held heritable as regards the rights of the creditor's widow. There was, it appears, no expressed obligation to repay. Although this was so, the Lord President held that the mortgage was plainly of the character of an obligation to repay. I think the obligation was to repay those in whose favour the mortgage was granted, and that, therefore, I am bound by that case to hold the bonds of £4000 and £1000 heritable as in a question with the deceased's widow claiming her legal rights.

"The pursuer, however, maintains that as regards a portion of the bond for £4000 it ought to go to increase the fund available for payment of jus relictae. This argument arises in this way. On 7th July 1909 the deceased assigned this bond to trustees for the Royal Bank to the extent of £2500 by absolute assignation. Although in form absolute, the assignation was granted admittedly in security of advances to be made by the bank. At the date of his death the deceased was due a considerable sum to the bank. This sum was repaid by the defenders to the bank, who re-assigned the bond to them. The pursuer says that the effect of the transaction with the bank was that the deceased, after assigning the bond, had merely a right to an accounting from the bank so far as the £2500 is concerned, and that this claim for an accounting is moveable. The defenders, however, cited to me an old case, Bartlet, F. C., 21st February 1811, and 27th November 1812, as an authority for the proposition, which I think is sound, that where a debtor grants his creditors security for a debt, he does not thereby alter the character of the succession to him in the security subjects, or rather in his reversion thereto.

"In the last place, the pursuer argued that the debt to the bank ought

(3) The bonds could not be used in paying any part of the testator's debts, for the effect of so doing would merely be to increase the amount of the reclaimer's jus relictæ.¹ What was due to the bank should also be levied on the general estate and not, as the Lord Ordinary held, on the bonds.² Stewart v. Stewart,³ which appeared to be against this contention, was only an Outer House decision.

Heath v.
Grant's
Trustees.

At advising on 6th November 1912, the opinion of the Court was delivered by LORD CULLEN.—The pursuer and reclaimer is the widow of the late William Grant of Baronhill, Forfarshire, and the questions raised under the reclaiming note relate to the ascertainment of the amount of her jus relictæ.

Mr Grant, at the date of his death, held two bonds for £1000 and £4000 respectively, granted by the Alliance Trust Company, Limited, in favour of him and his executors or assignees. The date of the bond for £1000 is 15th May 1908, and the term of repayment under it Whitsunday 1912. The date of the bond for £4000 is 26th November 1907, and the term of to be met out of the subjects assigned. The defenders place the whole of this debt on the fund available for payment of jus relictæ. No authority upon the question was cited to me by either party. By disposing the bond to the extent of £2500 and interest thereon absolutely to trustees for the bank, the deceased burdened the £4000 bond with payment of such advances as the bank might make to him. I think, therefore, that if he had made a special gift of the bond the legatee would have succeeded subject to the burden of payment, and would not have been entitled to call upon the executors to pay off the amount due to the bank. In Bell's Principles, sec. 1936, the author says,—‘The heir or executor paying a debt secured on a particular estate or laid on a particular heir is entitled to relief.’ The cases referred to in support of this proposition appear to deal with debts secured on land. I do not, however, see why the same rule should not apply where a valid burden has been created over moveable estate. If this is sound, I think that the executor paying the secured debt out of executry funds must, in a question as to the proper distribution of the estate among parties interested therein, place the debt upon the affected fund. I am therefore of opinion that what was due to the bank should, for the purpose of estimating the pursuer's jus relictæ, form a charge upon the proceeds of the bond for £4000 to the extent to which it was assigned to the bank.

“III. The pursuer complains that the defenders have charged the whole of the moveable debts of the deceased against the estate available to meet her claim of jus relictæ, and not against the general moveable estate. The result in the present case certainly seems hard upon the pursuer. The words of the Act 1661, cap. 32, are, however, that no part of such bonds shall pertain to the relict jure relictæ where the bonds are made to the husband. I think that the defenders are right when they say that these words can only be given effect to by treating the bonds in a question of apportioning debt as though they were heritable. To apportion any part of the deceased's moveable debts upon the bond would have the effect, contrary to the Act, of increasing the widow's jus relictæ. I therefore repel this objection.

Heath v.
Grant's
Trustees.

Lord Cullen.

The bond for £4000 was in 1909 assigned by Mr Grant to trustees for behoof of the Royal Bank of Scotland to the extent of £2500. The assignation was ex facie absolute. There was no formal back-letter. But it is common ground that the assignation was granted in security of advances by the bank to Mr Grant. After his death his trustees and executors paid up the debt due to the bank and redeemed the security.

The first question raised is whether the two bonds in question fall to be treated as part of the deceased's moveable estate in the computation of the pursuer's jus relictæ. The Lord Ordinary has answered this question in the negative, and I agree with him. Under each of the bonds the principal sum is repayable after a term of years, and there is an obligation for payment of interest half-yearly during that period. I think it is clear on the authorities that money so laid out on bond and bearing interest falls to be treated as heritable in a question with the widow, and excluded from computation in ascertaining the amount of her jus relictæ. The pursuer sought to make a point to the effect that the bonds were taken in favour of Mr Grant and "his executors or assignees," and not in favour of his heirs, executors, and assignees. I see nothing in this. The same element was present and founded on in argument in the case of Downie,¹ referred to by the Lord Ordinary. The bonds in question are, by statute, moveable save quoad fiscum and jus relictæ. They thus pass to the executor for distribution, although the distribution is governed by a rule different from that which applies to other parts of the moveable estate.

The next question relates to the transaction with the bank regarding the bond for £4000. To the extent of £2500 this bond was assigned by Mr Grant to the bank by way of security. It was redeemed by his trustees and executors on payment by them of the amount of the debt due to the bank. The pursuer maintains that, esto the bond was originally heritable quoad jus relictæ, the effect of the security transaction with the bank was to render it moveable to all effects to the extent of the balance of the £2500 after meeting the debt to the bank. The ground advanced for this contention was that, as Mr Grant had divested himself of the bond by an ex facie absolute assignation to the bank, there remained nothing in bonis of him but a money claim to the said balance. This appears to me, as it did to the Lord Ordinary, to be an untenable contention. The position at Mr Grant's death was that he was the radical owner of the bond for £4000 which he had encumbered with a security in favour of the bank. The right to the bond belonging to him and thus encumbered passed, on Mr Grant's death, in the same way as would have passed the unencumbered bond had no security been created over it in favour of the bank.

The next question (raised under the reclaiming note by the defenders and respondents) is whether the foresaid debt due to the bank falls to be charged against the £4000 bond on part of which it was secured, or against the moveable estate in which the pursuer is interested. The Lord Ordinary has held that it falls to be charged against the bond, and I agree with him.

Had the security given for the debt to the bank been heritable there is, on Nov. 6, 1912. the authorities, no room for question that the heritage so burdened would have descended to the parties entitled to it in the succession of the deceased ^{Heath v. Grant's Trustees.} cum onere. The principle on which these authorities proceed appears to me to be equally applicable to encumbrances which have been specially imposed on moveable property of a deceased, as was held by Lord Kyllachy in the case of Stewart.¹

The next question relates to the mode in which the general debts due by the deceased, that is to say, debts which ex lege fall on his moveable succession in a question inter hæredes, have been treated in the trustees' account. The trustees have deducted the whole of these debts from the amount of the gross moveable estate as ascertained for the purpose of computing the jus relictæ. The pursuer's contention is that a rateable share of the debts should be borne by the bonds above mentioned. Now, in a question with the pursuer, these bonds fall to be treated as heritable, in the same way as they would have been prior to the Act of 1661, and the jus relictæ falls to be computed on that footing. That being so, it appears to me that, as the Lord Ordinary has held, the trustees are right in stating their account as they have done. Were the pursuer's contention to be given effect to, it would result in the amount of her jus relictæ being increased by the addition of a part of the two bonds which, in a question with her, are heritable and therefore excluded from computation.—[His Lordship then dealt with another question with which this report is not concerned.]

Under an antenuptial marriage-contract the trustees were directed to pay the income of the funds settled by the wife to her husband during his life should he survive her and, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, to pay these funds (1) to the children of the marriage if and when they attained majority; or (2) should the wife predecease her husband without leaving issue, or should issue survive her but predecease her husband without attaining majority, to such persons as the wife might appoint, and failing appointment, "to her heirs and executors whomsoever."

vived by her husband and by one child. The child died in infancy during the lifetime of the husband.

On the death of the husband the funds were claimed (1) by his testamentary trustees, on the ground that the child, being also the wife's heir, had acquired a vested right therein, which had passed to the husband as its heir, and (2) by relatives of the wife as her heirs, at the date of (a) the child's death, or (b) the husband's death.

Held on a construction of the terms of the marriage-contract (rev. judgment of Lord Skerrington, dub. Lord Johnston), that the funds fell to be paid to the heirs of the wife as ascertained at the death of the husband.

Gregory's Trustees v. Alison, (1889) 16 R. (H. L.) 10, distinguished.

1st Division.
Lord
Skerrington.

BY antenuptial marriage-contract executed between Dr and Mrs Muirhead in 1873, Dr Muirhead made certain provisions for his wife in the event of her survivance, and undertook to pay £5000 to the children of the marriage on his death, if such children attained majority, in the case of sons, or attained that age or married, in the case of daughters. He also assigned to trustees a policy of insurance in trust to apply the proceeds thereof in payment of the above provision to the children; and, if there were no children alive at the dissolution of the marriage, or if the children predeceased the surviving spouse before attaining majority, or (in the case of daughters) marrying, then, if Dr Muirhead predeceased his wife, the trustees (after implementing the provisions in favour of Mrs Muirhead) were directed to pay the proceeds of the policy to Dr Muirhead's "executors or assignees whomsoever," and, if Mrs Muirhead predeceased, the trustees were directed to retrocess Dr Muirhead in the policy.

Mrs Muirhead (whose maiden name was Janet Jane Jameson Torrie), on the other hand, assigned to the same trustees her whole estate and effects "now belonging to her and which shall pertain and belong to her during the subsistence of the said intended marriage" in trust (1) to pay the income to her during her life; (2) if she predeceased her husband, to pay the income to him; (3) "upon the death of the longest liver of the spouses" to pay the funds to the "child or children to be procreated of the said intended marriage if they shall then have attained majority if a son or sons, or attained majority or be married if a daughter or daughters," in such shares as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint, or, failing appointment, equally among them, declaring that if any child died before his or her share was payable that share should be paid to his or her issue, whom failing, to the surviving children; and (4) if the marriage was dissolved by the death of Dr Muirhead, without leaving issue, or if the issue died in the lifetime of their mother before attaining majority in the case of sons, or attaining majority or marrying in the case of daughters, the trustees were directed to pay the funds to Mrs Muirhead. The fifth purpose was in these terms:—"In the event of the said intended marriage being dissolved by the death of the said Janet Jane Jameson Torrie without leaving issue, or if the issue of the marriage shall all die during the lifetime of their father before attaining majority if a son or sons, or before attaining majority or being married if a daughter or daughters, that the said trustees shall, after the death of the said Claud Muirhead, pay over and convey the trust funds and property or the residue thereof held by them to such person or persons as the said Janet Jane Jameson Torrie shall by any testamentary writing or other deed or instrument executed by her have directed and appointed, and failing such direction and appointment, then to her heirs and executors whomsoever." Nov. 12, 1912.

Mrs Muirhead died intestate, and without executing any such deed of direction or appointment, in 1874. The only child of the marriage, Janet C. M. Muirhead, died in infancy in 1875. Dr Muirhead died in 1910, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement. Muirhead's Trustees v. Torrie.

On the death of Dr Muirhead a multiplepointing was brought by the marriage-contract trustees to determine whether the funds settled by Mrs Muirhead, which consisted of moveable estate amounting to £5613, had vested (1) in her child, or (2) in her heirs other than her child, at (a) her death; or (b) the child's death; or (c) Dr Muirhead's death. Mrs Muirhead's heirs as at the date of her death or at that of her child were her brothers, Robert J. Torrie, Thomas J. Torrie, and Colonel Lawrence J. Torrie. Colonel Lawrence J. Torrie died in 1909, survived by children, and leaving a settlement in favour of his two brothers as his trustees. Mrs Muirhead's heirs, as at the date of Dr Muirhead's death, were Robert J. Torrie, Thomas J. Torrie, and the children of Colonel Lawrence J. Torrie.

A claim was lodged by Dr Muirhead's testamentary trustees, and another was lodged by Robert and Thomas Torrie as individuals, and as trustees of Colonel Lawrence Torrie.

Dr Muirhead's trustees maintained that the funds settled by Mrs Muirhead, not having been disposed of by her, vested in Janet C. M. Muirhead, her child and heir ab intestato; that, on the child's death, Dr Muirhead succeeded to the same as her heir; and that they were conveyed to the claimants as trustees by his settlement.

The claimants Robert and Thomas Torrie maintained that "the said child was not Mrs Muirhead's heir and executor within the meaning of the said destination; and that, under that destination, her brothers, who were her nearest relatives, were the heirs and executors to whom her estate was destined in the event of failure of children of the marriage. They also maintain that during the lifetime of the said child the right to Mrs Muirhead's estate under the said destination did not vest; and that either (1) on the death of the said child, the destination took effect, and the right thereunder vested at that date; and that Mrs Muirhead's brothers, who were then her heirs and executors, acquired a vested interest in her estate, settled in the said marriage-contract; or (2) that vesting under the said destination was postponed till the death of the said Dr Muirhead, and that Mrs Muirhead's estate then fell to be divided and paid over in the proportions of one-third to each of her surviving brothers, and one-third to the issue of her brother who was then dead. As a further alternative, these claimants maintain that the right to Mrs Muirhead's estate vested in the said Janet Catherine Mary Muirhead subject to defeasance in the event of her predeceasing Dr Muirhead before attaining majority or being married; and that the said event having occurred, her right was divested in favour of these claimants as Mrs Muirhead's heirs and executors." Their claim was:—"To be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio in the following shares, namely, one-third to the claimant Robert Jameson Torrie as an individual; one-third to the claimant Thomas Jameson Torrie as an individual; and one-third to the said Robert Jameson Torrie and Thomas Jameson Torrie as trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Colonel Lawrence Jameson Torrie; or, otherwise, the claimants Robert Jameson Torrie and Thomas Jameson

Nov. 12, 1912. Torrie, as individuals, claim to be ranked and preferred, each to one-third share of the fund in medio."

Muirhead's
Trustees v.
Torrie.

These claimants pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said Robert Jameson Torrie, Thomas Jameson Torrie, and the deceased Colonel Lawrence Jameson Torrie, being the heirs and executors of Mrs Muirhead, to whom her estate was destined in the said marriage-contract failing issue of the marriage, the claimants should be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio, in terms of the first alternative of their claim. (3) The fund in medio having vested, on the death of the said Janet Catherine Mary Muirhead, in Mrs Muirhead's heirs and executors as at that date, the claimants should be ranked and preferred in terms of the first alternative of their claim. (4) Separatim, the claimants Robert Jameson Torrie and Thomas Jameson Torrie, as individuals, being each entitled to one-third share of the fund in medio, ought to be ranked and preferred in terms of the second alternative of their claim.

After the case was advised in the Inner House the claim for the claimants Torrie was amended by the addition of the words printed above in italics, and a claim was also lodged for the children of Colonel Lawrence J. Torrie to one-third of the fund in medio on the ground that Mrs Muirhead's heirs fell to be ascertained at Dr Muirhead's death, and that the fund was divisible into three shares, of which one was payable to these children, and one to each of Robert and Thomas Torrie.

On 14th November 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the claim for Dr Muirhead's trustees, and ranking and preferring them accordingly.*

* "OPINION.—The question in this action of multipointing and exoneration is as to the meaning and effect of a trust purpose or stipulation contained in the antenuptial contract of marriage, dated April 1873, entered into between the late Dr Claud Muirhead and Miss Jameson Torrie, afterwards Mrs Muirhead. There is nothing unusual either in the language of the contract or in its substantial provisions. The words to be construed occur in the fifth of the trust purposes relating to the property put in trust by Mrs Muirhead. These funds are said to be wholly moveable and to be now worth about £5600. In the events which have admittedly happened the trustees are now bound to pay and convey the wife's trust funds 'to her heirs and executors whomsoever.' The various events, the concurrence of which brings this direction into force, are—(1) the death of Mrs Muirhead before her husband and his subsequent death. She died in February 1874 and he died in June 1910. (2) The death of the whole issue of the marriage during their father's lifetime before attaining majority or marrying. The only child of the marriage, a daughter, died in infancy in 1875. (3) The failure of Mrs Muirhead to appoint 'by any testamentary writing or other deed or instrument executed by her' some person or persons to whom the trust funds should be conveyed. She executed no such writing either mortis causa or inter vivos. If Mrs Muirhead's 'heirs and executors whomsoever' are to be sought for at the time of her death the beneficial fee of the trust fund vested in her daughter as Mrs Muirhead's heir in mobilibus ab intestato to his daughter, and it now belongs to the claimants George Muirhead and others as Dr Muirhead's testamentary trustees. On the other hand, if the expression 'heirs and executors whomsoever' means the persons who would have been entitled to succeed to Mrs Muirhead as her heirs in mobilibus ab intestato if she had survived her child, then the parties designated must be sought for either immediately after the child's death in 1875, or alternatively as at the date of distribution in 1910. In either of

Muirhead's
Trustees v.
Torrie.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The construction put on the marriage-contract by the Lord Ordinary defeated the intention of the contracting parties as appearing in the deed, viz., that, failing issue of the marriage, Dr Muirhead's estate should pass to his family and that Mrs Muirhead's should pass to her family. Accordingly, at whatever date vesting was held to take place, the child was not entitled to take as heir or executor. Under the third trust purpose of the marriage-contract it was plain that children of the marriage could not acquire a vested interest until their majorities and until both of their parents were dead,¹ and the primary gift to the children being dependent on these conditions, it was highly improbable that the these latter views the fund would belong to Mrs Muirhead's brothers, the claimants Robert Jameson Torrie and another. These two claimants are Mrs Muirhead's sole surviving brothers, and they also represent a third brother who died in 1909.

"The argument presented by the counsel for the Messrs Torrie was a very able one, but it proceeded upon what seems to me to be a fallacious assumption, viz., that the destination in favour of Mrs Muirhead's 'heirs and executors whomsoever' being merely testamentary, must be construed in the same way as if it had occurred in an ordinary will. The clause in question is undoubtedly testamentary in respect that it confers no contractual jus quæsitum upon the 'heirs and executors' (whatever that expression may mean) enforceable by them against the settler Mrs Muirhead. It is also testamentary in respect that the 'heirs and executors' might probably be entitled to confirmation in terms of section 3 of the Executors (Scotland) Act, 1900, as executors-nominate qua universal disponees of Mrs Muirhead. But the clause is primarily contractual. It forms part of a contract, one term of which compelled Mrs Muirhead to divest herself of the legal estate, possession, and control of her whole fortune, both present and future, in favour of trustees. Accordingly it was proper and natural that she should expressly stipulate as to the events on the occurrence of which she or her representatives should be entitled to a retrocession.

"I do not propose either to quote or to state in my own words the purport of the five trust purposes applicable to Mrs Muirhead's fortune. It is enough to say that, in my opinion, these purposes read as a whole and together show that the children of the marriage were not intended to acquire by contract any vested right to their mother's fortune except conditionally on their surviving both parents, and also attaining majority or marrying. If I am right so far, it follows that, notwithstanding the birth of a child of the marriage, Mrs Muirhead retained a vested right to the beneficial fee of her fortune under burden of her husband's contingent liferent and subject to divestiture in the event of a child of the marriage acquiring under the contract a vested right of fee. According to my reading of the marriage-contract Mrs Muirhead stipulated by purpose 5 that this vested right should pass to her assignees inter vivos, whom failing, to her assignees mortis causa, whom failing, to the persons who would have been entitled to succeed to her if she had died intestate. Such a stipulation seems to me very natural and also germane to a contract of the kind under consideration. It is, in my opinion, irrelevant to say that, in the absence of express stipulation, the law would have accomplished the same results. Mrs Muirhead was entitled to make her own bargain and to state it in express language. Further, if parties should have intended that on the failure of these conditions the children should take as heirs. As to the destination to heirs, if there was vesting a morte under the destination, it must be in virtue of the principle of vesting subject to defeasance; but the application of that principle was confined to cases where there was no preferable object in existence between the claimant and his right but merely the chance of such an object coming into existence,¹ and, therefore, there could be no such vesting in the heirs during the lifetime of the child. The vesting in Mrs Muirhead's heirs was therefore necessarily postponed till the child's death, and the child could not take as heir. The heirs under a destination could be ascertained only at the date of vesting,² and hence, while the heirs of a testator were ascertained at his death where vesting was a morte testatoris, on the other hand where, as here, vesting was postponed till a subsequent date, the heirs could not be ascertained before that date.³ *Gregory's Trustees v. Alison*⁴ did not lay down any rigid rule of construction,⁵ and that case was distinguishable on the facts in respect that (1) there was there no trust conveyance, and (2) vesting was held to take place on the death of the predeceaser of the spouses. The Lord Ordinary was in error in holding that the rule of construction applicable to contractual provisions was different from that applied to testamentary gifts, and in any case the destination to Mrs Muirhead's heirs was really testamentary.⁶

Trustees v.
Torrie.

purposes 4 and 5 had been left to implication it might have been argued that in the events which happened, viz., the birth and survival of only a single child, purpose 3 conferred upon that child a vested right as at birth subject to defeasance in favour of its own issue, if any.

"For these reasons, I do not think that this contract falls to be construed exactly in the same way as if it had been a will, nor do I see any unlikelihood in Mrs Muirhead making a stipulation in favour of her heirs in mobilibus. Even, however, if one were to write a will as much as possible on the lines of the contract I am not satisfied that there is any inconsistency between (1) a testamentary gift subject to a suspensive condition in favour of the children of the marriage who might attain majority or marry and survive both parents, and in favour of the issue of predeceasers, on the one hand, and (2) an immediate testamentary gift in favour of the whole children of the marriage who might survive Mrs Muirhead, but subject to a resolutive condition or defeasance in the event of the former gift coming into operation.

"I am of opinion, without reference to authorities, that Dr Muirhead's trustees fall to be preferred. There is, however, authority for the view that expressions such as 'heirs and executors' refer prima facie to persons answering this description at the date of the death of the de cuius. In the present case there is at best conjecture available to impose a secondary meaning upon technical legal language.

"For these reasons I sustain the claim for Dr Muirhead's trustees, and repel the claim for the Messrs Torrie."

Argued for the respondents;—Under the marriage-contract Mrs Nov. 12, 1912. Muirhead was not divested of her proprietary right in her estate except in so far as was required for the purpose of the contract, viz, ^{Muirhead's Trustees v. Torrie.} the provision to the children of the marriage.¹ As no child acquired a vested right under the contract, she retained the property in her estate, and as it was in bonis of her at her death, it passed (as would other property of which she had not disposed) to her heir ab intestato, namely, her child. The fourth and fifth purposes of the marriage-contract trust merely expressed what would have resulted under the law of succession had they been absent. The words “heirs and executors” were clearly words of succession. It was well settled that prima facie a testator’s “heirs and executors” were to be ascertained at his death,² and there was nothing in the present deed to displace that rule. Accordingly, the child being Mrs Muirhead’s heir, the right in the settled funds vested on her death in the child. All that could be urged against the respondents’ contention was that the child might have taken in another character. Gregory’s case,³ however, decided that there was immediate vesting in the child under a marriage-contract where that child was entitled to the funds both as child of the marriage and as heir under the destination-over to heirs failing children acquiring a vested right; and that decision was precisely in point. The cases relied on by the reclaimers were distinguishable. In *Baillie’s case*⁴ the question arose in regard to a destination of heritage, and other parties besides the heirs were called under the destination-over. The decision in *Johnston’s Trustees*⁵ turned upon the fact that the destination was to “next of kin,” which, unlike the word “heirs,” was not a designation referring to succession. Neither of these cases afforded any support to the reclaimers’ contention that an unnatural meaning should be attributed to words of succession such as “heirs and executors.”

At advising on 5th November 1912,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The question in this case depends upon the construction of a clause in the antenuptial contract of marriage between the late Dr Claud Muirhead and Miss Janet Torrie, who became his wife. I must regard it as a question of difficulty, since I have the misfortune to differ from the Lord Ordinary; but having considered it with the anxiety which that difference of opinion produces, I have come, for myself, to the conclusion that the clause in dispute expresses a perfectly simple and intelligible purpose in sufficiently plain language.

The Lord Ordinary has observed that it is material to consider that this question arises upon the construction of a marriage-contract and not of a will. But I do not know that that makes any material difference in the present case. I so far agree with his Lordship—although I do not draw the same inference as he does—that every passage which requires construction must be interpreted with due reference not merely to its immediate

Nov. 12, 1912. context, but also to the main scope and purpose of the instrument in which it occurs. Now, if that be a sound view, the only observation which arises at the outset, with reference to the purposes of the deed in question, is that the scheme was that each of the spouses should settle funds, by ante-

Muirhead's Trustees v. Torrie.
Lord Kinnear. nuptial contract of marriage, for the benefit of themselves and of the children of the marriage, and that on the failure of these purposes the funds settled by each should go to the settler, or his or her heirs or representatives, and not to the other spouse and the representatives of that other spouse. That seems to me to be the general scheme; but then I think that does not go very far, and we must determine the true meaning of the actual words used by Mrs Muirhead.

The facts to which we are to apply the provisions of the settlement in question are that the spouses married in 1873, and that the wife died in 1874 survived by the only child of the marriage, who died in infancy on the 13th February 1875. Therefore the wife died leaving a child who died in infancy. The husband survived until 1910, and during the period of his survivance the income of the funds settled by his wife was paid to him according to the provisions of the marriage-contract. The question arises now between the testamentary trustees of Dr Muirhead on the one hand, and the nearest heirs in mobilibus of Mrs Muirhead as at the date when Dr Muirhead died, on the other, as to which of these two competing parties is entitled to the funds settled by Mrs Muirhead.

Now, I think that depends upon the fourth and fifth purposes of that portion of the marriage-contract which contains Mrs Muirhead's settlement; and the true effect of these purposes is to be ascertained by interpreting the words used according to their ordinary and natural meaning. We must therefore consider the meaning of the provisions, in the first place, apart from any perplexities which beset the legal conceptions of vesting and the rules of construction which may have been established by previous decisions regarding other deeds.

The first question, and I think the last, is, What do the words in question mean? Now, by the third purpose the trustees are directed, on the death of the longest liver of the spouses, to "pay over or convey the said trust funds and property to the child or children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, if they shall then have attained majority if a son or sons, or attained majority or be married if a daughter or daughters; and if not, then upon their respectively attaining majority if a son or sons, or attaining majority or being married if a daughter or daughters." Now, I apprehend that that is quite clearly a conditional gift to the children. There is no direct gift to the children at all, but there is a direction to pay to them in a certain event, and in a certain event only,—if they attain majority, or, in the case of daughters, if they marry, then the trustees are to pay to them; and, so far, there is no other gift in their favour at all. Then, by the fourth purpose, it is declared, in case the marriage should be dissolved by "the death of the said Claud Muirhead without leaving issue, or if the issue of the marriage shall all die during the lifetime of their mother before attaining majority if a son or sons, or before attaining majority or being married if a daughter or daughters, that the said trustees shall pay over and convey the said trust funds and property or the residue thereof held by them to the said Janet Jane Jameson Torrie." After that event, the whole money Nov. 12, 1912.

settled by her is to go back to her. Then comes the clause which is applicable to the event which has happened, namely :—"In the event of the Muirhead's said intended marriage being dissolved by the death of the said Janet Jane Trustees v.
Jameson Torrie without leaving issue, or if the issue of the marriage shall Torrie.
all die during the lifetime of their father before attaining majority if a son Lord Kinnear.
or sons, or before attaining majority or being married if a daughter or daughters, that the said trustees shall, after the death of the said Claud Muirhead, pay over and convey the trust funds and property or the residue thereof held by them to such person or persons as the said Janet Jane Jameson Torrie shall by any testamentary writing or other deed or instrument executed by her have directed and appointed, and failing such direction and appointment, then to her heirs and executors whomsoever."

Now the whole question is, How are the trustees to carry out that perfectly explicit direction? If the children had survived and attained majority, the trustees would have been in a position to convey to them. The children having failed to acquire any interest under the settlement by the death of the only child in infancy, then the trustees are directed, on the death of Dr Muirhead, to pay over the funds to the heirs and executors of Mrs Muirhead unless she has otherwise disposed of these funds by a last will and testament. The Lord Ordinary has held that under that provision no right under the contract of marriage vested in the children, and I entirely agree with him. I take it to be settled, as Lord President Inglis said in the case of Bryson's Trustees v. Clark,¹ that when nothing is expressed in favour of a beneficiary except a direction to trustees to convey to him on the occurrence of a certain event and not otherwise, and, failing him, to other persons as conditional institutes, then, if he does not survive the period, he takes no right under the settlement. But while I refer to the authority of that statement, at the same time, I desire rather in this case to consider what, according to the ordinary signification of language, this provision actually means; and I think it plain enough that it means that the children are to get nothing unless they survive their parents and attain majority, and, in case they do not, the trustees on Dr Muirhead's death are to pay the funds to the wife's heirs and executors.

But the Lord Ordinary has held that, notwithstanding that the marriage-contract gives nothing to the children, Dr Muirhead took a right upon his child's death as her heir in mobilibus, and that the right which he so took is carried by his testamentary settlement to his trustees. The question, therefore, is whether the wife meant that, in the event which has happened, the money was to go to the child's heirs, i.e., to Dr Muirhead and his relatives, or whether it was to go to her own heirs who must be different persons altogether. Now I take it that, upon a plain construction of the words, she did not intend that, in the event described, her money should go to the children's heirs, who would be quite different persons from hers and who would be in no way related to her, because, in the event supposed, the children's heirs must be the father or other heirs in mobilibus claiming through him. I think that such a disposition of the fund was necessarily

Nov. 12, 1912. what Mrs Muirhead intended to prevent, and she directs the trustees, therefore, in that event, to pay the fund not to the children but to "my nearest heirs and executors." It is said—and said quite truly—that in strict language nobody can have more than one heir or one body of heirs, and that is the person or class of persons to whom the succession opens after the death of the deceased. In strict language there is no other heir than that; and therefore it is said that you must inquire only who, according to the law of moveable succession, would have taken Mrs Muirhead's moveable estate as her heir in mobilibus. And the answer is that that must have been the child who died in infancy. But then, although that is a perfectly correct statement of law, the word "heirs," as we know in a great variety of cases, is not necessarily so strictly interpreted. I do not think there is any exposition in the institutional writers or by any of the lecturers on conveyancing explaining what is meant by the term "heirs" which does not begin by saying that it is a flexible term and that it means different things according to different circumstances. And therefore I should have no difficulty derived from the strict interpretation of the word to which I have adverted in holding that, when the settler in this case spoke of her nearest heirs and executors, she meant the persons who might stand in the relation of heirs and executors to her at a particular period—to wit, the period of her husband's death.

I do not think it is necessary to go further for authority for that interpretation than the case of Gregory's Trustees v. Alison,¹ upon which the respondents mainly based their argument, because in that case Lord Watson, in the passage to which our attention was specially directed by the respondents, laid down the canon of construction exactly in accordance with the view which I have indicated. He says, after examining two English cases decided in the House of Lords, that these were not Scotch cases, "but in neither did the judgment of the House proceed upon any specialty of English law, and the canon of construction which they recognise appears to me to be applicable to the language of a Scotch deed which has not acquired technical significance, and falls to be construed according to the intention of the maker." Now the provision that his Lordship was engaged in construing was a direction that in a certain special event the whole funds and estate settled by the husband should "fall to and become the property of his own (i.e., the husband's) nearest of kin." Lord Watson says these are not words which have acquired any technical significance, and therefore they must be construed according to the intention of the maker; and then he proceeds to state more specifically what the rule of construction is. He says it "is simply this, that in cases where a testator or settler, in order to define the persons to whom he is making a gift, employs language commonly descriptive of a class ascertainable at the time of his own death, he must prima facie, and in the absence of expressions indicating a different intention, be understood to refer to that period for the selection of the persons whom he means to favour. In my opinion the rule has no other effect than to attribute to the words used their natural and primary meaning, unless that meaning is displaced by the context."

Accordingly, we have to consider whether, in the clause under construction, what Lord Watson has called the primary meaning of the words is or is not displaced by the context. I think, in the first place, we have to consider this—that there is, as I have said, no direct gift to anyone. The gift is made in the form of an express direction to the trustees to pay and make over. Well, they are told to make over to the children if they survive; if not, to the nearest heirs and executors of the wife. I think that is a plain direction to pay to persons alive, and capable of taking, at the time it is carried out. It cannot mean that the trustees are to pay to the children. The children are dead. And there is no previous gift to the children which would enable the words to be construed as covering a gift to their heirs. The trustees are not told to pay to the heirs of the child. They are told to pay to the heirs and executors of the wife; and I take it that that expression, in the position in which it occurs in the deed, means something other than the children and the heirs of the children. If you pay to the heirs of the children, then, I apprehend, the plain purpose of the provision is defeated, the provision being intended to give the money to the wife's relations and not to the relations of the children. I therefore come to the conclusion that the true interpretation of the direction to the trustees is that they are to pay to the persons who, at the time when the gift takes effect, are the persons who stand in the relation of heirs in mobilibus to Mrs Muirhead, and these are the surviving brothers and the children of a deceased brother.

The case of *Gregory v. Alison*¹ was, in effect, decided in the opposite way from that in which I consider that this question should be decided; but then that was because the question of construction arose in a different way. In the first place, the conveyance to be construed in that case—a conveyance of the funds and estate belonging to Dr William Gregory—was to be found in a postnuptial contract of marriage, and the words of conveyance involved a direct gift to children already born and not to children nascituris. There was a direct conveyance of the estate in life to the surviving spouse and in fee to the children of the marriage; and there were children in existence and capable of taking at the time when the contract was executed. Then there followed certain declarations upon which the question in dispute really arose. In the first place, there was a reservation of power to the spouses severally to dispose of their own estate by testamentary writing; and, in the second place, there was a provision that in the event of there being no children alive at the death of the predeceasing spouse, or of the decease of all such children in the lifetime of the survivor, the estate belonging to the said William Gregory should fall and become the property of his own nearest of kin. Two questions were raised. One was whether the vesting in the children of the marriage, which had undoubtedly taken place, was subject to defeasance owing to the first of these two declarations; and the second was whether it was actually defeated by the second declaration, which provided that, in the event therein mentioned, the estate should go to the nearest of kin of Dr Gregory. The House of Lords held that it was defeated

Nov. 12, 1912. by neither, but, upon this ground, that there was undoubted vesting of the fee in the children, and that there was nothing in either of these clauses inconsistent with that vested right remaining undefeated. The only question which has any bearing upon that which we have to consider in the present

Muirhead's
Trustees v.
Torrie.

Lord Kinnear. case was whether the ultimate gift to the nearest of kin of Dr Gregory was inconsistent with the idea of vesting having already taken place and still subsisting in the child who was his sole nearest, or one of the nearest, of kin; and the House of Lords held that it was not. On this point Lord Watson observes, "I can find nothing adverse to that interpretation of the deed" (i.e., the interpretation of the deed according to the primary meaning of its language) "unless it be the suggestion that it is improbable the spouses should have intended to make a direct conveyance to their children and also to include them in the destination to their 'nearest of kin.' That is a kind of probability which has frequently been put forward without success in cases of this description; and wherever it is, as here, unsupported by the context, it can only afford material for conjecture." But the ground for our construction of the present instrument is of a totally different character. It is not that it is improbable that Mrs Muirhead should have intended to include in the destination of her estate to her nearest "heirs and executors" children to whom she had already given birth. That is not the question. The question is whether she, by these words, intended to make a new gift to the children, to whom nothing had yet been given in the event which had occurred, and to defeat the gift which she had given to persons expressly in consequence of the failure of such children to survive the period at which they could take. The question is, When she said, "Pay to the children of the marriage if they survive to attain majority or marriage and not otherwise, and if they do not survive to attain majority or marriage then pay to my nearest heirs and executors," did she mean by that, "Pay to my children as my heirs and executors just as if they had survived and attained majority," or did she mean, "Pay to the persons who then stand in the relation of my heirs and executors"? I think that she meant her direction to be understood in the latter sense; and while I agree that the question is one of considerable difficulty, I think this conclusion is the only one which is consistent with the expressed intention of the deed.

I am not, however, able to follow the Lord Ordinary's argument, which is that, although there was no vesting in the children under the contract of marriage, the father's trustees nevertheless take through them. His Lordship seems to hold that, although there was nothing given to the children, their heirs in mobilibus may, nevertheless, take in the same way as if the funds had vested in them and been carried by succession to their heirs, because he holds that the right to the fee of Mrs Muirhead's fortune still remained in herself subject to divestiture only in the event of the children of the marriage acquiring a vested right to the fee under the contract. Accordingly, he sustains the claim of the respondents based on the view that Mrs Muirhead's estate remained vested in her, as if she had executed no marriage-contract at all, and passed by the ordinary laws of succession on her death. I cannot assent to that view of the case. Of course, if it were possible to say that all the trust purposes had lapsed because of there being no one to take under the provisions of the marriage-contract, then the radical right of Mrs Muirhead would, no doubt, have survived. But Nov. 12, 1912. there is no lapsed trust so long as there is any effective direction to the ^{Muirhead's} trustees for the benefit of someone other than the truster. Here the truster ^{Trustees v. Torrie.} quite plainly directs her trustees to give to her children in a certain event, and in case that event does not occur, then to give to certain other people. ^{Lord Kinnear.} The only question, then, that seems to me to arise is, What did she mean by that conditional institution of others? If it is a gift in favour of ascertained or ascertainable persons, then it is a gift which takes effect by her own deed. She divested herself in favour of trustees for the benefit of ascertainable persons; and I cannot see, therefore, that there is any room for the theory that the estate is to be treated as intestate succession of Mrs Muirhead at her death.

I am very sensible of the inconvenience which may be occasioned—and always must be occasioned—by holding, as I do, that the vesting of a right settled by will or by marriage-contract is suspended for an indefinite period. But I do not think we have anything to do with the consideration of that question. I do not think that we can ascribe to the settler an intention to make a complete and logical scheme which will, in all probable events, result in the most convenient disposition of her estate. In my opinion we can only ascribe to her the intention to do what she did, namely, to provide for a certain event in terms which are clear or become clear when the deed is construed; and if there be no difficulty in the application of her language to the event which has occurred, we have no concern with the questions which might have been raised in other events which do not come within the meaning of the words.

On the whole matter, I am prepared to uphold the claim of the Messrs Torrie; but I think the record will require to be amended. It follows from what I have said that I think the persons favoured are the nearest heirs in mobilibus of Mrs Muirhead at the time when the direction in their favour takes effect; and therefore I rather imagine there will be no practical difficulty or difference in the working out of that view, because the children of Colonel Lawrence Torrie will take under the law of moveable succession and not under their father's settlement, as would be the case if the heirs were ascertained at an earlier date.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I also have experienced great difficulty in coming to a decision in this case, and, having had the advantage of reading and considering the opinion to be delivered by my brother Lord Mackenzie (in which your Lordship in the chair intimated to me your concurrence) and fully recognising the weight of the argument on which that opinion proceeds, I should have been prepared to accept your Lordships' judgment. But in respect that that judgment is a reversal of the Lord Ordinary, I feel bound to say that, had I been sitting alone, I should have come to the same conclusion as his Lordship has done, though perhaps on somewhat different grounds, and that I still have considerable doubt as to the propriety of reversing his decision.

I do not propose to enter, in these circumstances, at length upon the case. I think that the result of the five heads of Mrs Muirhead's side of the marriage-contract is, as stated by the Lord Ordinary, that the

Nov. 12, 1912. children of the marriage took no jus quæsitum, under the contract, in their mother's estate unless they attained majority or, if daughters, married, and unless they survived their last surviving parent. But in the event of that not happening, Mrs Muirhead reserved a right to dispose of her own estate at will, and failing her executing any dispositive deed, left it to go to her heirs and executors whomsoever. It may be said that the law of intestacy is not left to operate ipso jure, but that it is invoked. But the reclaimers have to maintain something different, and perhaps more difficult, viz., not that the law of intestacy is invoked, but that there is a substitution, not of the lady's heirs and executors whomsoever, but of those who would have been her heirs and executors had she survived the date of her own death by the space of, as it so happened, thirty-six years. Lord Watson has said in Gregory's case,¹ that it is an accepted rule "That in cases where a testator or settler in order to define the persons to whom he is making a gift, employs language commonly descriptive of a class ascertainable at the time of his own death, he must prima facie, and in the absence of expressions indicating a different intention, be understood to refer to that period for the selection of the persons whom he means to favour." I doubt extremely whether any such expressions can be found here. Personally I am not aware of any case, though, having regard to Lord Watson's language, I assume they must have occurred, in which, not being concerned with a destination of heritage, they have been found. One case indeed was referred to—Lord Hawke's case,²—which, so far as the minority opinion goes, is an exception. But though I think I should myself have concurred in the very weighty opinion of Lord Kyllachy, concurred in by Lord Adam and by your Lordship in the chair, the result, and it must not be forgotten that it is the conclusion of a minority of the Court, is arrived at on consideration of a set of provisions wholly different from the present. And the contrast appears to me to support the view I am inclined to hold in the present case rather than the reverse. I feel that to extract indications of "a different intention" from Mrs Muirhead's provisions goes perilously near making a will for her, merely because the natural result of what she has said is, we are all agreed, not what she would most probably have desired had the present situation of matters been fully before her mind; though I can imagine another set of circumstances in which, could she have been appealed to, she would have greatly regretted that such a conclusion must perforce—for different circumstances raising the same question would not justify a different judgment—have been reached. Had the circumstances been that Miss Muirhead, instead of dying as an infant, had survived and married, but though reaching say, even the age of thirty-five, had died childless survived by her husband and father, she would have been debarred on your Lordship's judgment from settling anything on her husband—can we be sure that that result would have been what Mrs Muirhead really intended? My doubts are indeed strengthened by the consideration that the same judgment must, as I have said, fit all sets of circumstances which might have occurred. Here is another set. Mrs Muirhead might have left no child, and her husband have survived her for the same thirty-six years. Nov. 12, 1912. Her heirs and executors of 1874 presumably would not be, and in fact were not, those she would have left had she survived till 1910. Could it then have been contended that Mrs Muirhead intended, by a provision expressed as that in question, to effect the disheirison of her heirs and executors in the natural acceptation of the term, and the holding up of her estate for the benefit of those who would have been her heirs had she lived as long as her husband. I desiderate expressions which clearly indicate an intention to give a non-natural and unusual meaning to the words used, and not finding them, I prefer the natural and usual.

I do not enter into a consideration of the authorities beyond saying that in my opinion the case is wholly distinguishable from Lord Hawke's case,¹ but that the decision in Gregory's case,² which I read somewhat differently from your Lordship in the chair, is much more nearly in point.

It is for these reasons that I entertain the grave doubts which I have ventured to express.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The decision of this case depends upon the construction to be put upon the fifth purpose of the marriage-contract. The reclaimers say that Mrs Muirhead's heirs and executors whomsoever are to be found as at the date when the marriage-contract trustees are directed to pay over the trust funds. The respondents maintain that the heirs and executors are to be ascertained as at the date of her death.

The view of the Lord Ordinary is that the fifth purpose as it occurs in a contract is not to be construed in the same way as if it had been in a will. In my opinion the duty of the Court in either case is to find out what was meant by the language used. After having made careful provision in the preceding purposes for the issue of the marriage in the events therein contemplated, the fifth purpose provides for the events which did happen, viz. :—(1) The dissolution of the marriage by the death of the wife ; and (3) The death during the lifetime of the father of the issue of the marriage before attaining majority or being married. It was in contemplation of these events, which have happened, that the further provisions of the fifth purpose were made. These were obviously intended to provide for a situation which had not previously been dealt with. It was on the occurrence of these events that the trustees, who held the funds, were directed after the death of the husband to pay over the trust funds in accordance with the instructions which follow, that is to say, either to such person or persons as the wife should by any testamentary writing or other deed or instrument executed by her have directed and appointed, and, failing such directions and appointment, then to her "heirs and executors whomsoever." We were referred to the case of *Gregory's Trustees*² as an authority for the proposition contended for by the respondents that prima facie the term "heirs and executors" is descriptive of a class to be ascertained on the death of the wife. Lord Watson, however, points out that the general rule applies only in the absence of expressions indicating a different intention.

Nov. 12, 1912. It was argued by the respondents' counsel that to interpret the term "heirs and executors" as referring to any other period than the death of the wife was to give the words a non-natural meaning. I do not think so. The direction is to pay after the death of the husband to the "heirs and executors" of the wife. The natural meaning of this direction as used in the marriage-contract appears to me to be that the word "heirs" means the heirs of the wife at the date when the payment is to be made. It was argued that the last words of the fifth purpose indicate no intention on the part of the wife other than this, that if the whole of the preceding purposes fail she wished her funds to go as the law directs, i.e., to her heirs in mobilibus ab intestato. This is really to ascribe to the words no meaning at all, because without them the same thing would have happened. According to the argument submitted on behalf of the reclaimers, the last words operate as a clause of return to Mrs Muirhead's own family. This I think was what was intended, and I think the language of the clause is sufficient to give effect to the intention. It is not probable that, after making careful provision for the various contingencies in relation to the issue of the marriage under which vesting was postponed, it was intended by the last words of the fifth purpose to vest the fee in the issue of the marriage on their mother's death. If the fee of the wife's funds did so vest, then Dr Muirhead would have been entitled immediately on the death of his daughter to have demanded a conveyance of the trust funds and to have terminated the trust. This is contrary to the main provisions of the contract. No doubt Mrs Muirhead might have executed a testamentary writing by which she could have given a vested right to her daughter, but this does not tell against the construction of the clause according to which it was contemplated that the appointment by will should be to some person or persons other than the issue of the marriage. If this is not the true construction it is difficult to see why the power of appointment by will should be expressed to be contingent upon the predecease of the issue of the marriage. There have no doubt been cases in which it has been held that there was vesting in the child of the marriage by virtue of an ulterior destination to the father's next of kin. *Gregory's Trustees*¹ was such a case. In that case however the postnuptial marriage-contract was in different terms. There was no conveyance to trustees but a direct destination to those entitled to take. The provision there as regarded the whole funds and estate belonging to the husband was that they "shall fall to and become the property of his own next of kin." That case therefore is not inconsistent with the view I take of the true meaning of the contract here.

As is pointed out by Lord Kyllachy in *Thompson's Trustees*² there is not any legal anomaly in ascertaining the heirs of a deceased person otherwise than at the time of his death. In such cases as the present the question is not technical but simply one of intention. I am accordingly unable to agree in the view taken by the Lord Ordinary, and am of opinion that the claim for Robert Jameson Torrie and Thomas Jameson Torrie, which however requires amendment, should be sustained. One-third will go to the family of Colonel Lawrence Jameson Torrie, as representing their father, and thus being heirs in mobilibus. They do not take under their father's settlement, as he died in 1909 and therefore predeceased Dr Muirhead who died in 1910.

Limited, v.
Spenser
Whatley,
Limited.

In a complicated action with regard to the maintenance, reconstruction, and hiring of railway wagons, the proof lasted twelve days, and there were two adjournments, each of some months' duration. The successful party having obtained decree with expenses, the Auditor, in taxing his account, allowed (1) fees of thirty guineas to senior counsel for the first day of the proof and for the first day's resumption of the proof after each adjournment; (2) charges for tabulated statements, prepared for the use of counsel, of facts and figures compiled from the books and other documents in process; and (3) fees as an ordinary witness to the successful party's Glasgow agent.

Objection having been taken to these three items, the Court sustained the objection to the allowance of thirty guineas to senior counsel, and in lieu thereof allowed twenty-five guineas, but with regard to the other objections refused to interfere with the Auditor's decision.

Is cross actions, which were conjoined, between Hurst, Nelson, & Company, Limited, Motherwell, and Spenser Whatley, Limited, London, arising out of a number of contracts for the maintenance, reconstruction, and hiring of railway wagons, a proof was led which lasted twelve days, with adjournments on two occasions during its course, on the first occasion from 28th May till 19th October 1909, and on the second occasion from 23rd October 1909 till 18th January 1910.

The merits were disposed of on 9th March 1910 by an interlocutor in the Outer House, with a finding as to expenses modified to three-fourths, in favour of Hurst, Nelson, & Company, the pursuers in the

Hurst,
Nelson, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Spenser
Whatley,
Limited.

The Auditor having reported on the pursuers' account of expenses, the defenders presented a note of objections to his report in which they stated, inter alia, the following objections:—

Objection I., to fees of thirty guineas allowed to senior counsel for the first day of the proof and for the first day of each resumption thereof after adjournment. They maintained that each of these fees was excessive to the extent of five guineas.

Objection II., to the allowance of charges with reference to certain numbers of process, viz., [omitting the sums charged]:—"153. Framing statement from Spenser Whatley's Truck-running Books (Nos. 73 and 74 of pro.) and Working Rly. Wagon Book showing when wagons at Spenser Whatley's depots in 1905-06, and 07, and calculation. 29 shs. figs. 3 copies thereof 29 shs. figs. ea. 154. Framing statement of runnings of wagon No. 686 from 1st Jan. 1904 to 15th April 1909 taken by Hurst, Nelson from Spenser Whatley's Working of Running Wagons Books D. and E. (Nos. 77 and 78 of pro.) and from Truck Running Books (Nos. 73 and 74 of pro.). 7 shs. figs. Three copies thereof. 7 shs. figs. ea. 216. Framing history of repairs and repainting of wagons belonging to Spenser Whatley, Ltd., executed by Hurst, Nelson, & Co., Ltd., during currency of the contracts for repairs, 356 large folio and figured. Three copies thereof, Do. 221 and 222. Framing (2) statements from invoices and Spenser Whatley's Repair Books showing repairs and paintings since December 1907 to April 1909—together, 254 shs. figs. Three copies thereof, 254 shs. figs. ea. 241. Framing statement of comparison of reports . . . by Mr Crosbie Turner, writer, Glasgow. 75 shs. figs. Three copies thereof. 75 shs. figs. ea." The objectors stated:—"The said items are objected to in toto as not being necessary or competent evidence in the case—the books from which they were compiled being there to speak for themselves, and the documents charged for not having been competently proved—and as not being properly chargeable as judicial expenses against an opponent. These documents are spoken to only by Mr Crosbie Turner, the local solicitor in the case, who does not speak to them except as collated from other documents; and they are rather of the nature of criticisms on evidence or memoranda explanatory of evidence than themselves evidence."

Objection VI., to the allowance of two guineas a day for five days, and expenses, to Mr Crosbie Turner, the pursuers' Glasgow agent. The objectors stated:—"Mr Turner was in attendance as the pursuers' law-agent and gave his evidence on 18th January 1910, and the defenders therefore object to more than one day being charged, and submit that the above £10, 10s. should be disallowed to the extent of £8, 8s., and also that the above £2 for expenses should be reduced to the first-class railway fare of 7s. 6d., and therefore disallowed to the extent of £1, 12s. 6d."

Parties were heard before the First Division (without the Lord President) on 19th October 1912.

* The circumstances of these cross actions are narrated in the report of a subsequent action between the same parties, Hurst, Nelson, & Company, Limited, v. Spenser Whatley, Limited, 1912 S. C. 1041, at p. 1042.

The argument for the objectors is disclosed in their submissions, Nov. 12, 1912, quoted supra. They referred to the undernoted authorities.¹

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The case was a peculiarly heavy and complicated one, and £7000 was at stake in the cross actions. The proof was lengthy, and demanded examination of details during eight or ten years with reference to hundreds of wagons. The fees, therefore, allowed to senior counsel were not unreasonable in view of what had been laid down in the most recent decision as the true test, viz., remuneration upon the case as a whole.² The case of *Goodwins, Jardine, & Co., Limited, v. Brand & Son*³ was distinguishable, because in that case the proof was short and the case was not nearly so complex as the present. In a case more nearly comparable with this one fees which, taken over all, were substantially the same as the present had been allowed.⁴ (2) The alternative to preparation of the statements objected to would have been to supply, for counsel and the Court, copies of great masses of documents and of books which were withdrawn from process for current business, and this would have led to much greater expense. (3) As the respondents were only entitled to charge for the attendance of their Edinburgh agents as agents, the Auditor had properly treated their Glasgow agent as an ordinary witness.

At advising on 12th November 1912,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—The first of these objections relates to the fees allowed to senior counsel in the Outer House. The proof lasted twelve days, during which there were two adjournments, the first from 28th May till 19th October, and the second from 23rd October to 18th January following. In addition to a fee of ten guineas for consultation prior to the proof the Auditor has allowed thirty guineas for the first day of the proof, and the same fee for the first day of each of the adjourned diets. The defenders object to these three latter fees as excessive to the extent of five guineas each. The question of the principle to be applied by the Auditor in dealing with counsel's fees was under consideration by this Division of the Court in the recent case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Glenboig Union Fireclay Company, Limited.⁵ It was there laid down that the question of counsel's fees must, within certain limits, always be a question of degree, and that they must be considered not necessarily with a view merely to the day for which the fee is allowed but with a view to remuneration for the case as a whole. It was there recognised that there are certain limits, and no case could be referred to in the argument in this case in which a fee larger than twenty-five guineas had been allowed to senior counsel by the Auditor as against an unsuccessful litigant for the first day of a proof. While reserving Hurst, Nelson, & Co., for a larger fee being allowed here for the first day. This is what was Limited, v. allowed in the cases of *Goodwins, Jardine, & Company*¹; Earl of Kintore

 Spenser v. *Pirie*²; and Boyd & Forrest v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway,³ Whatley, all exceptionally heavy cases. It necessarily follows that no larger fee Limited. should be allowed for the other days in question. In coming to this con-Lord Mac- clusion full weight has been given to the fact that the fees of only two kenzie. counsel have been allowed. Therefore, without saying anything that will in the least weaken the principle laid down in the Glenboig case,⁴ I am of opinion that the first objection should be sustained.

The second objection relates to a group of charges for certain statements made up for the purposes of the proof. The argument against these statements may be summarised thus: That they were a mere digest of documents already in process; that although they might have been of use to counsel yet they are not such as form a legitimate charge against an opponent; that certain of them contained matter which was of the nature of criticism or comment on evidence already led, and that the documents were unnecessary and not proved. Obviously the extent to which the preparation of such documents is legitimate must depend entirely on the circumstances of the particular case in hand. We are able to judge of the circumstances of this case because there was a hearing in the Inner House extending over many days. Certain of the matters in dispute in the Outer House were not reopened, as the facts had been sufficiently ascertained to enable the parties to realise which side was right, but it was evident from the documents laid before us that it was essential to collect and tabulate the materials in order to present the case to the Court in an intelligible state, and to avoid an amount of detail which would have been intolerable. I have examined the productions here objected to and, keeping in view especially the claim of damages made by Spenser Whatley & Company of £2751, I am unable to take the view that the Auditor should have disallowed any of them. Those which were objected to with most effect are Nos. 221, 222, and 241 of process, especially No. 241. If I had been able to take the view that these were papers prepared for the purpose of presenting in print what were really points in argument, or of the nature of comment or criticism, they would not have been allowed. I do not so regard them. On a consideration of the proof I think that the statements referred to are sufficiently proved. It was argued that in any view the charge should be limited to copying fees only, and that drawing fees should not be allowed. I do not think we should interfere with the discretion of the Auditor in such a matter. If the documents are allowed I think it necessarily follows that it was legitimate to make the number of copies allowed in practice. This objection should therefore, in my opinion, be repelled. . . .

Objection six is to allowances made to Mr Turner, the Glasgow agent of the pursuers. It was, however, explained that there were not in the account any charges for Mr Turner's attendance as agent, and that he had been dealt

LORD KINNAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I also concur. But I should like to add that while I accept the consideration which guided the Court in the case of *Caledonian Railway Company v. Glenboig Union Fireclay Company*¹ as a most important consideration in determining the proper fees to be paid to counsel, and one which is quite properly applicable to the present case, I do not think it by any means the only consideration, and I do not suppose your Lordship intends to represent it as such. I think there are other considerations, which have been taken into account in the cases which have been before the Court, especially in the course of the last few years, and it is on consideration of all of these cases that I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship.

THE COURT sustained the first objection and reduced the fees in question to twenty-five guineas each; and, subject to that deduction, decerned in favour of the pursuers for the taxed amount of their account of expenses.

Magistrates
of Edinburgh
v. Union
Billposting
Co., Limited.

The Company lodged answers, and on 3rd August 1912 the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills in vacation (Kinnear) pronounced an interlocutor ordering the Company to be wound up.

The Company reclaimed, and on the calling of the case in Single Bills of the First Division on 16th October 1912, counsel for the petitioners objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, and argued;—A winding-up order pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation was equivalent to an order pronounced by one of the Divisions,¹ and was therefore final so far as the Court of Session was concerned. If an interlocutor granting such an order was reclaimable, the provisions of the Act with reference to winding-up proceedings during vacation would be rendered nugatory.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The Act contained in section 181, subsection 2, when read with the Fourth Schedule, an exhaustive statement of orders pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation which were not to be subject to review, and it followed that every order other than those therein specified was subject to review. An order for the winding-up of a company was not among those specified, and therefore it could be reclaimed against.

At advising on 12th November 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the city of Edinburgh, presented a petition in the ordinary form for the winding-up of the Union Billposting Company, Limited. The usual order for intimation and service having been pronounced, the petition came before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation after the inducis had expired, and his Lordship, on 3rd August, pronounced an interlocutor ordering the Company to be wound up. This is a reclaiming note against that interlocutor; and the point was taken, for the petitioners, that the reclaiming note was incompetent.

an appeal from any order or decision of the Court in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction.

(2) Provided, in regard to orders or judgments pronounced in Scotland by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation, that—

- (i.) No order or judgment under the provisions of this Act specified in the first part of the Fourth Schedule to this Act shall be subject to review, reduction, suspension, or stay of execution; and
- (ii.) Every other order or judgment (except as hereinafter mentioned) shall be subject to review only by reclaiming note, in common form, presented within fourteen days from the date of the order or judgment.

Provided that orders or judgments under the provisions of this Act specified in the second part of the Fourth Schedule to this Act shall, from the dates of those orders or judgments, and notwithstanding any reclaiming note against them, be carried out and receive effect until the reclaiming note is disposed of by the Court."

The Fourth Schedule, Part I., is headed, "Orders pronounced in vacation in Scotland which are to be final," and Part II. is headed, "Orders pronounced in vacation in Scotland which are to take effect until reclaiming note disposed of." A winding-up order is not included among the orders enumerated in either part of the Schedule.

¹ 8 Edw. VII. cap. 69, sec. 135; London County and Westminster Bank, Limited, 1911 S. C. 1073.

The jurisdiction of the Lord Ordinary to wind up a company depends upon the 135th section of the Companies (Consolidation) Act 1908. That section has already been under judicial interpretation,¹ and, in accordance with the decision there given, there is no question that the Lord Ordinary has jurisdiction to pronounce an interlocutor ordering the winding-up of a company. But section 135 per se does not deal with the competency of a reclaiming note against such an interlocutor. That, however, is dealt with by section 181, which says that "Subject to rules of Court, an appeal from any order or decision made or given in the winding up of a company by the Court under this Act shall lie in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as an appeal from any order or decision of the Court in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction." "The Court" there, means the Court of Session in either Division, and it would mean that the ordinary rules apply that apply to appeals to the House of Lords. Where, however, the Court is described as the Lord Ordinary during session or, in time of vacation, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, that introduces the ordinary rules as to reclaiming notes against decisions of Lords Ordinary; and undoubtedly a reclaiming note is competent against any interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills.

But section 181, subsection (2), contains a special proviso as regards orders or judgments pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation in the following terms :—[His Lordship quoted the subsection].

Now, when you come to the schedule you find: "Part I. Orders pronounced in vacation in Scotland which are to be final": and among the orders enumerated there you do not find an order directing the winding up of a company. In the same way, in Part II., again—which enumerates orders "to take effect until reclaiming note disposed of"—you do not find it. It seems to me that the statute has dealt specially with those things which it thought necessary to deal with specially. And this particular case is not one of the cases which are dealt with specially. And then, for everything else, it says that the ordinary rules for reclaiming notes are to obtain. It follows, therefore, I think quite clearly, that this reclaiming note is competent.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the matter is clearly and conclusively provided for by section 181.

LORD JOHNSTON.—In this application for compulsory winding-up of the Union Billposting Company, the Town-Council of Edinburgh, as chargers on an extract decree, on 18th July 1912 obtained an order for intimation. Answers were lodged by the Company, but the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, vacation having commenced, having considered the petition and answers, on 3rd August granted an order for compulsory winding-up. The Company on 15th August reclaimed. Is the reclaiming note competent, or is the Lord Ordinary final, so far at least as this Court is concerned?

The Court having jurisdiction to wind up companies registered in Scotland is, under the Companies Act, 1908, section 135, in time of vacation the

Magistrates
of Edinburgh
v. Union
Billposting
Co., Limited.

Ld. Johnston.

It was, I think, accepted that the orders of the permanent Lord Ordinary, where there has been a remit, would be subject to review in ordinary course, unless the Act contained some distinct proviso to the contrary. Not only does it not do so, but it makes the subjection to review of such interlocutor matter of express enactment. For section 181, subsection (1), says that an appeal from any order or decision made or given in the winding-up of a company by the Court under this Act shall lie in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as an appeal from any order of the Court in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction. The Court, where there is a remit, is the permanent Lord Ordinary. And though "appeal" is not, in the ordinary language of our Courts, the appropriate term for the process of review of a Lord Ordinary's order or decision, it is made quite clear that it is used as equivalent to "process of review." For subsection (3) goes on to provide that the mode of reviewing a permanent Lord Ordinary's order, &c., shall be limited to reclaiming note presented within fourteen days.

Now if the order or decision of a permanent Lord Ordinary sitting in session, and fully seized with the business of the liquidation, is yet subject to review, it would be an unexpected result of these provisions regarding the Court having jurisdiction in winding-up, and would on general considerations be anomalous, that the order or decision of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, called in ad hoc, during vacation, and having no necessary acquaintance with the business and progress of the liquidation, should, as contended by the respondents in the reclaiming note, be final. If it was so intended, one would expect to find some very precise declaration to that effect. Instead of that we have in subsection (2) the provisions, first, that no order of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills specified in the first part of Schedule 4 to the Act shall be subject to review; and second, that every other order shall be subject to review, only by reclaiming note presented within fourteen days. As the order in question is not among those specified in the first part of Schedule 4, this would appear to conclude the question. But then it is said that the second provision is coupled with the rider that orders or judgments of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills specified in the second part of Schedule 4 shall not be stayed by reason of a reclaiming note being taken against them. The order in question is not among the orders so specified. But this does not lead to the result that it is not reviewable, but only to the result that if brought under review in the mode defined by the statute the ordinary consequence follows, viz., that its effect is stayed till the reclaiming note is disposed of.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT repelled the objection to the competency of the reclaiming note, and sent the case to the Roll.

Reparation—Negligence—Dangerous animal—Vicious dog—Contributory negligence—Patting unknown dog.

In an action of damages brought against the owner of a dog for personal injuries caused by its biting the pursuer, the defender maintained that the pursuer had been guilty of contributory negligence in that he, although the dog was unknown to him, had patted it.

Held that this did not amount to contributory negligence, and damages awarded.

Proof—Proof of facts subsequent to raising of action—Damages for injuries caused by dog—Proof of dog's conduct subsequent to raising of action.

In an action of damages brought by a person bitten by a dog against its owner, observed, per the Lord Justice-Clerk, that evidence of attacks made by the dog on other persons after the date of the raising of the action was admissible for the purpose of showing that the dog was of a vicious disposition.

In May 1911 William Gordon, shoemaker, Cromarty, with the consent of his father as his curator-in-law, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Cromarty against Robert Mackenzie, hotel-keeper, Balblair, near Invergordon. The pursuer's claim was for £100 as damages for "personal injury sustained by pursuer through a dog belonging to the defender, and which he well knows to be of a vicious nature, being negligently allowed to be unchained or [not] kept in proper custody, and which on 9th April 1911 as pursuer was standing on the public road near defender's residence at Balblair, attacked him and severely bit him on the cheek and lips and tore his clothes."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having been bitten by a dog which belonged to the defender, and which was known by him to be of a vicious disposition, he is entitled to compensation for his injuries from the defender.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having interfered with and irritated the defender's dog, and the said dog having hitherto been of a quiet and friendly disposition, the action should be dismissed, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. In the course of the proof the pursuer proposed to lead evidence that the dog had bitten a lady on 22nd December 1911. The defender's agent having objected to this evidence on the ground that the incident had happened since the raising of the action, the Sheriff-substitute (MacWatt) sustained the objection.

The facts established in the proof are set forth in the following interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute on 24th January 1912:—"Finds (1) that on the occasion libelled, and on the public road, the pursuer was severely bitten by the defender's dog, which was known to the defender to have bitten other persons previously, and to be vicious; (2) that the defender was in fault in allowing the dog to be at large; (3) that the pursuer, who was a stranger to the dog, was patting the dog at the moment of the occurrence; (4) that the pursuer was in fault in so doing; (5) that the pursuer has

Mackenzie.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 15th November 1912.

At the hearing counsel for the respondent ultimately admitted that they were unable to maintain that the appellant in patting the dog had been guilty of contributory negligence.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case divides itself into two parts, as all cases necessarily do where there is an allegation that the pursuer has contributed by his own negligence to the accident that happened. As regards the second part of the case—namely, the question of contributory negligence—it was not in the end contended on behalf of the defender that there was such negligence on the part of the pursuer; and in any case I am very decidedly of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute erred in holding that there was anything of the kind.

The dog apparently was in the habit of being outside the door of the defender's house and of wandering about the street. Now, if the dog was dangerous—and that is the assumption we must proceed on on the question of contributory negligence—it was wrong to allow it to go about the streets

* "NOTE.— . . . I come to the conclusion that in point of fact the pursuer was patting the dog when the thing occurred. In so acting towards a dog to which he was a stranger I think he was doing a rash thing, and was in fault. No prudent person will touch another's dog in the street unless he knows that it is of an amiable character. Many a dog, if touched by a stranger, will bite—either through fear or vice—which would not if left alone. Now the effect of pursuer's action is, in my opinion, this—that it is impossible to say that the dog would have bitten had pursuer not interfered with it; and it is, therefore, impossible to affirm that the damage was directly due to the fault of the defender. It is, of course, equally impossible to say that the occurrence was in fact due to the pursuer's contributory negligence, as the bite might have been given even had pursuer not touched the dog. But it is, in my opinion, a case where sibi imputet applies. As the pursuer has failed to show that he was injured directly through the fault or negligence of defender, the defender falls therefore to be assoilized. I regret this result, because pursuer was rather severely bitten, and will be marked for some time, if not for life. If I had decided in his favour I should have assessed the damages at £35. . . ."

alone. All that can be maintained against the pursuer on the evidence Nov. 15, 1912. upon that matter is that he had stretched out his hand to pat the dog or had actually patted it. That is said to be a thing that nobody should do to an unknown dog on the street. I cannot assent to that for a moment. The public are entitled to expect that a dog that is allowed to wander about the street unattended is not a dangerous dog; and I cannot hold that a person who when a dog approaches him pats it or puts out his hand to pat it, either from friendliness or it may be in order to conciliate it, is guilty of contributory negligence.

The pursuer being free from blame, the only other question is whether the defender is at fault in allowing such a dog to wander about the street. [His Lordship reviewed the evidence, and found that the dog bit the pursuer and was, to the knowledge of the defender, dangerous.]

I should like to say, however, before closing, that I think the Sheriff-substitute erred in not allowing the evidence of the witness which was objected to because the incident on which her evidence was based happened after this action was raised. I think that, in order to prove that a dog is a vicious dog, it is perfectly competent to show that it not only committed the act complained of but that it did similar things to other people and put them in danger, the tendency of this evidence being to indicate that the act complained of was not an isolated incident, such as may happen once in the lifetime of a well-behaved dog, but that the dog was disposed to be vicious. I hold that that is evidence that the Sheriff-substitute should have allowed. But I think there is enough in the evidence to enable us to decide the case without getting the evidence of this lady. I therefore move your Lordships to alter the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion, and on the same grounds. I agree with your Lordship in holding that it is sufficiently proved by trustworthy evidence that the defender's dog was a dangerous dog, and that that was known to him. Now, if that is so, it is well settled that a man who chooses to keep a dog of that character keeps it at his own peril, and that if it bites anyone he will probably be liable for the consequences. Therefore I quite agree with the learned Sheriff-substitute so far as his first and second findings are concerned.

In the Court below the defender set up a case of contributory negligence. When a defender does this, I apprehend the burden of proof is upon him, and that that burden is exactly similar to the original burden which rested on the pursuer at the beginning of the case. This being so, I think that on the facts the defender has entirely failed to discharge the burden. The alleged fault of the young man is that he patted this dog. The Sheriff-substitute lays it down that "no prudent person will touch another's dog in the street unless he knows that it is of an amiable character." If that be intended as a statement of personal opinion, or as a practical rule of wise conduct with regard to dogs, I should be disposed to agree with it; but if it is put forward as a doctrine affecting the law of civil liability for negligence upon which we are to proceed, then I demur to accepting the doctrine. It is obviously a matter on which opinions may differ; but the Sheriff-substitute seems to have reached his conclusion on the ground that there is

Nov. 15, 1912. a legal rule to the effect stated in the sentence I have quoted, for just before it he says that the pursuer was patting the dog and that "in so acting towards a dog to which he was a stranger, I think he was doing a rash thing, and was in fault." I am unaware of any case, and none was cited, where contributory negligence was held to have been established upon so slender a basis as that which is here suggested. The point was quite properly maintained by junior counsel at our bar, but his senior frankly admitted that the Sheriff-substitute's decision on this point was untenable. Accordingly, I disagree with the fourth finding of the Sheriff-substitute. Instead of that, we should find that the defender has failed to prove that the pursuer's actings materially contributed to the occurrence, and award damages. I agree in thinking that £35 is a fair sum to award.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I concur with your Lordships on the same grounds.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I also agree.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the said interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact in terms of the first three findings in fact in the said interlocutor appealed against, and find in fact (4) that the defender has failed to prove that the pursuer materially contributed to the injury sustained by him: Find in law that the defender is liable to the pursuer in damages: Therefore assess the same at the sum of £35, and decern."

Expenses—Tender—Order for proof coinciding with tender—Expenses of preparation for proof—General Regulation No. 3 appended to Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876.

The pursuer of an action obtained an order for proof but, before the interlocutor granting the order was signed, the defender lodged a tender. The tender having been accepted decree was granted in terms thereof, the pursuer being found entitled to expenses.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Dewar) that, an order for proof having been pronounced, the Auditor was entitled to include among the expenses allowed to the pursuer the expense incurred by him in preparation for the proof.

1ST DIVISION. (REPORTED ante, 1912 S. C. 1235.)

Lord Dewar.

In conjoined actions at the instance of two separate pursuers against the owners of the s.s. "Balduin" the defenders, having made a tender to the pursuers jointly in settlement of their claims, were required, if they desired to make their tender valid, to apportion the sum tendered between the pursuers.

Thereafter, in one of these actions, which was at the instance of John S. Boyle, owner of the steam trawler "Glenogil," against Fred Olsen, the owner of the "Balduin," the Lord Ordinary delayed pronouncing an order for proof for three days to allow the defender an opportunity of considering what revised tender he was prepared to make. Nov. 15, 1912.

Boyle v.
Olsen.

No tender having been lodged, on 16th July 1912 an order for proof was granted, but before the interlocutor was signed by the Lord Ordinary a minute of tender was lodged by the defender. The tender having been accepted by the pursuer, an interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills, on 21st August 1912, granting decree in terms of the tender and acceptance, and finding the defender liable to the pursuer in expenses up to the date of the lodging of the tender.

The defender lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report on the pursuer's account of expenses, in so far as he had allowed certain charges for preparations for proof.*

On 31st October 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) sustained the defender's objections and granted decree for the taxed amount of expenses less the sum objected to.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 15th November 1912.

Argued for the reclamer;—The lodging of the tender was in fact subsequent to the granting of the order for proof; but, even if it were not, the expenses fell, in the circumstances, to be taxed as if that order had been duly pronounced.¹ Accordingly the charges for preparing for proof—which could not be delayed as the salved ship was a foreign one—fell, in terms of the General Regulations,² to be Boyle v.

Olsen.

Argued for the respondent;—The Lord Ordinary was right in sustaining the objections to the Auditor's report, for the Auditor had failed to exercise his discretion. He had apparently regarded himself as bound by the over-strict interpretation which he had put on the terms of Regulation 3. The pursuer was aware, when enrolling for an order for proof, that the defender was considering the apportionment of the joint tender, previously made, and the tender was being signed when the motion was made for an order for proof. Expenses of preparation for proof could not be bona fide incurred if a tender, which it was known was being considered, was made simultaneously with the order for proof.¹ If these expenses, then, were not bona fide expenses of preparation for proof, they were expenses of preliminary investigations, and such expenses could not be charged against an opponent.² Even if chargeable, they were not in conformity with those allowed by the Table of Fees.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this is a very clear case, and that the Auditor here was quite right. I do not think the Lord Ordinary would have interfered with the Auditor unless he had thought he ought to be influenced by the opinion of Lord Salvesen in the Outer House in the case of Walker v. Barclay.¹ Of course a decision of one Lord Ordinary in the Outer House does not bind another Lord Ordinary. But I need not say anything about Lord Salvesen's decision, because I think each of these cases must be decided upon its own merits. That this case comes within the words of the Act of Sederunt, 15th July 1876, I have no doubt. Here there was an order for proof pronounced, and I am quite willing to give the defenders the benefit of the doubt and to treat the tender as synchronous with the order for proof being pronounced. By an order for proof it is shown that the case demanded proof if the facts were not admitted, and I think the meaning of the Act of Sederunt is quite clear that by an order for proof being pronounced it is shown that there was a case requiring investigation. That being so, when expenses are found due to the pursuer the intention is that that should carry the expenses of investigations so far as necessary, even although those investigations were made prior to the order for proof being pronounced, and although, owing to the further conduct of the parties—the defender having made a tender—the proof itself never in fact came to be led. I think the defender here had himself to blame, because he could have put in his tender at such a time as to have put the pursuer in bad faith when he applied for an order for proof. If the tender had been put in and had been brought to the knowledge of the pursuer, I do not proof of the matters in the record between the parties), although taken before the raising of an action or the preparation of defences, and although the case may not proceed to trial or proof, may be allowed where eventually an interlocutor shall be pronounced either approving of issues or allowing a proof."

think he could then, without considering the tender, have rushed in to get an order for proof. Nov. 15, 1912.

I rather agree with what has fallen from my brother, Lord Mackenzie, during the debate that the Act of Sederunt, if it errs at all, errs on the side of undue severity to the pursuer. I therefore think that what the Auditor did was right, and that Lord Dewar's interlocutor upon that matter must be recalled and the finding of the Auditor restored.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Provision to daughter of "liferent use and enjoyment" of house—Incidence of burdens—Insurance premiums—Interest on bonds—Allowance for upkeep "at the rate of" so much per annum—Arrears.

A testator directed his trustees "to retain for the liferent use and enjoyment of my unmarried daughter or daughters" two residences, and to pay out of the income of the estate an allowance "at the rate of £400 per annum towards the upkeep" of these residences.

Held that his only unmarried daughter occupying the residences was liable, not only (following Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees, 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 106) for feu-duties, landlord's taxes, and repairs, but also for the annual interest on bonds and the premiums on insurance over the residences.

Held also that, in the event of there not being in any year sufficient revenue to pay the allowance in full, payment of arrears fell to be made up out of the income of future years.

THOMAS CRAIGIE GLOVER, of Mount Grange, Edinburgh, and Earls-ferry House, Elie, died on 7th July 1904, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, the seventh purpose of which was in the following terms:—"I direct my trustees to retain for the liferent use and enjoyment of my unmarried daughters or daughter my residences of Mount Grange and Earlsferry House, and the household furniture, plenishing, and other effects therein not hereinbefore specially bequeathed, or in lieu and place of Earlsferry House and furniture, my villa at Earlsferry known as Gordon Villa, with the furniture, plenishing, and effects therein as my said unmarried daughters or daughter may elect: And I also direct my trustees to pay to my said unmarried daughters or daughter out of the income of my estate an allowance at the rate of Four hundred pounds per annum towards the upkeep of said residence: Declaring that, on the death or marriage of the last of my unmarried daughters, the said allowance shall cease and the said residences liferented as aforesaid and the household furniture, plenishing, and effects therein so far as belonging to my estate shall be sold, and the proceeds thereof shall form part of the residue of my estate and be divided amongst the same persons in the like proportions and subject to the like conditions and restrictions as are hereinafter provided with regard to the residue of my estate: Declaring that my sister the said Ann Liston Glover shall be entitled to live in family with my said unmarried daughters or daughter so long as she desires to do so, and that my said unmarried daughters or daughter shall be bound to receive her."

With regard to the residue of the estate, the trustees were directed to realise it at such times as they thought fit, and divide it among the testator's sons and daughters, the shares of the former being payable to them on their attaining majority, the shares of the latter being only liferented and the fee going to their issue, with a power, however, to the trustees, notwithstanding the fact that the daughters' shares were only liferented, to advance to any daughter the capital of one-fourth of her share.

Various questions having arisen after the death of the testator with regard to the construction of his trust-disposition and settlement, a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The parties were—David Francis Park and others, the testamentary trustees of Thomas Craigie Glover, first parties; Thomas Glover, a son of the testator, and others, being the persons entitled to shares of the fee of the residue of the trust-estate, second parties; Mrs Janet Cumming Glover or Park, a married daughter of the testator, and others, being the persons entitled to the liferent of shares of residue, third parties; Alexandria Malcolm Glover, the only unmarried daughter of the testator, fourth party.

The only questions with which this report is concerned arose in connection with the seventh purpose of the settlement quoted supra, with regard to which the case stated:—"The testator's daughters other than the fourth party are married. His sister, Miss Ann Liston Glover, is dead. Since the testator's death the fourth party has resided at Mount Grange and Gordon Villa, and has received from the first parties payment of the said annual allowance of £400, under deduction, however, of the feu-duties, landlord's taxes, insurance premiums, and repairs effecting to the said houses, and the insurance premiums for the furniture therein. The average annual amount of said deductions is upwards of £80. In addition to these deductions the fourth party has also to pay, in respect of her occupancy of said houses, tenant's rates and taxes, amounting on an average to upwards of £60 annually. The assessed rental of Mount Grange is £230, and the assessed rental of Gordon Villa is £50. At the testator's death

Mount Grange was burdened with two bonds for £2600 and £1000 Nov. 16, 1912. respectively, the annual interest on which amounted, less tax, to £124. 9s. The bond for £1000 was repaid at Whitsunday 1907. ^{Glover's Trustees v.} The fourth party has not hitherto been debited by the first parties Glover. with interest on said bonds."

The contentions of the parties were stated as follows:—"The first parties maintain that the fourth party is liable for the interest on said sum of £3600, which will fall to be charged against her said allowance. The fourth party maintains that the right conferred on her with regard to Mount Grange and Gordon Villa is a right of occupancy and not a proper liferent, and that the first parties are not entitled to debit her with the feu-duties, landlord's taxes, insurance premiums, and repairs effeiring to said houses, nor with the insurance premiums for said furniture. She also maintains that the first parties are not entitled to debit her with the interest on the bonds above mentioned. She further maintains that in the event of there not being in any year sufficient revenue to yield said allowance of £400, any part thereof unpaid falls to be paid out of the income of future years. The first, second, and third parties maintain that, on a sound construction of the said trust-disposition and settlement, and more particularly its seventh purpose, the right conferred on the fourth party is one of proper liferent, and not one of occupancy merely, and that she is liable in payment of the feu-duties, interest on bonds, landlord's taxes, insurance premiums, and repairs affecting the said houses. They further maintain that, in any event, the said annual burdens form proper charges against the said allowance. They likewise maintain that, in the event of there not being in any year sufficient revenue to yield said allowance of £400, the fourth party is not entitled to receive payment of any unpaid portion thereof out of the income of future years."

The following questions of law were, inter alia, stated for the opinion of the Court:—" (3) Do the feu-duties, landlord's taxes, insurance premiums, repairs, and interest on bonds effeiring to the said houses of Mount Grange and Gordon Villa, and insurance premiums for said furniture therein, or any and which of them, form proper charges against the fourth party, or, otherwise, against said allowance of £400? (4) In the event of there not being in any year sufficient trust revenue to meet said allowance of £400 to the fourth party in full, is she entitled to payment of any arrears thereof out of the income of future years?"

The case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on these questions on 5th November 1912. An argument upon certain other questions, upon which the case was not reported, was heard by the same Division in the preceding May.

The first, second, and third parties argued that the case was ruled by Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees,¹ and that interest on bonds and premiums on insurance policies were governed by the same considerations as feu-duties, landlord's taxes, and repairs.

The fourth party argued that the present case was distinguishable from *Johnstone*¹ in respect that under the trust-disposition and settlement the trustees had estate in their hands out of which the burdens could be paid. She also argued that in any case she was

Glover's
Trustees v.
Glover.

At advising on 16th November 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—[After narrating the facts, and referring to the third question of law]—When the case was before us in summer, counsel for the parties very properly suggested that we should defer consideration of this question, seeing that the case of Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees,³ which obviously bore a marked resemblance to this aspect of the present case, was under appeal to the House of Lords. The House of Lords has since recently decided that appeal⁴; and having now heard counsel at our bar, we are in a position to answer the third question. I can see no ground for making any material distinction between the provisions of the present trustor's settlement above quoted and those of the testator in Johnstone's case,⁴ which directed his trustees to "give to" his wife "the liferent use and enjoyment" of his house. It seems to me, therefore, that, in accordance with the decision of the House of Lords, we must find that the feu-duties, landlord's taxes, and repairs form proper charges against the fourth party.

The question, however, so far as relating to the interest on bonds and the insurance premiums, is not expressly covered by Johnstone's case.⁴ As regards the former of these items, I can see no good reason to differentiate the interest from the other matters which, in accordance with the House of Lords judgment, must be charged against the fourth party. The insurance premiums seem to present a somewhat different question. I am not aware of any direct authority by way of decision on the point. We were referred to an Irish case, Kingham.¹ The testator there directed his trustees to allow his wife, if she pleased, to occupy his house during her life, with the use of the furniture, &c. Chatterton, V.-C., held that the widow must pay the head rent and taxes payable in respect of her period of occupation, and do such repairs as a tenant would be liable for in absence of express contract, but that, as it was the duty of the trustees to keep the premises sufficiently insured against fire, "so as to preserve the property for their cestuis que trust," they could not require these premiums to be repaid to them by the widow. The decision seems to me, with all respect, to be inconclusive; for I should have thought that the liferentrix (or occupant) was a cestui que trust, as well as the fiars of the house. In the case before us I do not doubt that it was a proper act of trust administration for the trustees to insure the houses and furniture in question against risk of fire. I think that in theory there might be something to say, under given circumstances, for the view that, insurance being truly for the benefit of all parties concerned, the cost of it might fairly be debited proportionally against liferent and fee respectively; and if the parties had been willing to concur in this view, such an arrangement might have afforded a fair and equitable solution of the problem. However this may be, the present case supplies no material for any attempt at apportionment of the sum, which cannot be a large one. It seems to me that, as the question is put to us, there is no sufficient ground for treating these premiums—which prima facie are yearly payments appropriate as charges against revenue—in any different way from the items of charge already dealt with; especially looking to the express terms of the truster's allowance of £400 a year "towards the upkeep of said residence." I am therefore for answering the third question, in the circumstances of the case before us, by finding that all the items mentioned in it form proper charges against the fourth party.

The last question has regard to the truster's direction, already quoted, to his trustees to pay to his unmarried daughters or daughter, out of the income of his estate, "an allowance at the rate of £400 per annum towards the upkeep of said residence." The fourth party contends that "in the event of there not being in any year sufficient revenue to yield said allowance of £400, any part thereof unpaid falls to be paid out of the income of future years." The matter is to some extent one of impression; but I think the contention is right. The yearly allowance is to be "at the rate of" £400. I see no reason why the shortcoming of that rate in one year should not be made good, by way of arrears, out of the income of a succeeding and more prosperous year. I am therefore for answering the fourth question in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT answered the third question by finding that all the items mentioned in it formed proper charges against the fourth party; and answered the fourth question in the affirmative.

owner, even though the house is entered in the Valuation-roll as unlet and unoccupied, subject to a right of repayment for any portion of the year during which the premises are in fact unoccupied.

Held (2) that the owner of a small dwelling-house is entitled at the time of payment to deduct from the occupiers' assessment the statutory percentage allowed him for cost of collection, but that, if he subsequently claims repayment of any portion of that assessment, he must allow a counter-deduction of the same percentage on that portion.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was a special case presented for the determination of certain questions which had arisen under the House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, 1911.¹ The parties were—first party, the Parish Council of Glasgow; second parties, two owners of "small dwelling-houses" in Glasgow, one of which was unlet during the whole year, and the other was unlet at the time when the Valuation-roll was made up, though it was subsequently let.

The case narrated sections 33, 34, and 40 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1845,² and section 44 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,³ and proceeded:—

"5. In the practical working out of the foregoing Acts of Parliament and the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, section 37, the first party, in the month of July yearly, proceed by resolution to raise the funds requisite for the poor and school expenditure in the current year by assessment on the owners and the tenants or occupants, one-half to be imposed on and payable by the owners as a class and one-half by the occupiers as a class. Who the owners and the tenants or occupants may be is not known at the time the assessment is made, because their names only appear on the Valuation and Assessment-rolls to be made up later in the year. The first party on receipt of the Valuation-rolls after 30th September yearly make up under the above quoted section 40 a parish assessment-roll and proceed to levy the rates in conformity therewith by sending a demand note to each individual ratepayer intimating the amount payable by him and the date on which the same is payable. On default of payment a warrant for recovery is obtained. Although the rate is struck in July and the demand notes issued during October and November, the person whose name appears in the Valuation and Assessment-rolls then current (made up from information obtained in the preceding months of May and June) is liable for the whole year's rates, although during the course of the financial year from May to May he has ceased to own or occupy the subjects in respect of which he was assessed. Such owner or occupier has, by decisions in the Sheriff Courts, been allowed relief against the succeeding owner or occupier for the proportion of the year's rates applicable to the period during which the successor owned or occupied the particular subject. Apart from the House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 George V. cap. 53), where a house is unlet no 'occupier' is entered under the existing Acts in the occupier column of the Valuation-roll or Assessment-roll, and no occupiers' assessment is or can be imposed, but in these cases the owners' assessment is imposed.

"6. The first party have been in the habit of preparing a Supplementary Assessment-roll in virtue of the powers contained in the Advantage is taken of this Supplementary Assessment-roll to supply omissions or make corrections on the preceding Assessment-roll. The first party recover poor and school assessments from the owners and occupiers appearing in said Supplementary Assessment-roll. The provisions in regard to the Supplementary Valuation and Assessment-rolls apply only to so much of the parish as lies within the municipal boundaries of the city of Glasgow. In certain portions of the landward portion of the parish the House Letting and Rating Act applies, but being outwith the municipal boundaries these portions have not the advantage of a Supplementary Valuation and Assessment-roll." * The House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 53), enacts:—

Sec. 7. "Subject as hereinafter provided, the provisions of all Acts applicable within the respective areas in which this Act may be in operation respecting the liability for, and the imposition and recovery by an assessing authority of, any assessment, shall subsist in full force and effect: Provided that within every such area—

"(1) The occupier of a small dwelling-house shall, in no case, be liable to pay occupiers' assessment thereof in respect of any period prior to the commencement or subsequent to the termination of his occupancy, but any liability to pay occupiers' assessment, which would by law be imposed on a person occupying the small dwelling-house throughout the year from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, shall be imposed on any such occupier or successive occupiers during the year, whether their names appear in the Valuation-roll or not, to such extent or in such shares as shall be proportionate to the period or periods of their respective occupancies of the small dwelling-house:

"(2) Subject as hereinafter provided, the owner of a small dwelling-house shall be responsible for all assessments liability to pay which is imposed on the occupier thereof, and the same shall not be recovered or recoverable by the assessing authority from the occupier, but shall be recovered by the assessing authority from such owner in the same manner as provided for under existing Acts with respect to the recovery of assessments from owners, and the assessing authority shall be entitled to recover occupiers' assessments from the owner for the year from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, notwithstanding that the house may not be occupied throughout the year, and for that purpose to issue to the owner through their collector or other officer appointed by them any notice, schedule, demand-note, or intimation which, under existing Acts, may be issued in respect of the year's assessments to the occupier:

Nov. 16, 1912. tion put upon the foregoing sections of the above-mentioned Acts of Parliament, and in particular of the said House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, by the Local Government Board for Scotland, the first party being an assessing authority within the meaning of section 1 of the said Act have made up a Parish Assessment-roll for the year 1912/13, in which they have entered the yearly rent or value of small dwelling-houses as determined by the Burgh and County Valuation-rolls, and have imposed for the poor and school rates an assessment, one-half on owners as a class and one-half on occupiers. The second parties are owners of certain small dwelling-houses not occupied by them, and entered in the Valuation-roll and in the Parish Assessment-roll for said year as empty. Demand notes for occupiers' assessments for the year from Whitsunday 1912 in respect of these small dwelling-houses have been intimated to each of them. The said Mungo Macdougall Graham has received a demand-note for occupiers' assessments amounting to 9s. 7d. in respect of a small dwelling-house of one room and kitchen entered in the Valuation-roll at £6, 10s., and situated in a property belonging to him at 22 Balmano Street, Glasgow; and the said William Clark Faulds has received a demand-note for occupiers' assessments amounting to 12s. 10d. in respect of a small dwelling-house of one room and kitchen entered in the Valuation-roll at £8, 15s., and situated in a property belonging to him at 9 Glenpark Street, East, Glasgow. The above houses were unlet and unoccupied on 28th May 1912, and were accordingly entered in the Valuation-roll and in the Parish Assessment-roll as empty. The above houses are 'small dwelling-houses' in terms of section 1 of the said House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, 1911, to which reference is hereby made.

"11. The said small dwelling-house of one room and kitchen situated in the property 9 Glenpark Street, East, Glasgow, has been let by the said William Clark Faulds to James Cunningham, tenant there, who now occupies it as from 28th August 1912 on a monthly contract of let at a rent of 17s. 9d., terminable by either party thereto on eleven days' notice. The first party have intimated that, in the event of the first question of this case being answered in the negative, they will hold the said William Clark Faulds liable in payment of occupiers' assessments for poor and school rates in respect of said house, and that for the period of nine months at a rent for that period of £6, 11s., being three-quarters of an annual rent of £8, 15s., calculated on the basis of the monthly rent payable by the said James Cunningham, and that whether the said dwelling-house and the name of the said James Cunningham as occupier be entered in the said Supplementary Roll or not.

Nov. 16, 1912.

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Graham.

"12. Questions have therefore arisen as to whether, in terms of the Acts above narrated, the first party are entitled to levy on or recover from the second parties occupiers' rates in respect of the said small dwelling-houses belonging to them to which the said House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act applies, which are entered in the Valuation and Assessment-roll as empty at the commencement of the financial year, and are not included in the said Supplementary Roll.

"13. The first party, in accordance with the interpretation put upon said Act by the Local Government Board, maintain that the effect of section 7 of the House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act above quoted is to place upon owners of small dwelling-houses the liability to pay all tenants' or occupiers' rates, both in the case where an occupier's or tenant's name appears in the Valuation and Assessment-rolls and where such houses are entered as unlet and unoccupied, subject to subsequent adjustment with the rating authority, in terms of subsection 3 of that section of the Act. In the event of a negative answer to the first question in this case, the first party contend that under the statutory provisions foresaid they are entitled to assess such small dwelling-houses as are entered as unlet and unoccupied in the Valuation and Assessment-rolls and have become let or occupied for periods either prior to the Supplementary Roll, but do not appear therein, or have become occupied after the date of the completion of the said Supplementary Roll, and to demand occupiers' assessments in respect thereof from the proprietors, for the whole financial year, or otherwise for the whole portion of the financial year remaining after the date when said small dwelling-houses become so let or occupied.

"14. The second parties maintain that the first party is not entitled to recover from them occupiers' rates for the year or any proportion thereof in respect of small dwelling-houses which are entered in the Valuation and Assessment-rolls as unlet and unoccupied at the commencement of the year and are not included in the Supplementary Roll.

"15. A further question has arisen, viz., whether in regard to all occupiers' assessments leviable on the second parties, the second parties are entitled to deduct from the amount of said assessments at the time of payment the allowance of 2½ per cent payable to them by the first party in terms of section 7, subsection 6, of the said Act. The second parties claim that such deduction falls properly to be made on payment of the assessments levied on them. The first party, on the other hand, in accordance with the Local Government Board's interpretation of said Act, contend that such allowance is not to be

Nov. 16, 1912. made by way of a deduction from the rates when paid by the second parties, and does not fall to be made till the close of the financial year, when the net amount of the assessments actually in their hands shall have been ascertained.”

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Graham.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Is the first party entitled to recover from the second parties occupiers' rates for the whole financial year ending Whitsunday 1913 (subject to any right to repayment of any portion thereof under section 7, subsection 3, of said Act), on the said small dwelling-houses entered as unlet and unoccupied in the Valuation and Assessment-rolls? (2) In the event of the first question being answered in the negative, is the first party entitled, in virtue of the provisions of the last-mentioned Act, to recover from the said William Clark Faulds occupiers' rates in respect of the said small dwelling-house situated at 9 Glenpark Street, East, Glasgow (subject to any right of repayment as aforesaid), (a) for the whole financial year, or (b) for the portion of the financial year remaining after the date when said small dwelling-house has become let or occupied, where said small dwelling-house is not entered in the said Supplementary Roll? (3) Are the second parties entitled to deduct from the assessments recoverable from them the allowance of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in terms of section 7, subsection 6, of the said Act at the time of payment; or does such allowance fall to be deducted after the net amount of assessments received from the second parties has been ascertained at the close of the financial year?”

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Cullen) on 1st November 1912.

Argued for the first party;—The effect of section 7 of the House Letting Act was that the true state of facts was to be the basis of liability, and the entry in the occupier's column of the Valuation-roll no longer settled the matter. A constructive liability was now imposed on the “occupier or successive occupiers” in proportion to their occupancies, and the proviso that the names need not appear in the Roll applied equally to both original occupier and successive occupiers. The Act contained no machinery by which the Parish Council could recover the assessments from the occupier, but the constructive liability, while not creating the relation of debtor and creditor between the occupier and the Parish Council, was necessary in order that the Parish Council might reach the owner and recover the rates from him. The owner was primarily responsible for occupiers' assessments for the whole year, with right of repayment if the house was in fact unoccupied. Alternatively, if an unlet house came to be occupied, the owner's responsibility would emerge either (1) for the whole year's rates, or (2) for an amount proportionate to the period of occupancy. As to the deduction of the $2\frac{1}{2}$ percentage for cost of collection, that deduction could not properly be made till the end of the year, when alone the sum on which it fell to be calculated could be finally ascertained.

Argued for the second parties;—By its opening words section 7 expressly adopted the existing machinery of assessment, and the effect of these words could not be overridden by implication. The assessment was imposed on occupiers and not upon occupancy,¹ and it was still a condition precedent that an occupier's name should appear in the Valuation and Assessment-rolls. It was only when the occupier's "liability" had been "imposed" by the insertion of his name in the Assessment-roll that the owner became responsible for his rates, and the relation of debtor and creditor between the owner and the assessing authority was established. This was the law as it existed prior to the House Letting Act, 1911, and it was still the law because there was nothing in the Act by which liability was imposed on persons who were not liable before. The only modification introduced by the section in order to meet the case of short lets was that any liability imposed "by law," which meant the existing law, should not extend beyond the period of the occupancy, but should be apportioned between the original occupier and his successors in the tenancy. This had no application to a case where no one had been, or could be, made liable, and where accordingly there was no liability to apportion. As to the deduction of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the first party, on the terms of the Act, were bound to allow that deduction on whatever sum they demanded payment of as occupiers' assessments.

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Graham.

At advising on 16th November 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a special case presented by the Parish Council of the parish of Glasgow and two inhabitants of Glasgow who are proprietors of houses, and who as such are liable to be assessed for poor and school rates—the rates which are collected through the medium of the first parties, the Parish Council. The houses belonging to the second parties were unlet at the time when the Valuation-roll was made up.

As your Lordships are aware, the Valuation-roll is begun to be made up in the early portion of the summer, and when finally authenticated it forms the basis of all assessments. The Valuation-roll enters each item of property; in one column it specifies the owner, and in another it specifies the tenant or occupier, if any.

The poor-rate rests initially upon the Poor Law Act of 1845. Your Lordships are quite familiar with the fact that, although under the Act of 1845 there were alternative methods of levying the poor-rate, by subsequent legislation one only of those methods was left, namely, that of raising the sum necessary for the support of the poor by two moieties, one moiety imposed upon owners and the other upon occupiers. The actual assessment depends upon the 40th section of the Act, which provides for the making up of a roll of the persons liable in payment of such assessment. In 1845 that roll was, so to speak, made up directly by the poor-law authorities themselves. But by the subsequent legislation of 1854 which introduced the Valuation-roll, the procedure was altered in so far that, although the Assessment-roll had still to be made up for the poor-rating, the actual entries in it were, and—so far as concerned the yearly rent or value of the subjects—had to be, taken from the Valuation-roll.

Under ordinary practice what happened was that, if a house was unlet and unoccupied at the time when the Valuation-roll was made up, no name could appear in the occupiers' column, and accordingly, for the year to which that Valuation-roll applied, an occupiers' assessment was not payable by anybody, even although an occupier might have made his appearance later in the year. There was some legislation designed to check that

Nov. 16, 1912. result by providing for a Supplementary-roll, which was made to apply to Glasgow by the Glasgow Corporation Tramway Order, 1903, section 21, and Parish Council to burghs generally by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 60. v. Graham.

Ld. President. That was one side of the question. There was also the other side of the question that, if an occupier was in occupation on the date at which the Valuation-roll was made up, he was then entered in the Valuation-roll and became liable for the whole of the occupier's assessment even although, as a matter of fact, his tenancy determined within the year to which the Valuation-roll applied.

But in 1911 an Act was passed called the House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, 1911, and by it certain changes were made. Section 7, upon which this case turns, is as follows :—[His Lordship read the section].

Acting upon what they conceived to be their right and duty under this section, the first party, the Parish Council, finding these two gentlemen, who are the second parties, upon the Valuation-roll as proprietors of two small dwelling-houses, requested them to pay the occupiers' assessment. In both cases there was no occupier in existence at the date at which the Valuation-roll was made up, and, accordingly, no occupier appears in the Valuation-roll. The second parties object to the demand, and we had a very ingenious argument from Mr Clyde which really all went upon this : "The only liability which is imposed on the owner to pay the occupiers' assessment is the liability under section 7 (2)." That is true. Then Mr Clyde said : "It is not said that the owner is to pay, but that he is to be responsible for all assessments liability to pay which is imposed on the occupier." He argued : "That refers you to the old law, and inasmuch as under the old law no occupier would have been liable to pay unless his name appeared in the Valuation-roll, and as in this case no occupier's name appears in the Roll, there can accordingly be no derivative liability imposed upon the owner."

I think that is ingenious but unsound. It is quite true, as Mr Clyde said, that the primary object of this Act was to deal with short lets—to make it impossible for landlords to insist beforehand that tenants should come under an obligation for a term, and he said that really the rating provisions were merely corollary to that, and were not intended to alter the law at all. To a certain extent that is true, but there are many instances where, although the primary object of an Act of Parliament is to do one thing, it manages in its course to do something else ; moreover, this is entitled the House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, 1911. In other words, I quite agree that this Act only took up rating because of the alteration it was making as to letting ; but still, having taken up rating, it dealt with it, and if the words are plain, I do not think we have any right to refuse a meaning to those plain words simply because they involve an alteration in rating law.

Now, the reason why I think Mr Clyde's argument is unsound is this : the first subsection which I read does two things. In the first clause it says that "the occupier of a small dwelling-house shall, in no case, be liable to pay occupiers' assessment therefor in respect of any period prior to the commencement or subsequent to the termination of his occupancy," that is to say, it puts an end to the hardship of making the man who was occupier at the date at which the Valuation-roll is made up, and who, perhaps, went away within the next month, liable for the occupiers' assessments for the whole year. But then the subsection goes on: "But any liability to pay occupiers' assessment, which would by law be imposed on a person occupying the small dwelling-house throughout the year from Whitsunday to Whitsunday"—that means a full year's liability—"shall be imposed on any such occupier." A full year's liability, therefore, shall be imposed on any such occupier. Now, "such occupier" means either the first occupier or—afterwards it goes on to say—"successive occupiers during the year, whether their names appear in the Valuation-roll or not."

Nov. 16, 1912.
Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Graham.
Ld. President.

I think that is fatal to Mr Clyde's argument. It seems to me that having taken away the hardship that there was upon the man who was there at the date at which the Valuation-roll was made up and who went away afterwards, the Legislature then said, per contra, "We will declare that a full year's liability is to rest upon all occupiers whether they appear in the Valuation-roll or not, but only according to the proportion of their particular times of occupation." I think, therefore, that imposed liability upon an occupier even although he was not upon the Valuation-roll.

Well, if that is so, the words of the second subsection, "liability to pay which is imposed on the occupier thereof," mean liability imposed not only by the old law (without which, of course, you could not proceed at all, because the actual assessing power is under the old law and under the old law alone), but also liability imposed by the old law plus this particular provision under the first subsection which I have just read. The result of that is—and I must admit that, to my mind, it is very clear and plain—that the authorities here are quite right in asking for the whole of the occupiers' rates from these two gentlemen.

I would also observe (although this is a mere remark) that although Mr Clyde very naturally and very properly argued on the provisions as to assessment in the Poor Law Act, the Act of 1911 applies not only to poor-law assessments, but to all assessments, and an argument founded on the particular phraseology of the Poor Law Act might not be applicable to other assessments levied under other Acts which were expressed in different terms.

There is one other question that is asked. By subsection (6) of the same section of the statute it is provided that "every assessing authority shall, in respect of the occupancy of small dwelling-houses, allow to owners from all occupiers' assessments levied on and recovered from them in place of the occupiers (less any repayments in pursuance of a claim under this section)" —that is, the claim for repayment that I have already read to your Lordships where the subject is not actually occupied during the whole year—"a deduction, to cover cost of collection," on a certain scale—in Glasgow £2, 10s. per centum and elsewhere a percentage fixed by the Sheriff. The proprietors here say: If you are entitled to take from us the whole of the occupiers' assessment in a case where it is very likely that the tenement is not going to be occupied during the whole year, we are entitled now to make a 2½ per cent deduction. The assessing authorities say: No, what you are to get back is 2½ per cent, not on the full sum, but on the full sum less the repayment in pursuance of a claim under this section; therefore we

Nov. 16, 1912. cannot settle that with you now, and can give you no deduction at all until the end of the year comes and we see how much you are going to get back from us. Accordingly, we are asked the question in the special case Glasgow Parish Council v. Graham.

whether the second parties—that is, the proprietors—are “entitled to deduct from the assessments recoverable from them the allowance of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in terms of section 7, subsection (6), of the said Act at the time of payment; or does such allowance fall to be deducted after the net amount of assessments received from the second parties has been ascertained at the close of the financial year?”

I am of opinion that both parties are equally wrong. They both want a little more than they are entitled to. I think it is perfectly clear what the equity of the matter is, and that the equity of the matter is quite in accordance with the statute. I think that, if the assessing authorities ask from the proprietor, as they did here, the whole of the occupiers' assessment, he is entitled at that time to keep back $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; but then, at the end of the year, when the proprietor goes to the authorities and says: “Now then, give me back a portion of my assessment because during such and such a period of the year my tenement has not been occupied,” then I think, instead of giving him back absolutely the whole of that portion, the authorities are entitled to make a deduction which reduces the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent originally retained to the proper figure. That does justice to both, and does not allow either to get the better of the other by keeping somebody else's money in their own pocket.

Consequently, the first question will be answered in the affirmative; the second question is superseded; and the third question is not answered by either the affirmative or the negative, but by a declaration in terms of what I have said.

His Lordship intimated that LORD JOHNSTON and LORD CULLEN, who were absent at advising, concurred.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE were present when the case was advised.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“ . . .

Answer the first question of law in the case in the affirmative; find it unnecessary to answer the second question; find in answer to the third question of law that the second parties are entitled at the time of payment to deduct the allowance of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent from the total assessment then demanded of them, but that, if subsequently they claim repayment of any portion of such assessment in terms of subsection 3 of section 7 of the House Letting and Rating Act, they must then allow as a counter-deduction $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the sum so claimed to be repaid.”

 arbiter.*

A professional man undertaking the duties of an arbiter without any stipulation as to payment cannot be presumed to be giving his services gratuitously, and is therefore entitled to remuneration.

MACINTYRE BROTHERS, contractors, Glasgow, and Alexander Smith, Crawfield, by Glengarnock, Ayrshire, submitted a dispute which arose out of a contract between them for the purchase of a quarry in Ayrshire to the arbitration of William Cook, writer, Glasgow. The deed of agreement, which appointed William Cook arbiter, made no reference to, or provision for, the arbiter's remuneration. The arbiter thereafter issued a decree-arbitral in which, inter alia, he found Alexander Smith liable to Macintyre Brothers in a sum of expenses which did not include any fee to the arbiter. Thereafter Macintyre Brothers paid the arbiter a sum of £63, the fee fixed by the Auditor of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow as suitable remuneration for his services. EXTRA DIVISION.
Lord Dewar.

Alexander Smith having refused to pay either the expenses awarded against him or his share of the arbiter's fee, Macintyre Brothers brought an action against him in the Court of Session for a sum which included both of these items.

With regard to the arbiter's fee (with which question only this report is concerned), the following averments were made by the parties:—(Cond. 5) "On or about 19th June 1911 the pursuers took up the decree-arbitral and paid . . . the sum of sixty guineas to the arbiter as remuneration. When the arbiter was called upon to take up the arbitration it was contemplated by both parties that the arbiter should be paid a suitable remuneration for the occupation of his time and the trouble involved. The arbiter is a professional man, and it is usual and customary in such circumstances for remuneration to be given. Further, the Auditor had fixed the 8th February 1911 as a diet for the taxation of the pursuers' account of expenses, and the pursuers' agents on 3rd February wrote to the defender intimating that the amount of the fee to be given to the arbiter might be fixed on that day by agreement, and that failing agreement the pursuers would move the Auditor to fix a reasonable sum. At the diet on 8th February the defender did not appear nor was he represented, and the diet of taxation was adjourned until 13th February. The pursuers' agents on 8th February wrote to the defender intimating the adjournment, stating that at the adjourned diet they would move the Auditor to fix the fee to be paid to the arbiter. No objection was intimated by the defender, and on 13th February the Auditor fixed the said sum of sixty guineas. The pursuers thereafter called upon the defender to repay to the pursuers one-half of said sum for which the defender is liable but he has declined to do so. The statements in answer, so far as inconsistent herewith, are denied. In particular, it is denied that the arbiter demanded payment of his fee or that the said fee was paid as a condition of the arbiter giving up the said decree-arbitral." (Ans. 5) "Admitted that the pursuers paid the said arbiter a sum of £63. The said payment, as averred by the pursuers in the open record, was demanded by the arbiter as the condition of his giving up the said pretended decree-arbitral. Admitted that the defender was not present at the diet condescended on, and that he has refused to pay the sum demanded. . . . The said arbiter had no right or title to demand the said or any payment as the condition of his handing over the said document, and the pursuers had no right or authority to make any such payment on behalf of the defender. Neither by the terms of the arbitration clause in the said agreement nor by any contract or arrangement with the parties was the arbiter authorised to make any such claim as is condescended on, nor the pursuers to pay the same, and his said demand as a condition of giving up the said pretended decree was a corrupt act within the sense and meaning of the Act of Regulations, 1695, and rendered the said decree invalid and reducible. The pursuers are not entitled to recover from the defender any part of the said payment."

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The said arbiter not being entitled to remuneration the defender is not liable for any part of the payment alleged to have been made to him by the pursuers, and should be assolvied from the conclusion therefor.

On 20th February 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—[After dealing with a matter with which this report is not concerned, and stating the circumstances in which the question as to the arbiter's remuneration arose]—The defender does not aver on record, nor did his counsel state in debate, that he expected the arbiter to act gratuitously, or that the fee fixed was unreasonable. I gather both from the defender's pleadings and the argument of his counsel that he understood from the beginning that Mr Cook was to be paid for his services, and that he would have been quite willing to pay half the fee if the decision had been in his favour; but he is so disappointed with the result that he proposes to disregard the understanding regarding payment, and now pleads that, as the office of an arbiter is honorary, there is no legal obligation upon him to pay any fee at all in the absence of express stipulation. I think he is too late in taking that plea.

"No doubt, the general rule is that the arbiter is presumed to act gratuitously, and unless he has stipulated for remuneration he has no legal claim to enforce it. But where the circumstances show that there was an understanding that the arbiter's services should be paid for, and one of the parties has paid a reasonable fee without objection, he may, I think, recover half thereof from the other party. This was decided in the case of Henderson v. Paul, 5 Macph. 628. In that case the reference was to an accountant, and although there was no express stipulation that he should be paid, the facts showed that parties understood that he was to be remunerated, and one of them, having paid the fee, was held entitled to recover half thereof from the other party. The Lord Justice-Clerk said (page 632), 'The presumption, no doubt, is that an arbiter acts without any right to remuneration; but the presumption is capable of being redargued, and I find what satisfies me, in the facts of the case, that the presumed condition did not hold in this case.' And the special facts were, I think, exactly what we find here, viz.:—(1) The arbiter was a professional man who rendered services to the parties of a similar kind to those for which he was paid in the exercise of his profession; (2) the payment was made in implement of an understanding which existed when the submission was entered into; and (3) the payment was made without warning or objection by the defender. (See also

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on 26th October 1912.

Macintyre
Brothers v.
Smith.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The defender was not liable in half of the arbiter's fee, because the fee should never have been paid. The arbiter here was not entitled to a fee. The agreement made no provision for his remuneration, and the rule of law in Scotland, recognised by all the institutional writers, was that, apart from contract, an arbiter acted gratuitously.¹ It was true that there had been a tendency to allow an exception to the general rule in the case of scientific persons specially qualified to deal with arbitrations regarding scientific subjects; but the arbiter here was not such a specially qualified person, he was merely an ordinary man acting in a judicial capacity in an ordinary dispute relating to an ordinary contract. In *Murray v. North British Railway Company*² there was a statutory provision for the remuneration of the arbiter, and in *Henderson v. Paul*³ the arbiter was an accountant adjudicating upon matters connected with accounting.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD KINNEAR.—[After dealing with matters with which this report is not concerned]—I have still, however, to dispose of the question as to whether the defender is liable for half of the arbiter's fee. The pursuers have paid the whole of the sum of £63, the fee fixed by the Auditor of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow as a suitable remuneration for Mr William Cook's services as arbiter, and in the conclusions of the present action they include a conclusion for £31, 10s., the half of that sum. The defender resists this conclusion on the ground that an arbiter is not entitled to remuneration for his services unless remuneration has been expressly stipulated for, and that in the present case there was no such stipulation. The Lord Ordinary has held that the pursuers are entitled to the sum for which they sue. He says "the defender does not aver on record, nor did his counsel state in debate, that he expected the arbiter to act gratuitously, or that the fee fixed was unreasonable. I gather both from the defender's pleadings and the argument of his counsel that he understood from the beginning that Mr Cook was to be paid for his services, and that he would have been quite willing to pay half the fee if the decision had been in his favour." The Lord Ordinary has thus based his judgment on the existence of an understanding or agreement between the parties.

I am not prepared to hold that there was any express agreement. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is nothing in the circumstances or in the defender's averments on record to suggest that he expected the

Macintyre
Brothers v.
Smith.

Lord Kinnear.

I have no doubt that the arbiter was entitled to remuneration and that the defender is liable for the half. It is doubtless true that a rule has been recognised in our law by which an arbiter was debarred from claiming remuneration for which he had not stipulated in terms. I agree, however, with what Lord Trayner said in Murray v. North British Railway Company,¹ that that general rule cannot be stated now with the same absolute-ness as formerly. It is indeed stated by the text-writers, but the rule was laid down at a time when arbitrations were not so common as they are now, and when the natural inference from the circumstances generally attending them was supposed to be that an arbiter was invited to undertake a purely friendly office for the settlement of differences between persons who did not desire to litigate. But, now that arbitration as professional work has become so common in the ordinary course of business, there seems to me to be no reason whatever for supposing that, when a professional man is asked to undertake the labour and responsibility of solving a disputed question which requires the exercise of professional skill and experience for its solution, he is invited to act gratuitously. It is an implied term of the contract between an arbiter and the parties either that he shall work for nothing or that he shall be paid for his services. Whether the one or the other is the true implication is a question to be solved by the ordinary custom and understanding of business men ; and I think that, in accordance with general practice, the rule must now be assumed that a professional man undertaking the duties of an arbiter is entitled, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, to be remunerated for his services as arbiter in the same way as he is entitled to receive remuneration for his services in any other professional employment. The general rule is that a request for professional service implies a promise to pay for it ; and I do not see why this rule should be the less applicable because the particular service is for the benefit of two parties who are at variance with one another.

In the present case the parties referred all differences and disputes in connection with their agreement to a writer in Glasgow. In carrying out the reference the arbiter has, as a professional man, expended time and labour, and no reason has been suggested why he should have agreed to do so gratuitously.

I have accordingly no difficulty in holding that the arbiter was entitled to remuneration, and that the defender as one of the parties to the arbitration is liable for half.

LORD DUNDAS and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

Crown—Volunteer forces—Liability of commanding officer for bank overdraft—Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 65), sec. 25—Regulations for the Volunteer Force, 1901, Article 407—Contract—Bank—Agent and Principal. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Shaw.

In October 1906, on the instructions of the commanding officer of a volunteer regiment, an account was opened with a bank, headed, "R.S.F. 2nd Volunteer Battalion, Finance Committee. Cheques to be signed by any two members of the Committee." The sums paid to the credit of the account consisted mainly of sums paid directly to the bank by the War Office, while the drafts upon the account were made by cheques stamped "On His Majesty's Service," and signed by two members of the finance committee, one of whom was as a rule, though not in every instance, the commanding officer. On the transference of the corps to the Territorial Force in 1908 there was a large debit balance on the account, for which the War Office and the County Association refused to accept liability.

The bank having brought an action against the commanding officer for the amount of the overdraft, the Court assolized the defender, holding (1) that neither sec. 25 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, nor the Volunteer Regulations of 1901 (which vested the property of the regiment in the commanding officer), imposed any liability upon him for such a debt; (2) that it was not proved that he had as an individual entered into any contract with the bank which could infer personal liability against himself.

On 1st June 1909 the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, brought an action against James E. Shaw, solicitor, County Buildings, Ayr, lately Lieutenant-Colonel commanding the Second Volunteer Battalion Royal Scots Fusiliers, for payment of the sum of £775, 2s. 9d. sterling. EXTRA DIVISION. Lord Guthrie. Lord Hunter.

The following statement of facts was made in a joint minute of admissions for the parties:—

"(1) The pursuers are bankers, and have a branch in the town of Ayr, at which branch the banking account in connection with the volunteer corps known prior to 1896 as the 'Second Ayrshire Rifle Volunteers,' and thereafter as the 'Second Volunteer Battalion Royal Scots Fusiliers,' was kept under various titles for a period of over twenty years down to 1st April 1908, when the said volunteer corps was transferred to the Territorial Force by Order in Council in terms of section 29 of the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap 9). The said account continued to be operated on down to 16th July 1908, in connection with the winding-up of the affairs of said volunteer corps. (2) The defender was for many years an officer of the said volunteer corps, became commanding officer thereof in April 1904, and continued in the command until his resignation thereof as mentioned in the immediately succeeding article. (3) On or about 14th January 1908, the defender was appointed secretary of the Ayrshire County Association formed under the provisions of the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907. The said appointment did not become effectual until 10th February 1908, at which date it was confirmed by the War Office. The defender thereupon resigned the command of the said volunteer corps, and his resignation was subse-land, Limited,

quently gazetted to take place as at 10th February 1908. The Gazette notice of the defender's said resignation was published on 12th May 1908. . . . Prior to 28th February 1908, the pursuers had no intimation of the defender's said resignation. (4) Down to July 1896, the said banking account was kept in the pursuers' books in name of the 'Second Ayrshire Rifle Volunteers,' but on 6th July 1896, the pursuers were instructed to open an account in name of the 'Second Volunteer Battalion Royal Scots Fusiliers' (the new name of the said volunteer corps) to which account the balance standing at the credit of the account in the former name was transferred. The pursuers were also instructed with reference to the account so opened that cheques drawn thereon were to be signed by two members of the finance committee of the corps. The defender, though an officer of the corps, was not in 1896, either in the command or a member of the finance committee thereof. In the year 1900, however, the defender became a member of the finance committee of the corps, and was placed in charge of the finances thereof. He thereupon gave instructions to the pursuers that cheques drawn on the said account were to be signed in future by himself alone, and these instructions continued in force, and were acted upon, down to October 1906. (5) In or about October 1906, the defender received instructions from the Chief Accountant, Scottish Command, that a new banking account was to be opened in connection with the said volunteer corps, and the defender thereupon instructed the pursuers to transfer the balance at the credit of the then existing account to a new account, the cheques on which were again to be signed by two members of the finance committee of the corps. At this date the account was at credit £444, 16s. 1d. In accordance with the instructions so received, the pursuers opened a new account in their books, headed, 'R.S.F. 2nd Volunteer Battalion—Finance Committee. Cheques to be signed by any two Members of the Committee,' and to this account the balance at the credit of the former account was transferred. The pursuers also issued a pass-book in the name of the 'Second Volunteer Battalion R.S.F. Finance Committee,' which contains the instruction ('cheques to be signed by two Members'). The names of the members of the finance committee for the time being are not stated in the pass-book, and the membership of the said committee was subject to variation except in the case of the defender who, as commanding officer of the said volunteer corps, was ex officio a member of the said committee. The names of the committee, which included that of the defender, were, however, communicated by the defender to the pursuers, and are noted in the pursuers' ledger for the purpose of enabling the pursuers to see upon whose signatures cheques should be cashed. The said instructions were given and the said information communicated to the pursuers by the defender as commanding officer of the said volunteer corps. (6) From October 1906, when the instructions mentioned in the preceding article were given, down to the time when the said account ceased to be operated on, cheques drawn thereon were signed by two members of the finance committee. The defender continued to sign cheques on the said account down to 28th February 1908, and between 10th February and 28th February 1908 the defender signed seven cheques drawn on the said account, and his signature on these cheques is followed by the words or contractions 'Lieut.-Col.' as in all previous cheques drawn on the said account signed by him. (7) The cheques used in drawing on the said account were as usual supplied by the pursuers, Nov. 16, 1912, and bear lithographed on their face the words 'On His Majesty's Service.' These words were added to the ordinary form of cheques at the request of the defender for the purpose of rendering the cheques free from stamp-duty and commission, which ordinarily fall to be borne by the customer of the bank or the person in whose favour he draws cheques. (8) From the year 1900 the finances of the said corps were managed by the defender in his private office, and all banking transactions with the pursuers with reference thereto were carried through by one of the defender's clerks who had charge of the said finances in the defender's said office. (9) On 10th February 1908, the date from which the defender's resignation was gazetted to take effect, the balance at the debit of the said account was £757, 7s., and on 28th February 1908 the balance at the debit thereof was £800, 3s. 6d. (10) Subsequently to 28th February 1908 there were paid into the credit of the said account (1) the sum of £250 on 27th March 1908, and (2) the sum of £105, 13s. 6d. on 12th June 1908, and there were withdrawn from the said account down to 16th July 1908 sums amounting to £178, 5s. 10d., leaving the sum of £714, 12s. 3d. at the debit of the said account, which, with interest to the date of citation in the present action, amounts to £775, 2s. 9d., being the sum sued for. The said two sums of £250 and £105, 13s. 6d. paid in as above were provided by the War Office. Certain sums had, however, been paid out of the corps' funds for purposes which the War Office did not regard as legitimate, and the War Office declined to recognise the liabilities so arising (which are represented by the debit of the said account), and intimated to the defender that they held him personally responsible for the said balance. The defender denied liability and declined to recognise any authority in the War Office to make him liable as in a question with it for such a debt. The defender thereafter wrote to the pursuers the letter of 21st August 1908. . . . * (11) The Ayrshire County Association has not assumed liability for the balance due to the pursuers on the said account, and the said Association is not liable therefor. (12) Article 407 of the Volunteer Regulations of 1901 was in force during the whole period of the account in question, which was opened in October 1906."†

* "Dear Sir,—I have to inform you that the Chief Accountant has intimated to me that the War Office holds me personally responsible for the balance at debit of this account which stands in your bank in name of myself and certain others as members of the finance committee of the late 2nd V.B.R.S.F. I have of course denied liability, and do not recognise any authority in the War Office to make a private individual liable for such a debt.

"Meantime I have to intimate that I withdraw any personal guarantee of mine for the account, and the Bank will probably take whatever steps they consider proper for recovery of the amount due.

"I expect to be in Edinburgh shortly, and it might be convenient if I were to call and see the manager at your head office on this subject.—I am, yours truly,

The Regulations for the Volunteer Force, 1901, made under sec. 16 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, enact :—“(Article 407) In accordance with section 25 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, and section 9 of the Regulation of the Forces Act, the whole of the property of a volunteer corps is vested in the commanding officer for the time being, and he is solely responsible for the proper administration of all moneys and other property belonging to the corps. The rules and bye-laws of a corps cannot relieve the commanding officer from full responsibility for the custody and administration of the property and moneys of the corps except as regards such portion of the property of ‘a constituent corps’ as was acquired before the date of consolidation, and was reserved to such corps under the Regulation of the Forces Act, 1881; nor can they relieve him from responsibility or liabilities incurred on his behalf by officers commanding detachments. To aid him in the management of the finances of the corps, a finance committee will be appointed consisting of not less than three members besides the commanding officer. All orders to tradesmen on behalf of the corps should be given by the commanding officer alone and not by the finance committee, and the commanding officer alone should be a party to any necessary contracts so that he alone may remain liable for such expenditure. If the finance committee give orders to, or enter into contracts with, tradesmen for supplies, they will become jointly and severally liable for the expenditure arising from such orders or contracts. The finance committee is responsible for limiting the expenditure of the grants made from public funds to such purposes as are sanctioned by the regulations, for presenting annually to the corps a correct statement of the receipts and expenditure of such funds, and for advising the commanding officer from time to time as to the financial position of the corps.”

On 2nd November 1909 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) allowed a proof before answer on a date to be afterwards fixed. No further step was taken in the action until 11th February 1911, when the cause was awakened, and a date fixed for the proof. Thereafter the parties lodged a joint minute of admissions (quoted supra), and on 25th April 1911 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—
 “The Lord Ordinary, having considered the joint minute of admissions for the parties, and whole process, Finds that the admissions contained in the said joint minute are not sufficient for the disposal of the cause: Therefore—the parties not having renounced probation—of new allows to them a proof of their respective averments. . . .”
 National Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Shaw.

* “OPINION.—On 1st April 1908 the Second Volunteer Battalion Royal Scots Fusiliers was transferred to the Territorial Force. The defender had been commanding officer of the battalion from April 1904, and in the Gazette of 12th May 1908 his resignation was gazetted to take place as at 10th February 1908. If, as the pursuers allege, the defender is personally liable for a balance appearing in 1908 in their books against the ‘Second Volunteer Battalion Royal Scots Fusiliers,’ two questions arise—first, as to the date when his liability is to be ascertained, and second, as to the amount of his liability. In the view I take of the case it is not necessary for me meantime to deal with either of these questions.

“In cond. 5 the pursuers base the defender’s liability on the terms of section 25 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, and Article 407 of the Regulations for the Volunteer Force, 1901, and in cond. 4 they allege—‘The defender was or held himself out to the pursuers as being commanding officer, and a member of the finance committee of the corps, during the whole currency of the overdraft, the balance of which is now sued for, down to the end of February 1908, and the same was incurred by or on his behalf and with his authority for the purposes of the corps.’ But in cond. 7 they make the general averment that they dealt with the defender alone in connection with the said current account, and made the advances on his credit, by which, I assume, they mean his credit as an individual. In answer, the defender maintains that the pursuers are not entitled to found on the Volunteer Act of 1863, section 25, or on the Regulations for the Volunteer Force, 1901, Article 407; he avers, in answer 3, that the pursuers’ customer was the battalion, and he pleads—‘2. The defender never having been the bank’s customer, and not having guaranteed the overdraft, is not liable for the balance due.’

“The parties have adjusted a minute of admissions, but they did not renounce probation.

“If the pursuers can found, without inquiry, on section 25 of the Volunteer Act of 1863 and on Article 407 of the Regulations for the Volunteer Force, 1901, the defender’s liability for a certain amount of the balance claimed is admitted. The question really turns on Article 407 of the Regulations.—[His Lordship quoted the Article.]

“The defender maintains that these Regulations, or at least this Article of the Regulations, have no effect except as between the War Office, on the one hand, and the Volunteer corps and its commanding officer and finance committee on the other. In particular, he says that tradesmen supplying the corps are not entitled to found on this article as imposing any obligation on the commanding officer or the finance committee other than arises from the particular contract made between them and the officer or committee, any more than the commanding officer or committee could plead exemption from an express contract of personal liability by founding on a regulation declaring that they should not be personally liable. In any case

The pursuers reclaimed, and on 9th June 1911 the First Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) pronounced an interlocutor refusing the reclaiming note, and remitting the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

On 6th March 1912 a proof was taken by Lord Hunter (Lord he maintains that the pursuers as bankers cannot bring themselves within the category of 'tradesmen,' or the account now sued on as within the category of a tradesman's account. I think the defender is right on both points.

"A banker is not a 'tradesman' either popularly or technically. But the pursuers say that the balance sued for represents the sums received from the Bank to pay tradesmen's accounts. To a certain extent this may be so, but a substantial part of the money must have gone to pay capitation, camp, travelling, and other allowances, and in payments to instructors, railway companies, &c.

"As to the Regulations, they are not made to have the force of statute, and they appear to me to be matter of domestic legislation as between the War Office and the Volunteer Force. As appears from Articles 510 to 602, Volunteer funds consisted of Government allowances and funds from private sources. Both had to be accounted for annually to the War Office, and, as I read these Articles, the War Office could disapprove of any part of the expenditure and could refuse to sanction any charge on the funds of the corps, at all events as against Government allowances. If so, it was necessary that they should be able to surcharge some person or persons connected with each corps, and make him or them, as in a question with the War Office, personally liable for what the War Office thought improper expenditure. Thus, if the improper expenditure had been already made and paid for, the person or persons liable to the War Office would be bound to pay into the funds of the corps the amount improperly paid away, leaving him or them without recourse, unless in the case of special bargain with the tradesman. If the improper expenditure had been made but not paid for, the funds of the corps could not be burthened with the cost of the expenditure, and the liability of the person or persons connected with the corps to pay the tradesmen would depend on whether the tradesmen had contracted with him or them on the footing of personal liability, or on the footing of being paid for whatever the corps got the benefit of, or on the footing of being paid only out of available corps funds.

"A case is conceivable where a commanding officer and a bank, misreading Article 407 of the Regulations, contracted mutually in express view of personal obligation arising as between them under the Article. But no such case is made here. It is not said that the pursuers knew of the existence of the Act or the Articles, or that they transacted in view of or in reliance on them.

"If the pursuers cannot found on Article 407, the question arises—What was the contract between them and the defender? In the case of Samuel Brothers v. Whetherley, [1907] 1 K. B. 709, [1908] 1 K. B. 184, although Mr Justice Walton may have expressed views on the application of the Act and Regulations different from those above stated, the case was decided by him on the facts. He said (p. 716)—'I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, because the goods were in fact ordered by the commanding officer or on his behalf. He was, in fact, the principal in the transaction, and the plaintiffs are entitled to look to him for payment.' The question then is—Was the defender, as an individual, the pursuers' customer, or was the corps their only customer, the defender, as commanding officer and a member of the finance committee, acting as the known agent of the corps? I cannot decide that question in the pursuers' favour on the documents and the minute of admissions. But these do not necessarily exhaust the whole competent and relevant evidence, and I therefore allow a proof."

Guthrie having by that time taken his seat in the Second Division), Nov. 16, 1912. the import of which will be found in his opinion infra. On 15th March he pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the second plea in law for the defender, and accordingly assoilizes the defender from the conclusion of the summons, and decerns." * National Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Shaw.

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the procedure in the action]—In allowing a proof, after hearing parties on the joint minute, Lord Guthrie wrote an opinion dealing with the pursuers' case so far as it is founded upon the Volunteer Act, 1863, and the Regulations for the Volunteer Force, 1901. He expressed the opinion that the pursuers were not entitled to succeed upon the Act and Regulations; but allowed a proof of the question whether the defender as an individual was the pursuers' customer, or whether the corps was their only customer, the defender as commanding officer and a member of the finance committee acting as the known agent of the corps. Taking the case up at the stage at which I do, I think that I am bound by Lord Guthrie's opinion and that what I have to consider is the answer to the question of fact upon which evidence was allowed.

"As appears from No. 11 of process, the pursuers in 1906 opened an account in name of R.S.F. Second Volunteer Battalion Finance Committee. There is a note at the head of the account that cheques are to be signed by any two members of the committee, and the six members of the committee—one of them being the defender—are named. The pursuers also issued a pass-book in the name of the 'Second Volunteer Battalion R.S.F. Finance Committee,' which contains the instruction 'Cheques to be signed by two members.' Specimen signatures of the various members of the finance committee were provided for the pursuers. The account so opened was allowed to be overdrawn, and it is for the overdraft that the defender is sought to be made personally responsible.

"All the cheques upon this account were drawn for battalion purposes, and each bears the stamp 'On His Majesty's Service.' Many of these cheques are signed by the defender and one of the other members of the finance committee; but some are not signed by the defender at all. No claim has been made against the finance committee, or against any member thereof other than the defender.

"The liabilities of a corps to a bank are in ordinary circumstances met by Government grants, but in the present case the War Office, as fully explained in the joint minute and by the defender in his evidence, held him, as commanding officer, personally responsible for certain expenditure which they refused to sanction. In a letter written by the general manager of the pursuers to the Secretary of State for War, dated 23rd September 1908, the following statement is made:—"The balance due to the bank amounts to £714, exclusive of interest, overdrafts having been allowed to that extent in expectation that Government grants would be forthcoming as hitherto."

"Mr Wilson, the pursuers' agent at Ayr, says that in allowing the overdraft he relied upon the personal credit of the defender. From what he frankly admitted in cross-examination this belief was not founded upon any statement or admission made by the defender. He does not appear to have been aware of the terms of the Volunteer Act or Regulations, although, if the view already expressed by Lord Guthrie is sound, that would have been immaterial. Belief on the part of the pursuers' agent as to the defender's being personally liable, if not well founded, cannot, in my opinion, exclude the defence that the bank's customer was the battalion or the finance committee, and not the defender. It was open to the pursuers to disallow an overdraft, or in the event of their honouring cheques in excess of the amount standing at the credit of the account, to insist upon the personal guarantee of the defender or others. This they did not do.

"So far as the defender personally is concerned — on the assumption

v. Shaw.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on 1st and 2nd November 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The defender was liable for the sum sued for (1) under the Volunteer Act of 1863, and the Regulations of 1901, as commanding officer; (2) at common law as an individual. As regarded (1) the Act and Regulations vested the property of the regiment in the defender as commanding officer. Accordingly, in all matters financial he was, under the Regulations, the regiment. Therefore the bank's contract was a personal contract with the defender and not a contract with the regiment, he being the principal party and not a mere agent acting for the regiment. Under the Regulations the committee were merely a body called into being to advise the colonel, and they incurred no financial liability to third parties except in the particular case of supplies ordered by them from tradesmen. The liability of a commanding officer in similar circumstances had been recognised in Samuel Brothers, Limited, v. Whetherley,¹ which ruled the present case. The fact that the Bank might have been ignorant of the effect of the Regulations was immaterial, because ignorantia juris neminem excusat. As regarded (2) the defender was clearly liable at common law as an individual. He was the person who instructed the opening of the account and with whom the pursuers dealt. It was out of the question to suggest that the pursuers contracted or dealt either with the individual members of the regiment or the individual members of the finance committee. The contract accordingly having been made with the defender it was immaterial in what name he instructed the account to be opened.² The account having thereafter become overdrawn, he was in the same position as any other ordinary customer of the Bank. The defender that as commanding officer he is not liable for the overdraft from the bank on the battalion's account—I do not think he did anything to indicate that he assumed personal responsibility. He had, no doubt, for a considerable time taken an active interest in the finances of the corps. Before the 1906 account was opened he had, for a period from 1904, alone signed cheques drawn on the battalion's bank account. Further, on the difficulty arising as to the present account owing to the views taken by the War Office as to improper expenditure, he wrote to the pursuers' Ayr branch a letter in which, inter alia, he said: 'I have to intimate that I withdraw any personal guarantee of mine for the account.' He explains, however, in his evidence, and I see no reason to reject his explanation, that what he meant by this expression was: 'If you are looking to me to keep you right, or anything of that sort, I withdraw any guarantee there is, but there was no guarantee in fact.' He also adds that he called at the head office of the bank and saw the manager, when he took up the position which he had taken up all along of no personal liability.

"As a result of the evidence the pursuers have failed to satisfy me that they, as they allege, dealt with the defender alone in connection with the current account of the battalion, or that they made the advances which they did upon his credit. In view therefore of the opinion expressed by Lord Guthrie in his note, dated 25th April 1911, I think that the second plea in law of the defender falls to be sustained, and the defender, as commanding officer of the Second Volunteer Battalion R.S.F., in which capacity he is sued, assolizied."

argued that at anyrate he was not liable for overdrafts made after his resignation, which he dated 14th January or, at latest, 10th February 1908. But the resignation was not gazetted and made known to the public until 12th May 1908, and even after that date the defender operated on the account and held himself out as colonel. As to the two sums of £250 and £105, 13s. 6d., they at anyrate could not be credited to the defender. The ordinary principle of the appropriation of payments in order of time, the principle of Clayton's case,¹ was inapplicable, because from the correspondence between the defender and the War Office it was perfectly clear that these payments were made with the intention of discharging only those items of expenditure which the War Office had recognised as having been legitimately incurred.²

Argued for the defender and respondent;—The pursuers had stated no relevant ground of liability against the defender. (1) He was not liable under the Volunteer Act or the Regulations. Neither the Act nor the Regulations imposed this liability on a commanding officer, but, on the contrary, the Act expressly recognised that a volunteer corps was itself capable of undertaking obligations and acquiring property.³ The word "vest" in section 25 was obviously used in the sense of vesting for the purposes of management and not of ownership, and the vesting was in the commanding officer in his official capacity, not as an individual. Article 407 of the Regulations had no effect as between a member of the public and a member of the Volunteer force, but regulated the domestic matters of the corps and the relations between the War Office and the latter. In no event could the Bank be regarded as a "tradesman." (2) The defender was not liable at common law. There was no rule of common law which made a commanding officer liable for regimental debts. There was no contract between the Bank and the defender. The account expressly bore to be an account with the corps; the cheques were signed by two members of its finance committee, and had upon their face the mark, "On His Majesty's Service"; the credit payments were payments by the War Office; and there was not a single fact in the case to suggest that the account was a private account of the defender. Further, there was no "holding out" by the defender, and nothing to indicate that he had pledged his credit as guarantor, or even that the pursuers had so regarded him. The undernoted cases were in favour of the defender.⁴ A loan and an overdraft were not in pari casu.⁵ In any event, the defender could not be liable for the period after his resignation, and was, under the rule in Clayton's case,¹ entitled to be credited with the two payments of £250 and £105, 13s. 6d. in the ordinary way.

v. Shaw.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The account in question is headed "Royal Scots Fusiliers 2nd Volunteer Battalion—Finance Committee. Cheques to be signed by any two members of the Committee." From the pass-book produced it appears that the account commences on 25th October 1906. On 29th May 1908 there was a debit balance of £714, 12s. 3d., the amount sued for being this sum with interest. The defender's resignation as commanding officer was in the Gazette of 12th May 1908. The Volunteer Corps was transferred on 1st April 1908 to the Territorial Force, and the defender became secretary of the County Association.

The ground upon which the pursuers say liability attaches to the defender is thus stated in condescendence 7 :—"The defender, with whom alone the pursuers dealt in connection with the said current account, and on whose credit they made the advances, the balance of which is now in question, is liable to the pursuers for the balance remaining due on the said account." The argument of the pursuers in support of their case is that the defender is liable either (1) under the terms of the Volunteer Act, 1863, sections 16 and 25, and Article 407 of the Regulations made under the powers of the Act; or (2) because he was the person who as an individual contracted with the Bank.

An opinion upon the first of these points was expressed by the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) before whom the case first depended, and I arrive at the same conclusion. Section 25 vests the property of the corps in the commanding officer for the time being, with power to him to sue and make contracts. This, however, does not conclude the question what the nature of any contract is that the commanding officer has made. Article 407 of the Regulations provides that "all orders to tradesmen on behalf of the corps should be given by the commanding officer alone, and not by the finance committee, and the commanding officer alone should be a party to any necessary contracts, so that he alone may remain liable for such expenditure." In the case cited to us of Samuel Brothers v. Whetherley,¹ where it had been established that the goods had been ordered from tradesmen for the use of the corps by or on behalf of the commanding officer, the consequence followed from the Act and Regulations that his executors were personally liable. The only question of fact which required to be cleared up in that case was whether the orders were given with the colonel's knowledge and approval. The case of Whetherley,¹ however, does not help the pursuers here. As the Lord Ordinary points out, a bank cannot be regarded as a tradesman in the sense of the Regulations, which, therefore, do not apply to the present case. Nor is the question one of ordering goods, but relates to the nature of the contract made with the Bank, and the extent of the obligations undertaken by the defender.

The question here is one of fact, and the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) who has sustained the defender's second plea, proceeds upon the facts, accepting Lord Guthrie's view of the Act and Regulations. The second plea is: "The defender never having been the Bank's customer, and not having guaranteed the overdraft, is not liable for the balance due." It is for the pursuers to show how the defender comes to be individually liable for the sum sued for. When the account in question was opened, a previous account with the Bank kept in name of the 2nd Volunteer Battalion Royal Scots Fusiliers was closed, and the balance at credit of that account, £444, 16s. 1d., was transferred to the new account. This was done by Mr Douglas, a clerk in the employment of the defender, acting on his instructions. The pay-in slip was in these terms:—"Paid to the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, the sum of £444, 16s. 1d. to the credit of the finance committee, 2nd Volunteer Battalion Royal Scots Fusiliers, cheques to be drawn by any two members of the committee." Attached to the slip was an envelope containing the names of the finance committee, who were—Lieut.-Col. James E. Shaw; Major Dunlop, Girvan; Major Craig, Sanquhar; Major Smith, Maybole; Captain Ker, Troon; and Captain and Quartermaster Hyalop. Specimens of their signatures were furnished to the Bank.

Lord Mac-

It is proved that after this date no moneys were drawn from the account except under the authority of the finance committee, who had control of the account. Meetings of that committee were held periodically, accounts were submitted, and cheques were signed by two members. The cheques were made out by William Douglas on the instructions of the finance committee. The signature of the defender is upon most of the cheques, together with that of one of the other members of committee, but any two members of the committee could sign cheques. An examination of the pass-book, No. 7 of process, shows that the account was practically square in the middle of October 1907; that then it began to be overdrawn; and that the amount of the overdraft steadily increased down to 29th May 1908, by which time it had reached the figure already mentioned of £714, 12s. 3d. It is common ground between the parties that it is not relevant to the present case to inquire how the moneys drawn out between October 1907 and May 1908 were spent. They were drawn out by means of cheques supplied by the Bank, all stamped "On His Majesty's Service," duly signed by two members of the finance committee, in accordance with the instructions of that committee. All the documents in connection with this account bore on their face that it was a trust account. No case is made on record of any other ground of liability against the defender than that which the pursuers say rests on the contract he made with them.

The credit entries in the account to a great extent consisted of Government grants. These, as explained in the proof, were not according to the practice paid to any individual, but were paid by the Accountant's Department of the War Office direct to the Bank. As the agent for the pursuers' branch at Ayr admits, he knew what the source was from which the sums paid into the account to square it were derived, viz., Government grants. When the present dispute arose the head office of the Bank wrote to the War Office on 23rd September 1908 that the balance due was £714, "overdrafts having been allowed to that extent in expectation that Government grants would be forthcoming as hitherto."

It is in these circumstances that the Bank seeks to make the defender individually liable. Mr Wilson, their agent at Ayr, says that he had the Nov. 16, 1912. understanding that the colonel was responsible for the debts of the regiment, and that the Bank certainly looked to the defender to make good any ultimate loss, should such arise. The pursuers were not the defender's own bankers. It is not suggested that the defender gave any personal undertaking, or that he made any representation upon which Mr Wilson relied. No personal guarantee was ever given by the defender to the Bank, and the terms of the letter written by the defender to the pursuers' Ayr branch, dated 21st August 1908, withdrawing any personal guarantee of his for the account, cannot be construed as an admission that he ever gave such a guarantee.

v. Shaw.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

In my opinion, the correct view of the facts is that the Bank allowed the overdraft in question on the faith of the Government grants, and that they have failed to establish a contract with the defender under which he is personally liable. There is in the proof and correspondence an indication of the difference which had arisen between the defender and the War Office in regard to certain expenditure in past years. It is, in my opinion, beside the present question to go into these matters at all. They are not founded upon as inferring liability on the part of the defender to the Bank. Throughout the record the case made against the defender is a totally different one, that the defender pledged his credit.

For the reasons given I am of opinion the pursuers have failed to prove the case they seek to make. The result is that, in my opinion, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD DUNDAS.—I have found this case a somewhat difficult and anxious one, but I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right. I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion just delivered by Lord Mackenzie, and I entirely concur therein.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also concur in Lord Mackenzie's opinion.

Mackenzie,

SIR ROBERT SMYTH MUIR MACKENZIE, BARONET, Respondent.—
Blackburn, K.C.—J. G. Jameson.

Entail—Improvement expenditure—Obligation by heir in possession to repay improvement expenditure undertaken by tenant of entailed subjects—Action by tenant's executors against succeeding heir in possession for repayment—Title to sue—Extent of liability of succeeding heir—Interest—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 28), sec. 1.

Sir A. M., an heir of entail in possession, granted a lease of the mansion-house and policies on the entailed estate, and entered into agreements with his tenant in terms of which the latter undertook to execute certain improvements upon the subjects let, Sir A. binding himself and the heirs of entail succeeding him (and subsidiaries his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever) to repay to the tenant, at the date of Sir A.'s death, a proportion of the certified cost of these improvements, the amount payable not to exceed a certain fixed sum. The tenant executed improvements, the certified cost of which exceeded the fixed sum, and predeceased Sir A. After the death of the latter the tenant's executors brought an action against the heir succeeding Sir A. in possession of the entailed estate in which, founding on sec. 1 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, they claimed payment from him of the whole of the fixed sum.

Shepherd's
Executors v.
Mackenzie.

Held (1) that the agreements in question created obligations to which sec. 1 of the Entail Amendment Act of 1878 applied, and which were accordingly, under that section, binding on the succeeding heir of entail to the extent to which Sir A., if he had himself made the improvements and had survived, could have charged them upon the estate; (2) that the pursuers had a good title to sue the defender directly and to recover from him a sum equal to that which Sir A. could have charged upon the estate; (3) that that sum was one representing three-fourths of the value, as at Sir A.'s death, of such of the improvements as were chargeable on the estate under the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875.

Earl of Kinnoull v. Haldane, 1911 S. C. 1279, followed.

Held further that, as the defender was not in delay in paying until the sum due by him had been proved, interest on the sum decerned for should run only from the date of decree.

Entail—Improvement expenditure—Petition to charge—Competency—Obligation by heir in possession to repay improvement expenditure incurred by tenant—Competency of petition to charge at instance of tenant's executors—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 11—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 28), sec. 1.

An heir of entail in possession granted a lease of the mansion-house and policies on the entailed estate, and entered into agreements with his tenant in terms of which he bound himself and the heirs of entail in succession to him (and subsidiarie his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever) to repay, at the date of his death, certain expenditure which the tenant undertook to incur on improvements of the subjects let. In security of this obligation, and "to ensure the fulfilment of the same by the heirs of entail succeeding him," he bequeathed and assigned to the tenant and the tenant's executors the amount which was stipulated to be repaid. After the heir and the tenant were both dead the executors of the latter presented a petition, under sec. 11 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, for authority to charge upon the estate the improvement expenditure which the tenant had incurred.

Held that, as the petitioners did not represent an heir of entail who had executed or paid for the improvements, the petition was incompetent.

By lease, dated 7th January 1901, Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie, 1st Division, Baronet, heir of entail in possession of the lands of Delvine and Lord Cullen. others, in the county of Perth, let the mansion-house and policies of Delvine, with certain rights and other subjects, to Mr Joseph Augustus Shepherd, for the period from 15th January 1901 until, in the event which happened, the death of Sir Alexander, which occurred on 25th June 1909.

On the same date Sir Alexander and Mr Shepherd entered into an agreement which proceeded upon a narrative of sections 7, 8, and

* The Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61), enacts:—Sec. 11. "Where any heir of entail in possession of an estate in Scotland . . . shall have executed improvements on such estate, of the nature contemplated by this or any other Entail Act, as the case may be, and shall have died after the passing of this Act without having charged the estate with the amount which he is entitled to charge of the sums expended on such improvements, it shall be lawful for any person to whom such heir of entail may have expressly bequeathed, conveyed, or assigned such sums, or any part thereof, to make application by summary petition to the Court, praying the Court, after such inquiry as to the Court shall seem proper, to find and declare that the sums specified in the petition, or any part thereof, have been expended on improvements on the said estate by the deceased heir of entail; and that the petitioner is in right thereof; and to decern and ordain the heir in possession of such entailed estate to execute in favour of the petitioner, or of any other person such petitioner may think fit, a bond and disposition in security over the said estate, other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, or over some sufficient portion of the said estate other than as aforesaid, for the amount with which the deceased heir of entail himself might, under the provisions of this Act, have charged the estate . . . provided always that the said sums shall only be deemed to be a debt against the entailed estate and the heirs of entail therein, and shall only bear interest from and after the date of the decree of the Court pronounced in such petition."

† The Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 28), enacts:—Sec. 1. Sec. 2. "The heir succeeding to such institute or heir in possession as aforesaid, shall, in like manner as above provided, be bound, unless otherwise expressly directed by him, to relieve to the extent aforesaid his executors, or other personal representatives, of all liabilities which he may have undertaken in any contracts or agreements for or with reference to the execution of improvements of the description aforesaid on the mansion-house and offices of the entailed estate, or any other parts of the estate not under lease, and to repay to the extent aforesaid to such executors or other personal representatives any sums of money which they may be called upon to pay and may have paid in virtue of such contracts or agreements."

(Scotland) Act, 1875; and provided, inter alia, as follows :—“(1) Mr Nov. 16, 1912.
Shepherd undertakes to execute the following improvements, that is to say: In the first place, such improvements of and additions to the drains, cesspools, and watercourses, and the sanitary matters . . . as shall be approved of by George Mackay, chief sanitary inspector of the county of Perth, and that in accordance with plans and specifications approved of by him, and at his sight and to his satisfaction. In the third place, such means and appliances and installation for lighting the said mansion-house and offices and outbuildings, including as aforesaid, with electric light, and such engine-houses, shafts, and fixed machinery appertaining thereto as shall be approved of by a man of skill appointed by Sir Alexander, and that in accordance with plans and specifications approved of by that man of skill, and at his sight and to his satisfaction. In the fourth place, such other improvements of and additions to the said mansion-house and offices and outbuildings, including as aforesaid, as shall be sanctioned by Sir Alexander, and that in accordance with plans and specifications approved of by a man of skill appointed by Sir Alexander, and at the sight of that man of skill and to his satisfaction. (2) As the foregoing improvements shall from time to time be executed by Mr Shepherd to the satisfaction of the said George Mackay, or of the man of skill appointed by Sir Alexander, as the case may be, the cost of the execution thereof shall be certified by the said George Mackay or the said man of skill, as the case may be, and such certificate (which shall be conclusive evidence of the cost therein certified) shall be delivered to Mr Shepherd, and at same time the plans and specifications and vouchers and receipts substantiating such certificate shall be delivered to Sir Alexander, with a duplicate of such certificate. (3) Sir Alexander binds himself and the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the said entailed estate of Delvine, and subsidiarie his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, to repay to Mr Shepherd, and his executors and assignees whomsoever, but only to the extent aftermentioned, the cost of execution of the said improvements to be executed by Mr Shepherd, as such cost shall be certified as aforesaid, and that at the date of Sir Alexander's death, if he shall die before the expiry of ten years from and after the 15th day of January 1901, and at the expiry of the said ten years, if he shall survive such ten years, but only to the following extent,—That is to say, if Sir Alexander shall die before the expiry of five years from and after the 15th day of January 1901, then to the full extent of the cost certified as aforesaid, and if Sir Alexander shall die between the expiry of such five years and the expiry of ten years from and after the 15th day of January 1901, then to the extent of three-fourths of the cost certified as aforesaid, and if Sir Alexander shall survive the said ten years, then to the extent of one-half of the cost certified as aforesaid. On 8th and 12th November 1901 the same parties entered into a further agreement by a minute which was in these terms:—"It is hereby mutually agreed with reference to lease between Sir Alexander and Mr Shepherd of Delvine mansion-house, shootings, fishings, and others, dated 7th January 1901, and agreement between them of same date regarding improvements to be executed by Mr Shepherd on the entailed estate of Delvine, both recorded in the Books of Council and Session on 19th March 1901, that notwithstanding the estimated cost of the said improvements according to plans and specifications submitted by Mr Lake Falconer, architect, Blairgowrie, is shown to be £7393, 0s. 6d., the total amount of the expenditure on the said improvements for which Sir Alexander and his heirs and representatives or his estate shall have any responsibility under the said agreement and lease, including such repairs as may be necessary to put the premises in proper tenantable condition at Mr Shepherd's entry, shall be £6700, which sum shall be held to be the limit of expenditure for the improvements thereunder, and shall include the alterations to windows already carried out, compensation to tenants in connection with said works, architect's fee, fee to clerk of works, and any extras arising on the contracts, and that any expenditure on improvements beyond said limit, which Mr Shepherd may deem expedient, shall be borne by him without any claim upon Sir Alexander or his estate in respect thereof: Declaring, however, that nothing in the agreement shall relieve the landlord of his obligations under the lease to maintain the subjects wind and water tight during the tenancy or of any other obligations incumbent on him: And on this agreement being signed by both parties Sir Alexander hereby agrees to sanction the plans, specifications, and estimates prepared by Mr Falconer as aforesaid, and that Mr Mackay, Mr Townsend, and Mr Butter shall be asked to grant the certificate required under article 2 of the said agreement, so that the works may be proceeded with without delay."

Mr Shepherd proceeded to execute certain improvements and repairs upon the subjects let. He died in 1908, and thus predeceased Sir Alexander, who died in 1909.

On 13th February 1910 Mr Shepherd's executors presented a petition which purported to proceed under section 11 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, in which they sought to obtain a charge upon the entailed estates for the sum of £5025. This sum was three-fourths of the sum of £6700 to which the liability of Sir Alexander's representatives in respect of the stipulated repairs was limited by the minute of agreement of November 1901, three-quarters of that sum being the amount payable, in terms of the agreement of January 1901, in the event which had occurred, viz., the death of Sir Alexander between the expiry of five years and the expiry of ten years from 15th January 1901.

Answers to this petition were lodged by Sir Robert Smyth Muir Mackenzie (hereinafter called "Sir Robert"), the heir of entail who had succeeded Sir Alexander in possession of the estate of Delvine, in which it was stated, inter alia;—" (6) The respondent submits that the petition is incompetent and irrelevant, and ought to be dismissed. He submits that neither the late Mr Shepherd nor his executors have any title or right to present such an application, and that the application is not warranted by the Acts founded on. He further submits that the alleged improvements are not improvements in the sense of the Acts founded upon, and that the procedure required by the Entail Acts to make improvement expenditure chargeable has not been followed.”

Shepherd's
Executors v.
Mackenzie.

On 19th March 1910 the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) dismissed this petition.*

The petitioners reclaimed against this interlocutor, and counsel were heard before the First Division on 24th May 1910, when the Court sisted the petition in order that the parties might bring an action of declarator for the decision of the question at issue between them.

On 28th May 1910 Mr Shepherd's executors brought an action against Sir Robert, and also called Sir Alexander's executors for any interest they might have. The summons in this action concluded for declarator (first) that Sir Robert, as heir of entail in succession to Sir Alexander, was bound to fulfil the obligations, so far as not already fulfilled, undertaken by Sir Alexander in the two agreements above referred to, and (second) that Mr Shepherd had, under the said agreements, executed improvements to at least the value of £6700, being the maximum limit of the amount which Sir Alexander was under the said agreements bound to pay Mr Shepherd in respect of the improvements, “and that under and in terms of said agreement and minute of agreement the sum of £5025, being three-fourths of said sum of £6700, is the extent to which the said Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie, if he had himself made and paid for said improvements and had survived till payment was actually made, would have been entitled to charge them upon the estate,” and proceeded—“and further, it having been so found and declared, or whether it be so found and declared or not, the defender, the said Sir Robert Smyth Muir Mackenzie, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foreshaid, to make payment to the pursuers, as executors foreshaid, of the said sum of £5025 sterling, with interest at the rate of

* “OPINION.—[After a narrative of the circumstances]—I am of opinion that the respondent's contention is well founded. Sir Alexander never executed or expended money on improvements. What he did was to enter into a bargain with his tenant that the latter should execute improvements, and should, on the expiry of the lease at Sir Alexander's death, have right to repayment of a certain proportion of the cost primarily from the succeeding heirs of entail and subsidiarie from Sir Alexander's executors. The obligation for repayment is not yet fulfilled, and so far as the improvements made were of the kind contemplated by the Entail Acts, and such as could have been charged by Sir Alexander had he himself made them, the obligation would appear to have devolved on the respondent by virtue of the Act of 1878. The petitioners' argument seems to involve that they have two concurrent rights—(1) to enforce the unfulfilled obligation against the respondent as having devolved on him under the 1878 Act; and (2) to treat the expenditure made by Mr Shepherd as if it had been actually made by Sir Alexander, and to obtain a charge for it on that footing by virtue of the eleventh section of the Act of 1875. These alleged rights seem to me to be contradictory. I am unable to see that the petitioners are entitled to a charge for the cost of improvements which Sir Alexander did not make and never paid for, and the liability for which has now devolved on the respondent. I am accordingly of opinion that the petition falls to be dismissed.”

Nov. 16, 1912. five per centum per annum from the 25th day of June 1909, being the date of the death of the said Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie, or from such other date as the said Lords may determine, until payment. . . ."

Shepherd's
Executors v.
Mackenzie.

It was stated in the condescendence in this action that the sum spent upon improvements by Mr Shepherd had been £9564 or thereby, of which £1227 was applicable to the electric light installation, that Mr Townsend, the man of skill appointed by Sir Alexander, had withheld his certificate with regard to this installation, but that the cost of the other works had been certified, in terms of the agreements.

The action was defended by Sir Robert only, who pleaded;—(1) The action, so far as directed against this defender, is incompetent. (2) The pursuers' averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action ought to be dismissed, with expenses. (3) On a sound construction of the Entail (Scotland) Act of 1878, the pursuers have no right of action against this defender and the succeeding heirs of entail for the sums sued for. (4) The alterations executed by the late Mr Shepherd not being such improvements as Sir Alexander Mackenzie would under any circumstances have been entitled to charge on the entailed estates, no liability therefor can transmit to this defender or the succeeding heirs of entail. (5) The defender is not liable in the sum sued for, in respect that the pursuers could not have maintained an action therefor against Sir Alexander Mackenzie, if he had survived. (6) In respect that Sir Alexander Mackenzie could never have been liable to the pursuers in a greater sum than £3350, this defender's liability cannot in any event exceed £2512, 10s.

By interlocutor dated 3rd January 1911, the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) repelled the first, third, and fifth pleas in law for the compearing defender, sustained his second plea in law in so far as it related to the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, dismissed the said conclusion, and continued the cause.*

* "OPINION.—[The Lord Ordinary narrated the circumstances of the action, and, after referring to sections 1, 2, and 4 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, proceeded]—The first conclusion of the summons is for declarator that the defender, Sir Robert S. Muir Mackenzie, as heir of entail foresaid, is 'bound to fulfil the obligations so far as not already fulfilled,' undertaken by Sir Alexander under the two agreements already mentioned, 'in so far as said obligations refer to the execution of improvements on the said entailed estate of the description contained in the third section of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, and the cost thereof.' This is a faulty conclusion. Sir Robert is not bound by the agreement per se to fulfil Sir Alexander's obligation. The Act of 1878 does not, in any view, subject him to liability to fulfil Sir Alexander's obligation under the agreement in toto. On the pursuers' view the Act throws on him liability to a limited extent defined in the Act. But this conclusion does not import the statutory limit.

"The second conclusion is for declarator that Mr Shepherd spent, at least, £6700 on the contemplated improvements, and that 'under and in terms of said agreement and minute of agreement the sum of £5025, being three-fourths of said sum of £6700, is the extent to which the said Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie, if he had himself made and paid for said improvements and had survived till payment was actually made, would have been entitled to charge them upon the estate. A criticism directed

interlocutor:—"Of consent of parties, remits to Mr Andrew A. Ralston, Philipstoun House, Winchburgh, to inspect the improvements on the estate of Delvine, referred to in the summons, and to report—(1) whether, and to what extent, these improvements are of the description contemplated by the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875; (2) whether, and to what extent, these are of a substantial nature and beneficial to the estate; and (3) whether the sum of £6700, or what part thereof, was bona fide and properly expended by the late Joseph Augustus Shepherd in said improvements." Shepherd's Executors v.
Mackenzie.

On 14th March 1911 Mr Ralston made a detailed report which contained the following passage:—

"After fully considering the whole matter the reporter is of opinion:—

"(1) That the improvements are of the description contemplated by the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, if they had been necessary, and had been carried out on a reasonable and moderate scale.

by the defender, Sir Robert S. Muir Mackenzie, to this conclusion is that, on a proper construction of the second agreement, the amount which Sir Alexander was bound to pay to Mr Shepherd in the event which happened was three-fourths of £6700, viz., £5025, and that the amount with which he could have charged the estate on the hypothesis stated in the conclusion would have been three-fourths of £5025, viz., £3768, 15s. This criticism, for the reasons already stated, appears to me to be sound. It goes, however, only to the quantum of the conclusion, and does not entirely displace it.

"The third conclusion is that the defender, Sir Robert S. Muir Mackenzie, should be ordained to pay to the pursuers the said sum of £5025, with interest. Assuming the pursuers' case to be otherwise well founded, the defender's criticism on the second conclusion applies here also to the effect of reducing the amount claimable from Sir Robert to £3768, 15s.

"The main question, however, arising at the present stage of the case is whether, assuming the truth of the pursuers' averments, the Act of 1878 gives the pursuers a ground of action against Sir Robert for the £3768, 15s., or £5025, as the case may be. The pursuers' debtors under the agreements are Sir Alexander's executors. Sir Alexander, under the agreements, professed to bind conventionally the heirs of entail succeeding him; but it is conceded that he had no power to do so, and that, in the result, his obligation is, apart from the Act, one binding himself and his representatives only. This being so, the pursuers appeal to section 1 of the 1878 Act, and say that, to the extent permitted by the Act (not correctly reflected in their conclusions according to my view), Sir Alexander's obligation under the agreements has 'devolved upon' Sir Robert.

"Prima facie the Act would seem to apply, this being a case of an obligation undertaken by an heir of entail in possession in an agreement with reference to a lease granted by him with reference to the execution by the tenant of improvements alleged to be of the description contained in the third section of the 1875 Act, and where the heir in possession so undertaking has died before 'complete fulfilment of such obligation.' The words of section 1 are perfectly general, and the obligation undertaken by Sir Alexander seems prima facie to answer to them. The defender, however, advances a variety of grounds for displacing the application of section 1. He also contends that, esto section 1 otherwise applies to the case, it does not give the pursuers the direct right of action against him in which they now insist.

"In the first place, the defender says that section 1 does not apply because the subject-matter of the agreements between Sir Alexander and

Nov. 16, 1912.

Shepherd's
Executors v.
Mackenzie.

"(2-3) The reporter is also of opinion that the expenditure was of a substantial nature and beneficial to the estate, and properly made by the late Mr Joseph Augustus Shepherd in said improvements, but only to the extent, as at February 1911, as follows:—

(1) Sanitary improvements, ...	£1200	0	0
(2) Water supply, ...	855	0	0
(3) Stables, &c., ...	650	0	0
(4) Gardens and kennels, ...	550	0	0

and that an heir of entail who had himself made and paid for said improvements would have been entitled to charge that amount as for improvements, to the extent of three-fourths thereof, under the Entail Acts, being £3041, 5s.

Mr Shepherd was the executing of improvements on the mansion-house. He points to section 2, which specially mentions the mansion-house. Now, the scheme of section 1 is to deal with obligations undertaken to tenants under leases or agreements relative to leases, while the scheme of section 2 is to deal with liabilities for improvements undertaken with regard to subjects not leased. The mansion-house is, under section 2, specifically mentioned as a case falling under it. The reason of this probably was to make it quite clear, in view of certain decisions, that section 2 applied to an unlet mansion-house as well as to 'any other parts of the estate not under lease.' I cannot see anything in section 2 sufficient to limit the general terms of section 1 by importing into it an exception of the case of a leased mansion-house and an obligation undertaken by the heir in possession granting the lease with reference to improvements which the tenant under the lease has undertaken. Improvements on a mansion-house are one of the kinds of improvements described in the 3rd section of the Act of 1875 referred to as a standard in the 1st section of the Act of 1878.

"In the second place, the defender says that inasmuch as the obligation undertaken by Sir Alexander was, in the event which happened, an obligation prestable only at his death, it was not an obligation of the kind referred to in section 1 of the 1878 Act. I have difficulty in appreciating the ratio of this objection. The obligation undertaken by Sir Alexander, taken as a whole, was one which might or might not become prestable during his life. The object of the Act is to throw on the succeeding heirs of entail liability for the same amount as the preceding heir undertaking the obligation contemplated by the Act could have charged on the estate if, instead of undertaking the obligation, he had himself made and paid for the improvements to which the obligation applies. Now this object and the generality of the terms of section 1 seem to include the case of an obligation prestable at the death of the granter just as much as that of an obligation prestable during his life. In either case the succeeding heir has to bear only the proportion of the improvement expenditure falling under the obligation which the preceding heir could have charged if he had made and paid for it himself.

"In the third place, the defender says that section 1 only applies to obligations undertaken in, or given with reference to, leases of which the currency extends beyond the life of the granter, so that, after his death, the tenant and the succeeding heir are related to one another under a continuing contract. He thus excludes the case of an ordinary agricultural lease the term of which is contemporaneous with the death of the granter or at any time prior thereto. I am, however, unable to find this qualification in the Act.

"In the fourth place, the defender says that section 1 does not refer to "The great bulk of the work carried out at Delvine was unnecessary and extravagant, and outwith the powers of an heir of entail. Nov. 16, 1912.

"The reporter also begs to state that as at the date when the works were carried out, so far as the heir of entail could charge the estate, the improvements would probably be represented by a sum of about £5282, as follows :—

obligations to pay money to a tenant, as distinguished from obligations ad facta præstanda, such as obligations to erect buildings or fencing. Now section 1 includes (1) the case of an obligation for the execution by the proprietor of improvements, and (2) the case of an obligation by the proprietor 'with reference to the execution by the tenant' of improvements. In the latter case the normal form of the proprietor's obligation would be to reimburse the tenant for the improvements executed by him. It does not, therefore, seem to me that this objection is well founded. If the proprietor agrees so to reimburse the tenant, his obligation, under the conditions and limitations prescribed by the Act, seems to be one which it is in consonance with the object of the Act to devolve on the succeeding heir who is thereby only burdened with such part of the improvement expenditure, to which the obligation applies, as the preceding heir could have charged on the estate had he made and paid for it himself.

"The defender further contends that, esto Sir Alexander's obligation is one of the class contemplated by section 1, the pursuers are nevertheless not entitled to the direct right of action against him on which they here insist. What the Act says is that the obligations of the heir in possession shall to the statutory effect 'devolve upon the heirs succeeding to the estate after him, who shall in their order be bound to relieve his executors, or other personal representatives, of such obligations, so far as unfulfilled,' &c. The defender does not say that the statutory devolution imports only an obligation of relief towards the executors in all cases to which the Act refers, without giving the tenant a right of action against the succeeding heir. He concedes that in cases where the devolved obligation is an obligation ad factum præstandum under a continuing lease, such as an obligation to erect farm buildings, the meaning of the Act in devolving the obligation on the succeeding heir is that the tenant shall have a direct right to demand fulfilment from him, instead of being confined to an action against the executors of the preceding heir who have no relation to the lands and no power to enter on them. The defender, however, says that when it is a question of paying money to the tenant, the obligation to pay does not 'devolve' on the succeeding heir in the same way as an obligation ad factum præstandum, and that in such a case the succeeding heir is not placed by the statute under any relation of liability towards the tenant, but only towards the executors of the deceased heir, whom he is bound to relieve. I am unable to find that this distinction is made by the terms of the Act. In all the cases to which it refers the obligation 'devolves upon' the succeeding heir. If, as the defender concedes, the devolution makes the succeeding heir the direct debtor of the tenant in one case—the obligation ad factum præstandum—I do not see how he avoids a similar liability in the other case—that of money payment. As already pointed out, obligation to pay

"With reference to head 3 of the agreement between Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie and Mr Joseph Augustus Shepherd, dated 7th January 1901, the reporter begs to state that at the date of the death of Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie on 25th June 1909 the improvements would probably be represented by a sum of £4367 as follows :—

(1) Sanitary improvements, ...	£1250	0	0

money to the tenant seems to be the normal form of obligation by the proprietor in the cases (expressly contemplated in section 1) of an agreement with reference to improvements executed by the tenant. The object of section 1 of the Act in all the cases within its scope is the same, that is to say to burden the succeeding heir with improvement expenditure, for which the preceding heir obliged himself to a tenant to the same extent as if the preceding heir had made and paid for the improvements himself. The object being the same I do not think that the Act expresses a distinction in the form of the succeeding heir's liability as between the case of an obligation ad factum præstandum and the case of an obligation to pay money to the tenant for improvements executed by him.

"Following these views I shall repel the first, third, and fifth pleas in law for the defender. I shall sustain his second plea in law so far as it is directed to the first declaratory conclusion of the summons. This second plea is also directed inter alia to the pluris petitio under the other conclusions, but as the facts relating to the making of the alleged expenditure and the nature of it have yet to be ascertained, it will be more convenient not to deal with this aspect of the plea at the present stage."

Shepherd's
Executors v.
Mackenzie.

* "OPINION.—Mr Ralston, the reporter to whom, of consent of parties, I remitted by my interlocutor of 18th January 1911, has now returned his report, and various questions as to the rights and obligations of parties on the basis of it formed the subject of a recent discussion.

"[His Lordship here dealt with the cost of the electric light installation, and held that, as this part of the expenditure had not been certified by the man of skill appointed by Sir Alexander, in terms of article 2 of the agreement of 7th January 1901, it fell to be deducted from the certified cost of Mr Shepherd's improvements]—On this footing, the total of the certified cost of Mr Shepherd's operations was £8337. Sir Alexander's obligation, in the event which happened, was to pay three-fourths of £6700 of this, viz., £5025, as at the date of his death.

"Sir Alexander's obligation was not conditioned on the improvements being of such a nature as to found a right to charge the estate under the Entail Acts had he made them himself. The pursuers are suing upon a statutory devolution of Sir Alexander's obligation on the succeeding heir, not simpliciter, but only so far as the obligation relates to 'any improvements of the description contained in the 3rd section of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875,' and only 'to the extent to which, if he had himself made and paid for said improvements and had survived till payment is actually made, he would have been entitled to charge them upon the estate.' According to Mr Ralston's report, the expenditure by Mr Shepherd (excluding the electric light) was of the class falling within the 3rd section of the 1875 Act to the value of £3882. The difference between this sum and the foreshaid total of £8337 (£4455) was for expenditure of a kind outwith that section, and the succeeding heir incurs no liability in relation to it. But Sir Alexander's obligation for payment related to it in part. It was to pay £6700—or three-fourths or one-half thereof—of the cost of the whole work generally, whether of the kind falling within that section or not. In order, therefore, to ascertain how far his obligation related to expenditure on improvements of the statutory class, it seems to me that the £6700 (wholly or partly) must be regarded as having been payable in respect of both classes of improvements, and divided proportionally between the £3882 of statutory improvements and the £4455 of non-statutory improvements. This brings out £3120 as the part of the £6700 ascribable to the statutory improvements, three-fourths of which is £2340. Liability for this amount has devolved on the defender to the extent to which Sir Alexander, 'if he had himself made and paid for said improvements and had survived till payment is actually made, would have been entitled to charge them on the estate.' Two questions arise here. The first relates to the period which is to be taken as that of the hypothetical charge by Sir Alexander, for in the case of an actual application to charge improvement expenditure the amount of the charge depends on the value of the improvements when the application is made. The alternative periods contended for by the parties respectively were (1) the time when Mr Shepherd's improvements were executed; and (2) the date of Sir Alexander's death, when his obligation for payment became prestable. It appears to me that

Executors v.
Mackenzie.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 11th, 18th, and 19th July 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in calculating the sum due by a proportional division of £6700 as between statutory and non-statutory improvements. The intention and effect of the agreements was to bind Sir Alexander's successor to repay the whole amount of improvement expenditure, in so far as Sir Alexander could legally effect this result. The initial fault in the Lord Ordinary's reasoning was in the distinction he drew between statutory and non-statutory improvements. As a matter of fact the whole of the improvements were of the nature contemplated by section 3 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, as properly chargeable upon the estate. Sir Alexander might have charged the whole of that expenditure upon the entailed estate, and his heir was therefore liable therefor, subject to the limitation, in the event which had occurred, to £5025. But assuming that the pursuers were only entitled to recover in respect of that portion of the expenditure which had been reported as falling within the 3rd section of the Act of 1875, they were entitled to decree for the full value of such improvements calculated at the date at which they were executed. The effect of section 1 of the Act of 1878 was that the obligation to repay undertaken by Sir Alexander devolved upon the defender to the extent to which Sir Alexander, if he had made the improvements himself and had survived till payment was made, "would have been entitled to charge them upon the estate." The final test was the amount which Sir Alexander could have charged. Both under the Act of 1875, and that of 1878, he could have charged the estate with this expenditure, either by way of bond of annualrent, or by way of bond and disposition in security; it was only in the latter case that the amount for which he could charge was limited to three-quarters of the sum expended. Neither the case of Kinnoull v. Haldane,¹ nor that of Leith v. Leith,² on the reasoning of which Kinnoull's case¹ proceeded, was an authority against the pursuers on this point. In Leith's case,² it was decided that under section 11 of the Act of 1875 an heir of entail in possession might not charge the whole amount of his expenditure by way of bond and disposition in security. In Kinnoull's case¹ it was decided that a bond of annualrent was not a "charge affecting the fee of an estate" in the sense of section 9 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1868. On the question of interest, there was no reason why interest should the latter is the proper period. According to Mr Ralston's report, the statutory improvements (excluding the electric light), which originally were of the value of £3882, were, at Sir Alexander's death, of the value of £3412, and the proportion of this effeiring to the sum of £2340 already mentioned is £2056.

"The next question arises on the words of section 1 of the 1878 Act: 'to the extent to which he would have been entitled to charge them upon the estate.' The pursuers say that this means the whole sum in question, in respect that Sir Alexander might have obtained authority to charge the whole by way of bond of annualrent. The defender says it means only three-fourths as the proportion chargeable by way of bond and disposition in security. I was referred to the recent decision of the First Division in the case of Earl of Kinnoull, petitioner, which, it seems to me, is affirmative of the defender's contention. On this footing the amount payable by the defender under the devolved obligation is three-fourths of £2056 or £1542."

not run on the sum decerned for from the date when it really became due, viz., Sir Alexander's death. The Lord Ordinary was also wrong in dismissing the petition. By virtue of the assignation from Sir Alexander the petitioners had a title to present it.

Nov. 16, 1912.
Shepherd's
Executors v.
Mackenzie.

Argued for the respondent;—The action was incompetent. Mr Shepherd's executors were not entitled to bring into Court this defender, with whom they had no contractual relation. It was admitted that Sir Alexander's representatives might have a good claim against the defender arising out of these agreements, but such a claim was not open to the pursuers. Further, the provisions of section 1 of the Act of 1878 were not applicable to the present case, which concerned repairs to the mansion-house. Such a case was dealt with in section 2, which expressly provided that the expense of such repairs was to be recovered from the succeeding heir by the executors of his predecessor. Assuming, however, the competency of the action, the Lord Ordinary had decided rightly (1) as to the proportion of the expense to be borne by the defender; (2) as to the date at which the valuation of improvements should be taken; and (3) in decerning only for three-fourths of their value as at that date. The latter decision followed of necessity from the reasoning in Leith v. Leith,¹ and Kinnoull v. Haldane.² In any case, interest should only run from the date of decree in the action; it was only then that the obligation of the defender could be ascertained. The Lord Ordinary had rightly dismissed the petition. The petitioners in no way represented an heir of entail who had executed improvements.

At advising on 16th November 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After narrating the facts and referring to the agreements between Sir Alexander and Mr Shepherd]—The present action is raised by the executors of Mr Shepherd against the present heir of entail in possession for this expenditure. The Lord Ordinary before whom the case depended, by his interlocutor of the 3rd January 1911, disposed of certain preliminary and prejudicial pleas stated by the defender, and he also disposed of the first declaratory conclusion of the pursuers, which he considered too wide. The preliminary pleas of the defender, three in number, which were disposed of, although rather varying in phraseology, really all go practically to the competency of the action. Having disposed of those pleas, the Lord Ordinary granted leave to reclaim. Leave to reclaim was not taken advantage of, and the Lord Ordinary then remitted to a reporter, Mr Ralston, to examine the improvements and to report as to the extent to which they could have been charged upon the estate if they had been made by an heir in possession himself. Thereafter, upon receiving a report from that reporter, the Lord Ordinary found that it was unnecessary to dispose of the second declaratory conclusion; but under the petitory conclusion he has granted decree for £1542 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of citation till payment.

In arriving at this figure his Lordship thought that the pactional amount of £8700 should be held as effeiring partly to the statutory and partly to the non-statutory improvements. I am of opinion that his Lordship was in error in so doing, and for this very simple reason: Sir Alexander, by his

Nov. 16, 1912. original agreement, undoubtedly meant to impose all that he could legally impose upon the heir of entail to the relief of his executor. When he made Shepherd's the subsequent agreement with Mr Shepherd—that in no case should his Executors v. the whole estate of any sort be subjected to more than £6700—he did not, I
 Mackenzie. think, wish for one moment to alter what he had expressed his eniza voluntas to be, namely, to free his executor so far as he could at the expense of the heir of entail. Accordingly, the heir of entail in possession has to pay all that he can legally be made to pay, and the executors have to pay the rest; but, taking the whole estate as represented by both executors and heir of entail in possession, it can never be subjected to a demand for more than £6700.

In the next place I would call your Lordships' attention to this, that inasmuch as this action is at the instance of Mr Shepherd's executors against the heir of entail in possession, with whom, of course, directly Mr Shepherd never had any contract whatsoever, it is quite clear—and it is common ground between the parties—that the action is really based upon the provisions of the Entail Act of 1878, which provides by the first section that all obligations (I am leaving out some words) in any lease granted by an heir of entail in possession as proprietor of an estate, "or in any agreement with reference to such lease, for the execution by the proprietor, or with reference to the execution by the tenant, of any improvements of the description contained in the third section of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, shall in case of his death"—that is, the death of the heir of entail in possession—"after the passing of this Act, and before complete fulfilment of such obligations, and to the extent to which if he had himself made and paid for said improvements, and had survived till payment is actually made, he would have been entitled to charge them upon the estate, . . . devolve upon the heirs succeeding to the estate after him, who shall in their order be bound to relieve his executors. . . ."

Now, I may say at once, that so far as the Lord Ordinary's dealing with the prejudicial pleas in the interlocutor of 3rd January is in question, I am entirely of the same opinion as the Lord Ordinary, and I have really nothing to add to what his Lordship has said in his very careful note upon the subject. I think this is a case where clearly the Act applies. This is a case where an heir of entail in possession bound himself—and, of course, his whole estate—for repayment to a tenant in respect of improvements executed by that tenant; and I think that, in terms of that Act, the tenant gets thereby a good action against the heir of entail in possession, but, of course, only to the extent to which the granter of the lease, if he had made the improvements himself and had lived to charge them, could have charged them.

Now we have a very clear and able report from Mr Ralston, with a very convenient table of how the improvements stand. The table gives, in the first column, the original expenditure. The original expenditure was altogether £10,000 odd, but, as I have already said, that is pactionally reduced to £6700. Three-fourths of the original £6700 would be £5025, and accordingly it is quite clear that Mr Shepherd's claim—and now his executors' claim—against the massed estates of Sir Alexander is £5025, and that, so far as Sir Alexander could, he, by the obligation expressed, imposed that payment upon the heir of entail in possession. But, of Nov. 16, 1912. course, he could not impose the whole payment upon the heir of entail in possession, because his power to do so is cut down by the condition in the statute which says that the criterion is to be the extent to which, if he had himself made the improvements, and had survived until payment was actually made, he would have been entitled to charge them on the estate. Shepherd's Executors v.

Mackenzie.

The first question, therefore, that arises upon that is, What is the date at which we are to see what the improvements are which he could have charged? I think, with the Lord Ordinary, that it is quite clear that the date is when the payment fell to be made, namely, at Sir Alexander's death. Therefore I turn to the column where Mr Ralston gives what the improvements were worth at the time of Sir Alexander's death. I need hardly say that Mr Ralston only puts down what you may call proper entail improvements—that is to say, things that could be charged as being an improvement to the estate in an ordinary petition. That column of Mr Ralston's gives a sum total, as on 25th June 1909, of £4367. But from that there must be struck off a sum of £955, being the cost of the "electric lighting installation," and for this reason, that by another clause in the agreement (which I do not read at length), nothing was to be paid for except upon the production of certain certificates, and no certificate for electric lighting has been produced. Accordingly, I do not think that Mr Shepherd can ever succeed in claiming from any portion of Sir Alexander's estate anything for the electric light. That, however, does not interfere with Mr Shepherd's right to recover £5025, for this very simple reason that, if you strike off the original cost of the electric lighting installation, namely, £1709, from the total of £10,000, you still have a sum that is greater than the pactional sum of £6700. Accordingly, I am of opinion that Mr Shepherd's executors are entitled to recover, as against the heir of entail in possession, that proportion which they can recover of the third column after deduction of £955. Now, the third column is £4367, and if you deduct £955 from that, it leaves £3412. But according to our decision in the case of the Earl of Kinnoull v. Haldane,¹ an heir of entail cannot charge the whole of that, he can only charge three-fourths, and therefore the outcome of the whole matter is that the executors are entitled to recover as against the heir of entail in possession three-fourths of £3412, which, as a matter of fact, is £2559, and for that sum I am of opinion that they should have decree.

The other question that remains is the question of interest. The Lord Ordinary has given interest at the rate of 5 per cent from the date of citation till payment. I do not think this is a case where interest can be given from the date of citation, because the heir of entail in possession is due only what can be, so to speak, proved against him in terms of the Act of Parliament, and until that is settled he cannot be considered in mora in not paying. Accordingly I think that this sum of £2559 for which we propose to give decree should bear interest only from the date of the decree and not from the date of citation.

I am therefore of opinion that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's

Nov. 16, 1912. interlocutor in so far as it ordains Sir Robert Mackenzie to pay £1542, and in lieu thereof decern and ordain him to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £2559, with interest at 5 per cent from the date of this decree, and that quoad ultra we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's Ld. President. interlocutor.

As regards the petition, I concur with Lord Mackenzie. I think the petition was incompetent. The Lord Ordinary so decided it, and upon the reclaiming note I think we should adhere. I am afraid the pursuers here mistook their remedy, and I think that Sir Robert is entitled to his expenses in the petition in both the Inner and the Outer House.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship, and for the reasons which your Lordship has given.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The Lord Ordinary has dismissed the petition presented by the executors of the late Mr Shepherd for authority to charge the entailed estate of Delvine with a proportion of the sums expended on improvements thereon by him. I agree with the view taken by the Lord Ordinary, and that upon the short ground that the petitioners are not, and do not represent, an heir of entail who executed or paid for the improvements.

The action at the instance of the executors is in a different position. The agreements which the late Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie made with Mr Shepherd profess to bind the heirs of entail. No doubt Sir Alexander was not liable during his lifetime, but, in my opinion, the terms of section 1 of the 1878 Act are sufficient to make the obligations contained in these agreements devolve upon the heirs of entail. Its terms are general, and are not limited by the phraseology of section 2. It is a different question, and one with which we are not concerned in the present proceedings, whether the lease granted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie would be struck at by the principles laid down in such cases as those relating to the Queensberry leases. The pursuers, therefore, have a title to sue the defender, Sir Robert Mackenzie, who is called as heir of entail in possession of Delvine. It is not necessary for them to sue Sir Alexander's executors, who in their turn would have to go against the heir of entail. So far, therefore, I take the same view as the Lord Ordinary.

Upon the question of the amount which the pursuers are entitled to recover, it appears to me that the figure £6700, the amount specified in the second agreement, is to be read into the third article of the first agreement, and is to be held as a limitation of the amount therein contracted to be paid. The amount to be paid must be regulated by the 1878 Act, section 1, and the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, section 3. The cost of the execution of the improvements must further be certified by the man or men of skill appointed in terms of article 2 of the first agreement. An argument was submitted on the concluding words of the second agreement. I think the effect of this clause was merely that Sir Alexander agreed to sanction the plans, specifications, and estimates so that the works might be proceeded with without delay, but that still left it necessary to obtain the certificates required under article 2 of the first agreement as and when the improvements were executed. It is admitted that the cost of the electric lighting was not certified, and therefore this cannot form a charge against the defender. We have a report from Mr Agnew Ralston as to the value at various dates of the improvements so far as falling under the third section of the 1875 Act. In my opinion, the date at which their value should be taken is the date of Sir Alexander's death, when the obligations became prestatable. This is the view of the Lord Ordinary. I am, however, unable to agree with the way in which the Lord Ordinary has divided proportionally the £6700 between different classes of improvements. I think there should be taken first of all the figure at which Mr Ralston brings out the amount of the improvements on 25th June 1909, the date of Sir Alexander's death, viz., £4367. From this there must be deducted the amount of the electric lighting installation, £955. This leaves £3412. Sir Alexander bound himself and the heirs of entail succeeding to him to make payment under the agreement, in the event which has happened, of three-fourths of the £6700, or £5025. The actual amount is therefore less than that sum. Then arises the further question what the extent was to which Sir Alexander might have charged the entailed estate with this sum of £3412. This point is, I think, settled by the case of the Earl of Kinnoull,¹ referred to by the Lord Ordinary, at three-fourths. The obligation therefore devolves upon the defender, under section 1 of the 1878 Act, to the extent of three-fourths of £3412, viz., £2559.

The Lord Ordinary has held that interest should run from the date of citation. This is, however, different from an ordinary litigation. Looking to the terms of the eleventh section of the 1875 Act, I think interest should only run from the date of decree.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutors:—

(In the action of declarator, &c.)—"The Lords having considered the reclaiming note for the pursuers against the interlocutor of Lord Cullen, dated 12th September 1911, . . . recall said interlocutor, but only in so far as it decerns and ordains the defender, Sir Robert Smyth Muir Mackenzie, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1542 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of citation till payment; in lieu thereof decern and ordain the said defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £2559, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date hereof until payment: Quoad ultra adhere to said interlocutor, and decern . . ."

(In the petition)—"The Lords having considered the reclaiming note for the petitioners against the interlocutor of Lord Cullen, dated 19th March 1910, . . . adhere to said interlocutor, refuse the reclaiming note, and decern . . ."

 Roughead v. White. Partnership—Retirement of partner—Bonds and dispositions in security granted by partners—Duration of liability of retired partner—Bond of relief—Cautioner—Liberation.

An association, formed for the purpose of acquiring heritable properties as investments, in the course of their business borrowed sums of money on the security of certain of their properties, for which the partners in the association granted bonds and dispositions in security as trustees for the association, and also as individuals. One of the members thereafter withdrew from the association, under an article of the partnership agreement which permitted any member to retire on finding a satisfactory substitute, and the remaining members granted a bond of relief undertaking to relieve him of any claim made against him by any creditor in respect of the bonds. Neither the partnership agreement nor the bond of relief made any provision for the termination of obligations undertaken during his membership.

Ten years after his withdrawal he brought an action against the members of the association to compel them, by paying up the amounts of the bonds or by obtaining discharges of his liability from the bondholders, to relieve him of all liabilities undertaken by him under the bonds. He founded his claim upon the long lapse of time, changes in the partnership, extension of the loans for further periods and their assignation to new creditors, and, separatim, upon the right which he contended he had as a mere cautioner at any time to withdraw his cautionary obligation as regarded future liability.

Held that he was a principal debtor and not a cautioner, and had, in the circumstances, no right of relief against the defenders except that given by the bond of relief; and action dismissed as irrelevant.

EXTRA
 DIVISION.
 Lord Cullen.

WILLIAM ROUGHEAD, Writer to the Signet, Edinburgh, brought an action against Alexander White, George Reid, and others, in which he sought that "it ought and should be found and declared, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, that the defenders are bound, conjunctly and severally, to free and relieve the pursuer of all liability undertaken by him under and in virtue of the following bonds and dispositions in security executed by the pursuer as trustee for the Association formed under the name of 'The City of Edinburgh Property Association,' and as an individual, and others, videlicet :—[Here followed a list of a number of bonds and dispositions in security]—And the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of our said Lords, to free and relieve the pursuer accordingly by making payment to the creditors in said bonds and dispositions in security of all sums, principal, interest, and penalties due under said bonds and dispositions in security, or otherwise, by producing discharges by said creditors of all personal obligations undertaken by the pursuer by said bonds and dispositions in security, as trustee foresaid, or as an individual; or otherwise the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of our said Lords, conjunctly and severally, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £20,000 sterling, or of such other sum as may be ascertained to be the full amount of the sums due, under said bonds and dispositions in security, to the creditors therein, and of the expenses of obtaining and recording discharges of said bonds and dispositions in security in order that the pursuer may pay up said bonds and dispositions in security, and obtain and record discharges thereof." Nov. 16, 1912.

Roughhead v.
White.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 1) "In 1895 an Association was formed under the name of 'The City of Edinburgh Property Association,' by the pursuer, the defenders Alexander White, John Watson, Mrs Williamina Kay or Watson, Knight Watson, John MacNab, and James Ross junior, the now deceased James Ross, rope manufacturer, 23 Bath Street, Leith, and William Tait, S.S.C., conform to articles of agreement dated 12th, 13th, 18th, and 22nd February 1895, and recorded in the Books of Council and Session 25th February 1895. The object of said Association was the acquisition or purchase of heritable as well as personal property in any part of Scotland, and as a first investment the heritable property detailed in schedule 1 to said articles of agreement. The respective partners undertook to subscribe the various sums of capital set opposite their names in the second schedule to said articles of agreement amounting in all to £8250, whereof the pursuer's contribution was £500. The agreement provided (article 4) that the affairs of the Association should be managed by the defenders Alexander White, John Watson, the said James Ross, and the pursuer, and the survivors and survivor of them, who were thereby appointed trustees for the Association. The agreement further provided that the various parties should participate in the profits and losses of the Association in proportion to the sums respectively subscribed by them. It also contained provision for any member being entitled to withdraw from the Association at any time, on finding a substitute member to the satisfaction of the Association. The various members of the Association duly paid up the sums of capital which they respectively undertook to subscribe." (Cond. 2) "The Association thereafter proceeded to purchase the heritable properties in the schedule to the agreement, and in connection with said purchase borrowed various sums of money on the security of said properties. In particular the pursuer and the other trustees for the Association, by the authority and on behalf of the Association, along with the members of the Association, granted the various bonds and dispositions in security specified in the summons for sums amounting in all to £15,950. Said bonds and dispositions in security were executed by the pursuer and the other trustees as trustees and individuals." (Cond. 3) "In the year 1901 the pursuer desired to retire from the Association, and with the approval of the Association the defender George Reid was substituted as a member in his place. The £500 subscribed by the pursuer to the funds of the Association was thereupon repaid to him through Mr Tait, one of the secretaries of the Association; and the remaining members of the Association executed in pursuer's favour a bond of relief, dated 26th March, 2nd, 4th, and 20th April 1901, and recorded in the Books of Council and Session 1st July 1908. By said bond of relief they bound and obliged themselves, jointly and severally, and their respective heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, also jointly and severally, to warrant, free, relieve, and harmless and scathless keep the pursuer and his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever free of all claims and demands which might be made on him or his foressaids by any creditor or creditors under any bond, bill, or note signed by him,

Nov. 16, 1912. Roughhead v. White. whether as trustee or as an individual, on behalf of said Association, in connection with the properties of said Association, or any of them, or the affairs of said Association, and of any claim of relief which they as members of said Association, or any of them, might have against him, and bound and obliged themselves, conjunctly and severally, and their respective foresaids jointly and severally, should any demand or claim be made against the pursuer or his foresaids by any creditor of said Association or any member or trustee thereof, without any proceedings other than a demand by the pursuer or his foresaids, to intervene between him and them and such demand or claim, and take upon themselves, jointly and severally, all objections or defence to such demand, and relieve him and his foresaids of all questions in relation to such demand, or otherwise to make payment of the amount of such demand or claim, with any interest thereon and expenses to the pursuer or his foresaids in order that he or they might satisfy such demand or claim." (Cond. 4) "Although ten years have elapsed since the pursuer ceased to be a member or trustee for said Association, the defenders have taken no steps to terminate his liability under the said bonds and dispositions in security. On the contrary, instead of paying off said bonds and dispositions in security or obtaining a discharge of the pursuer's liability thereunder at the periods when under agreement with the lenders they became payable, they have from time to time renewed said loans for a period of years. Further, since the date of the said bond of relief the said bonds and dispositions in security have, by the desire of the granters of said bond of relief, including the individual defenders and the defenders James Ross's trustees, or the said James Ross, been assigned by the creditors therein as follows:—[Here followed a list of the assignments]—The defenders thus, after granting said bond of relief borrowed said loans from new lenders, to whom the pursuer's personal obligations were transferred, instead of paying off said loans, or, at all events, obtaining a discharge of the pursuer's personal obligations, and thus extended the pursuer's personal obligations, contrary to the intention of said bond of relief and to their duty to the pursuer. Further, during said period the said James Ross has died, and his estate is about to be distributed, and the said William Tait has been sequestered under the Bankruptcy Acts. The pursuer has lodged a claim in his sequestration." (Cond. 5) "The pursuer has repeatedly applied to the defenders to obtain a discharge of his liability under the said bonds and dispositions in security, but they refuse to procure the same."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having signed said bonds and dispositions in security on behalf of and as a trustee for the defenders' Association, he is entitled to be relieved by the defenders of the obligations so undertaken by him, with expenses. (2) The defenders having unduly delayed to obtain a discharge of the pursuer's liability under the bonds and dispositions in security libelled, and having extended the period of his liability under said bonds by obtaining renewal of the loans therein contained, and by re-borrowing said loans from new lenders in breach of their obligation and duty to the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (3) No claim or demand having been made upon the pursuer in respect of any of the said bonds and dispositions in security mentioned in the summons, the Nov. 16, 1912:

action is premature and ought to be dismissed.

On 10th April 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the defenders' second plea in law, and dismissing the action.*

Roughhead v.
White.

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to the decree for which he concludes.

"Under the articles of the Association the pursuer was not (without forfeiture) in a position to withdraw from membership except on his finding a substitute approved by the other members. The articles make no provision for withdrawing members being relieved of obligations undertaken by them on behalf of the Association during their membership. Accordingly this was a matter open for arrangement among the parties when the pursuer withdrew in 1901 with the consent of his fellow members. The bond of relief then granted to him represents the arrangement which was made on the subject. It imports that the pursuer was to withdraw without obtaining himself then discharged of the obligations which he had undertaken in the bonds in question; that these obligations were to continue for the benefit of the Association; and that the pursuer had agreed to rest content with the obligation to relieve him which he obtained from the granters of the bond of relief. The bond of relief, however, is silent as to the period of time during which the pursuer's said personal obligations were to continue undischarged. The pursuer does not maintain that he was entitled to call upon the granters to procure him discharged so soon as he received the bond. He concedes that he was bound to wait. The only express stipulation in the bond as to the granters procuring him discharged is limited to the case of his being called on by a creditor to pay, an event which has not happened. It appears to me that the parties must have had in their minds some period other than that of the whole endurance of the Association—which is indefinite—as being that during which the pursuer's said personal obligations were to lie undischarged. Now, the business of the Association under its articles was the purchasing or acquiring of heritable property by way of investment, and the articles contemplate the granting of heritable bonds for the purpose of providing purchase money. It was in this way that the bonds here in question came to be granted. If and when any property came to be resold by the Association in pursuance of its objects the bond would no longer be required and could be paid off, but until such a resale the bond would continue in ordinary course. It seems to me that the fair and reasonable implication of the arrangement embodied in the bond of relief quoad the period of endurance of the pursuer's personal obligations with which it does not expressly deal, is that, failing the intervention of a demand by a creditor on the pursuer, he was content to allow these obligations to lie until a resale of the subjects by the Association, in pursuance of its business, enabled the bonds to be dispensed with, and put the Association in a position to have them discharged. It is not suggested that the Association is conducting its business otherwise than in a bona fide manner, or that, in still continuing to hold the properties subject to the bonds in question, it is not acting in due accordance with its objects as assented to by the pursuer himself when he joined it as one of its original members. It may be an unsatisfactory position for the pursuer to continue undischarged of these personal obligations, and perhaps when he withdrew from membership he may have assumed that the Association would not require to utilise the bonds to which he had been a party for so long a time as has happened, which may be due to the present state of the property market. But if he desired more prompt terms of release he should have stipulated for them.

"The pursuer founds on the fact that the agreements for the duration of Roughhead v.

White.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Macenzie) on 8th November 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The pursuer was entitled to obtain the declarator he craved. He did not maintain that he would have been entitled to such a declarator immediately after he had retired from the Association, but he did maintain that it was an implied term of the contract between him and the defenders that his liability should only endure for a reasonable period and not, as the Lord Ordinary seemed to hold, indefinitely, i.e., until a re-sale of the subjects by the Association in pursuance of its business enabled the bonds to be dispensed with and discharged. As to what was a reasonable period there might be some difference of opinion, but the pursuer maintained that a reasonable period would have been until the original loans expired. The renewal of the loans and the assignation of the bonds was really equivalent to a subjection of the pursuer to new liabilities. Accordingly, the pursuer was entitled to succeed on the terms of the articles of association and the bond of relief. Even, however, if he were not entitled to succeed on the terms of these deeds, that fact did not deprive him of such common law remedies as he might be possessed of. After the dissolution of the partnership the position of the pursuer was that of a cautioner merely, and he was entitled to all the rights and remedies of a cautioner at common law. One of these rights or "equities" was the right at any time to recall the obligation¹ as regarded future liabilities, except, indeed, in the almost inconceivable case in which a cautioner had contracted to remain bound for ever. Further, qua cautioner, the pursuer had been freed by the changes in the partnership which had taken place at the death of Ross and the bankruptcy of Tait.²

Argued for the respondents;—The pursuer was not a cautioner but a principal debtor, whose obligations were contractual and regulated by the loans under the bonds current when he withdrew have expired, having been replaced from time to time by further agreements; and that four out of the five bonds have, in consequence of the original creditors requiring their money, been assigned to other lenders. When, however, the nature of the business of the Association, and the purposes for which, in pursuance of its objects, the bonds came to be granted are duly considered, these transactions in the handling of the bonds, so as to enable them to remain a fund of credit without incurring the wasteful expense of providing new bonds whenever an existing loan was called up, represent the normal method of dealing such as I think the pursuer must have contemplated that the Association would follow.

"The pursuer further founds on the fact that one of the granters of the bond of relief has died, and that another has been sequestrated. He does not, however, allege that the Association is not at present duly constituted in terms of its articles, or that it is not carrying on its business in terms of these articles in a bona fide manner. If I am right in the view which I have taken as to the implied understanding regarding the subsistence of the bonds, I do not find in the facts any sufficient ground for holding that they give the pursuer right to an immediate release. No authority was cited in support of the pursuer's proposition.

"Following these views I shall sustain the defenders' second plea in law and dismiss the action."

the articles of the Association and by the bond of relief. Under the Nov. 16, 1912.
 articles every member became liable under the bonds, and no provision was made for the termination of that liability so long as the bonds subsisted: under the bond of relief the only remedy given to the pursuer was a right of relief against the defenders in the event of a creditor under the bonds making a claim against him. No claim had been made here by any creditor, and accordingly the pursuer had no right to demand the relief he craved. The theory of the bond of relief obviously was that the pursuer remained a principal debtor and had not become a mere cautioner.

Roughhead v.
 White.

At advising on 16th November 1912,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The pursuer in this case seeks to have it declared, in the first place, that the defenders are bound, conjunctly and severally, to free and relieve him of all liability undertaken by him under and in virtue of five specified bonds and dispositions in security. The defenders do not dispute their liability to relieve the pursuer in the event of any demand or claim being made against him by the creditors in these bonds, and the declarator sought does not in terms appear to go beyond the declaration of that right.

But then the pursuer goes on to formulate operative conclusions for the purpose of giving practical effect to his right of relief. He asks that the defenders should be decerned and ordained to free and relieve him by making payment, that is, immediate payment, to the creditors in the bonds of all sums, principal, interest, and penalties due under them, or otherwise by producing discharges by the creditors of all personal obligations undertaken by the pursuer; or otherwise that they should be decerned and ordained to make payment to him of the sum of £20,000, so that he may pay up the bonds and obtain discharges for himself.

I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer has made no relevant averments to support either of these conclusions. The facts are quite simple. I do not know that they are materially disputed; at all events, I take them, for the purposes of the question of relevancy, from the pursuer's own statements. He says that in 1895 he became a member of an association, which appears to have been a trading company, called the Edinburgh Property Association, the object of which was to acquire or purchase heritable and personal property in any part of Scotland. He entered into this Association along with certain other parties, to wit, the defenders personally called and another deceased member, whose representatives are called as defenders. The partners subscribed various sums of capital, the pursuer's contribution being £500. He not only became a member of the Association, but also became one of the managers along with certain of the defenders, and was appointed with them a trustee for the Association. The business of the Association was carried on until the year 1901, when the pursuer retired, withdrawing from the membership upon an agreement with the other members, which was entirely within the conception of the original contract of copartnery, by which another person was substituted as a member in his place. The effect of his withdrawal under agreement with his copartners was obviously to free him from any obligation that might be undertaken by the copartnery after he had ceased

Nov. 16, 1912, to be a member. He ceased to be a member of the copartnery in 1901, and had no liability or concern with anything that was done by it since that date.

Roughhead v.
White.

Lord Kinnear.

But then at the time of his withdrawal there were existing liabilities to the creditors in the bonds specified in the summons, and he was undoubtedly liable as one of the borrowers, jointly and severally, with the other members of the Association to the creditors in these bonds. The money was borrowed while he was still a member, a manager, and a trustee for the company. He undoubtedly became liable to the creditors in the bonds, and also to his copartners, as joint debtor with them, to pay his proportion of any liability which might ultimately be made good against them all. That was a subsisting liability of which he could not be relieved by merely withdrawing from the company while it was still subsisting. It would have been perfectly easy, so far as legal methods are concerned, for him to have obtained a discharge from that existing liability just as effectual as his discharge from future liabilities. But that could only have been done by, in the first place, an agreement between the pursuer and the defenders, and, in the second place, an agreement between the pursuer and the defenders on the one side and the creditors in the bonds on the other. That it was legally possible there can be no question; but, for whatever reasons, the agreement was not made, and there may have been good reasons for the parties declining to enter into such an agreement. At all events, it was matter for agreement if it was to be done at all; but as to the agreement that was made, its effect was, in my opinion, to leave this gentleman's liability in the bonds just as it was before he retired from the company.

But then he says that, having retired in the year 1901, he now finds that although ten years have elapsed the defenders have taken no steps to terminate his liability in the bonds and dispositions in security. "On the contrary," he goes on to aver, "instead of paying off said bonds and dispositions in security or obtaining a discharge of the pursuer's liability thereunder at the periods when under agreement with the lenders they became payable, they have from time to time renewed said loans for a period of years. Further, since the date of said bond of relief the said bonds and dispositions in security have, by the desire" of the defenders, been assigned by the original creditors to new creditors who take their place as creditors in the bonds. His case is accordingly two-fold; in the first place he contends that by the mere lapse of time he is entitled to say, "I should have been relieved by this time and you must relieve me now"; in the second place he contends that the defenders have entered into a new transaction, to which he was not a party, and by so doing have already relieved him.

As to the first of these grounds I am of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that there is no foundation for the plea so maintained by the pursuer. He became a party to the bonds as a principal debtor: he remained a principal debtor along with his copartners after he had ceased to be a member of the Association. We must presume that he knew that in the ordinary course of business the company could either pay up the bonds or leave them standing according to the convenience of the business for which the loans were originally contracted. He retained no kind of control over his former partners in the management of the business, and he acquired by agreement no new right which would enable him to intervene and say the time has now come when these bonds must be paid. He was under a subsisting liability as to which he made no sort of stipulation that it should be diminished, or that it should be treated by the company otherwise than might be convenient for them in the ordinary course of business, or that anything should be done by the company to expedite a settlement with the creditors, or that he should obtain relief otherwise than in ordinary form in the event of a claim being made against him.

Roughhead v. White.

Lord Kinnear.

I omitted to say, what I ought to have said before coming to the legal aspect of the case, that on his withdrawal from the company he obtained from the continuing members a bond of relief by which they undertook to relieve him and keep him harmless and scathless and free of all claims and demands which might be made on him by any creditor or creditors under any bond, bill, or note signed by him, whether as trustee or as an individual, on behalf of the Association; and bound themselves that, should any demand or claim be made against the pursuer by any creditor of the Association or any member or trustee thereof, they, without any proceedings other than a demand by the pursuer, would take upon themselves the defence to such a demand, and relieve him of all questions in relation to it. He had, therefore, a bond of relief by which, in the event of the creditors in any of these bonds making a demand against him, he should be relieved by the remaining members of the company; and that, in my opinion, was the sole obligation undertaken by the surviving members in his favour when he left the company.

It was maintained, however, on behalf of the pursuer that by reason of his having ceased to be a member of the company, or ceased to have any personal interest in the moneys borrowed under these bonds and dispositions, he had become a cautioner merely and was entitled to be relieved of his cautionary obligation by virtue of what were said to be the equities of a cautioner. One of the equities of a cautioner is, it was contended, that he may at any time withdraw from any future liability imposed upon him by his cautionary obligation. I think the argument baseless in both its branches. In the first place, I know of no general equity that will enable a cautioner to withdraw from future liabilities irrespective of the terms of the obligation by which he is bound. He may withdraw or may not withdraw according as his cautionary obligation allows him to do so; but his right to withdraw must always depend upon what it was he undertook to guarantee, and what the terms of the guarantee were. We were referred as authority for the pursuer's proposition to the case of Doig v. Laurie.¹ I think the opinion of Lord Low in that case brings out very clearly indeed the distinction between the conditions upon which a cautioner may put an end to his cautionary liability and the conditions of the present case. In that case the pursuer had given a guarantee to a bank by which he guaranteed all sums for which the defender might become liable up to a certain amount, the amount being £6500. Lord Low said:—"It must, therefore, be taken that the obligation undertaken by the pursuer was gratuitous, and its duration was indefinite and unlimited. I do not think that the pursuer

Nov. 16, 1912. is in such circumstances bound to continue his obligation longer than it is convenient for him to do so." That is to say, a person had gratuitously undertaken a cautionary obligation to the bank for indefinite sums for an indefinite period, guaranteeing the transactions of the bank's debtor so long as that obligation should subsist. Certain debts had been incurred for which the cautioner was undoubtedly liable, and he then said :—"I must withdraw. The guarantee is good up to this date ; but I do not propose to continue it any longer for indefinite future liability, of which I know nothing" ; and he was found quite entitled to do so. But that is a totally different position from the pursuer's, which is that of a person who, as a principal debtor, became bound by a fixed obligation, which was indefinite only in respect of its duration, but which, according to its own terms and legal effect, would subsist until the creditor should call up his money or the debtor should pay. I can see no reason in equity by which he should be entitled to relief from that undertaking irrespective of the terms to which it binds him. But if there were any such general or universal equity in favour of cautioners it would not apply here, because, for the reasons I have already given, the pursuer is not a mere cautioner. He is a principal debtor as in a question with the principal creditors, and he remains liable, as long as he remains a principal debtor, to pay his proportional contribution as in a question with his co-debtors.

The second ground of the pursuer's argument was quite different. He said that by obtaining from the creditors assignments of the bonds to new creditors the defenders had entered into new transactions, after he had ceased to be a member of the company, by which he was in no way bound ; he was bound, he argued, only to the creditors with whom he had personally contracted, and the defenders had made new obligations for him with persons of whom he knew nothing. If he had maintained upon that state of the facts that the new bonds were, so far as he was concerned, invalid and ineffectual, and that he was under no obligation as debtor in these bonds to the assignees of his original creditors, I think there might be some very obvious answers in law to that contention. But whether that would be well founded or not I do not think it necessary to determine, because that would raise a question which it would be impossible to decide in the absence of the creditors in the bonds. That is not the foundation of the pursuer's case, even if the contention were well founded in law. The plea that the transactions are new transactions, by which he is not bound, does not support the conclusions of the summons, and is not a reason for compelling the debtors in the bonds to pay their debts immediately or alternatively to make payment to the pursuer of a sum to enable him to pay the debts for them. There is no logical connection between the contention and the conclusions of the summons whatever, and his remedy would be totally different.

But, although the argument to which I have just referred was pressed, the action is based on the hypothesis, not that there is no liability, but that there is liability ; it is only on the hypothesis that the pursuer is liable in the bonds libelled in his summons that he can claim that the defenders should relieve him of that liability. I think the hypothesis upon which the whole case proceeds is plainly and obviously that there is a good liability against him. Whether that be so or not there is no relevant ground to my mind for compelling the defenders to relieve him of such liability ; if it be good, because it is a liability still attaching to him ; and if it be bad, because his remedy in that case would be to get rid of the bonds altogether.

Nov. 16, 1912.
Roughhead v.
White.

Lord Kinnear.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion upon the whole matter that the Lord Ordinary was right in sustaining the second plea in law for the defenders, which is that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and that the summons should, therefore, be dismissed.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree in thinking that the interlocutor reclaimed against is right. Mr Murray, for the pursuer, complained that the Lord Ordinary had gone wrong because he proceeded wholly upon the bond of relief as finally regulating the pursuer's rights in the matter, and ignored what counsel described as the pursuer's position at common law as a cautioner for the principal debtors, his former copartners in the Association. It was to this latter aspect of the case that Mr Murray directed his able argument. The distinction suggested by counsel seems to me to be one rather of words than of substance. It is probably sufficient to point out that it is not accurate to describe the pursuer as a cautioner. He is not, and never was, a proper cautioner. He was a partner, and he retired from the partnership concern. By the terms of the articles of agreement the pursuer was entitled to withdraw from the Association without finding a substitute member to its satisfaction, in which case he would have forfeited all sums of money contributed by him to the funds of the Association, and in addition would have been bound to pay, when called upon by the Association, his proportion of any loss which it might sustain. Alternatively he might find a substitute to the satisfaction of the Association. The pursuer chose the latter of these courses. The terms upon which he should withdraw became, therefore, a matter for arrangement and consent between him and his copartners. In the bond of relief prepared by the pursuer and granted by his partners at his request, one finds what appear to be the terms upon which he and they agreed that he should retire. It cannot be said that, since the bond was granted, the defenders have acted otherwise than in a lawful and normal course of carrying on their business, a course that was within their powers and must be taken to have been within the contemplation of all parties when the articles of agreement were entered into. In these circumstances I am unable to see how the pursuer can now, after an interval of years, appeal to the rights open by law to a partner who is entitled to retire from his business simpliciter without consents asked or given ; still less to any right that may be available to a proper cautioner, which, as already pointed out, the pursuer is not, and never was. I have some sympathy with him in his anxiety to be finally quit of all concern or possible liability in connection with the Association ; but I cannot see any sufficient ground upon which we could grant the decree sought for by the summons. I think we must adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. I would only add that I think that what your Lordships have already said disposes of another

Nov. 16, 1912. point that Mr Murray argued, namely, that the pursuer was free in consequence of the death of James Ross, and the sequestration of the estate of William Tait. This point seems to me to depend on his establishing that the rights which he has are those of a cautioner at common law. If they are regulated by the terms of the bond of relief, then this point, depending as it does on his success in establishing that his position was that of a cautioner, fails. What the Lord Ordinary has said upon this question is perfectly sound, viz, that there is no allegation that the Association is not at present duly constituted in terms of its articles, or that it is not carrying on its business in terms of these articles in a bona fide manner. Therefore, when one fully apprehends that the bonds which are libelled in the summons in this case are the original bonds upon which the pursuer became a co-debtor, I think there is nothing in this point.

Roughhead v.
White.

Lord Mackenzie.

I confess I share with my brother, Lord Dundas, his sympathy for the pursuer in the position in which he is placed; but after careful consideration I think it necessarily follows from the whole facts of the case that his rights must be regulated by the bond of relief, and that he cannot succeed upon the very skilful argument presented by Mr Murray to the effect that his rights were not to be regulated by that bond, but emerged independently of the bond when once it was shown that he had taken the necessary steps to withdraw from the Association and to have another member substituted in his place. It would have been possible had he been able to get the consent of the Association to make a bargain in different terms; but looking to the terms of the bargain upon which he went out I think the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived is inevitable.

The husband died survived by his wife and by a son and a daughter.

Held that a deed executed by the surviving wife, whereby she appointed a liferent interest only in part of the trust fund to her son, and the fee of the whole fund to her daughter or the daughter's heirs, was a valid exercise of the power.

THIS was a case remitted by the Honourable Mr Justice Joyce, one Nov. 19, 1912. of the Judges of the Chancery Division of His Majesty's High Court of Justice in England, in terms of the British Law Ascertainment Act, 1859 (22 and 23 Vict. cap. 63), for the opinion of the First Division of the Court of Session. Pringle's Trustees v. Basta.

The questions at issue related to the marriage-contract in Scottish form entered into between Chetwode Drummond Pringle and Mrs Ellen Eliza Elliot or Pringle, his wife, and had arisen in a suit in which the plaintiffs were the trustees acting under the marriage-contract, and the defendants were (1) Claude Mark Elliot Pringle, the only son of the marriage, who was represented by a guardian ad litem; (2) Count Carlo Basta, husband of the deceased Violet Pringle, the only daughter of the marriage; (3) the children of Count and Countess Basta, who were represented by a guardian ad litem; and (4) certain assignees of Count Basta, who did not compare in the Court of Session. 1ST DIVISION.

The facts as set forth in the case were:—

"1. The above-named Chetwode Drummond Pringle (hereinafter called Chetwode Pringle) married the above-named Ellen Eliza Pringle (then Ellen Eliza Elliot, and hereinafter referred to as Mrs Pringle) at Cheltenham, on 29th March 1871.

"2. After the said marriage two postnuptial settlements were entered into by the spouses, viz.:—(1) a settlement (in English form, and hereinafter referred to as the English settlement), dated 23rd December 1871, and made between Chetwode Pringle, of the first part, Mrs Pringle, of the second part, and [certain trustees], of the third part; and (2) a postnuptial contract of marriage (in Scottish form, and hereinafter referred to as the Scottish settlement), dated 23rd December 1871 and 2nd January 1872, and registered in the Books of Council and Session on 20th January 1872, made between Chetwode Pringle, of the one part, Mrs Pringle, of the second part, and the said Robert Kerr Elliot (father of Mrs Pringle), of the third part.

"3. By the English settlement a sum of £3000, to which Chetwode Pringle was entitled expectant upon the death of the survivor of his parents, was assigned by him to the parties thereto of the third part as trustees, and settled upon trust to pay the income to Chetwode Pringle for his life, and after his death to Mrs Pringle for her life, and after the death of the survivor of them, as to both capital and income, upon trust for" the children of the marriage.

"4. By the Scottish settlement, and for the consideration therein mentioned, the said Robert Kerr Elliot (now deceased) bound himself during his life to pay to his daughter Mrs Pringle an alimentary annuity of £100 sterling during the joint lives of himself and Mrs Pringle, and he further bound and obliged himself and his heirs, executors, and successors, to pay to [certain persons] as trustees for the purposes thereafter mentioned the sum of £3000, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his death"; and Mrs Pringle granted a disposition of acquisita et acquirenda in favour of the trustees.

"5. By the Scottish settlement it was declared that the said sum of £3000, and the estate, means, and effects thereby conveyed should be held by the trustees thereof for the following purposes, viz.:—(First) to pay the yearly interest, dividends, and produce, after deduction of the trust expenses, to Mrs Pringle during her lifetime exclu-

Pringle's
Trustees v.
Basta.

"6. The trustees now acting under both settlements are the said Robert Henry Elliot and James Moffat, who are the plaintiffs in the present action. The capital of the trust funds held under the English settlement consists of:—(1) £2961, 6s. 7d. India 3 per cent Stock; and (2) £146, 10s. 0d. Consols. The capital of the trust funds held under the Scottish settlement is now represented by heritable bonds to the amount of £4666, 13s. 4d. over certain estates in Scotland.

"7. Chetwode Pringle died at Arcachon, Gironde, France, on 30th December 1878, survived by Mrs Pringle and two children only, viz., (1) Claude Mark Elliot Pringle (hereinafter called Claude Pringle), who was born in the Azores on 20th October 1874; and (2) Adelaide Eleanor Violet Pringle (afterwards Countess Basta), who was born at Biarritz, France, on 17th February 1878.

"8. Mrs Pringle died at Rome on 20th January 1911, having resided in Italy for many years prior to her death. Claude Pringle, who is a defendant in the present action, is incapable of managing his own affairs, and has been for many years, and is now, resident in Italy. The said Adelaide Eleanor Violet Pringle was married to the defendant Count Carlo Basta at Rome on 2nd December 1897, and died at Rome on 10th March 1910, survived by three children only, the infant defendants in the present action. The defendant Count Basta was at the time of his marriage, and still is, a domiciled Italian. By an order in the present action, dated 26th October 1911, the Official Solicitor of the High Court of Justice in England was appointed to be guardian ad litem of the defendant Claude Pringle, and also of the three infant defendants for the purposes of this action.

"9. No joint appointment was made by Chetwode Pringle and Mrs Pringle under either the English or the Scottish settlement during the life of Chetwode Pringle, but on 25th October 1897 an agreement was entered into between Mrs Pringle, the said Adelaide Eleanor Violet Pringle (therein designated as Violet Chetwode Pringle), and the said Count Basta, which, inter alia, provides as follows, viz. . . .

Nov. 19, 1912.
Pringle's
Trustees v.
Basta.

"In consideration of the intended marriage between said Miss Violet Chetwode Pringle and said Count Basta the above mentioned parties in order to establish the conditions of the marriage agree on what follows:—

"I. This present deed is intended to be subject to English and Scotch laws especially in regard to third parties so that nobody may raise any objection as to its form in order to prevent its full execution about the rights and obligations involved in this Contract which must then be considered as if it had been drawn, agreed upon, and signed in England and Scotland. . . .

"VII. Mrs Ellen Elliot Pringle in consideration of this marriage and in conformity with the previous paragraphs gives to her daughter irrevocably the following goods. This donation is at the same time the constitution of the following goods as dowry to the said daughter Miss Violet Chetwode Pringle. The sum of £7666, 13s. 4d. This amount is represented by £4666, 13s. 4d. in bonds over the estate of Clifton belonging to Mr Robert Henry Elliot of which are trustees Messrs Robert Henry Elliot James Moffat Thomas Elliot Boag Charles Stuart Pringle Patrick John James Grant Ord as by the marriage-contract made by her father the late Mr Robert Kerr Elliot on the 20th January 1872 at Edinburgh and by £3000 as portion left to her by her husband the late Mr Chetwode Drummond Pringle as by postnuptial contract 23rd December 1871. Said sums or any greater sum that may appear due will be kept in trust during the life of said Mrs Ellen Elliot Pringle who will use the income. At her death the sum of £4300 will remain in trust or in any other way bound in favour of her son Mr Claude Chetwode Pringle to whom the income will be unconditionally paid during his life. The other sum that will result from this deduction of £4300 will be paid at once to the daughter Miss Violet or her heirs. On the death of Mr Claude C. Pringle also the principal of the £4300 shall be paid to Miss Violet then Countess Basta or her heirs as by paragraph III. of this contract.* Having thus provided for the existence of her son Mrs Ellen Chetwode Pringle intends that this disposal of the whole capital of these £7666, 13s. 4d. be respected by her son and confirms

* Paragraph III. was as follows:—"The husband and wife will live under the Italian law of the dowry Miss Violet C. Pringle constitutes for herself as dowry all goods and moneys that she is entitled to or will be entitled to by the present Contract and all that she may in future time acquire by inheritance donations or any other form whatsoever. Such goods and monies forming the dowry will be administered by the husband and invested by him to the best advantage of the family: he will protect all rights of the wife without need of any further authorisation or limitation. He will be responsible to his wife alone of said administration and he declares himself to be debtor towards her of all sums that he will receive and he guarantees these obligations with all that he owns or will own in the future as it is disposed by the Italian law. Only the wife can pretend from time to time that any determined sum may be cashed and invested under the dowry lien."

Nov. 19, 1912. her will by giving irrevocably to her daughter all that capital. Should Mr Claude C. Pringle raise objections to these dispositions Mrs Ellen C. Pringle will deprive him of the income of the £4300 as above said and will give him only one shilling.

Pringle's
Trustees v.
Basta.

" 12. A question has arisen in the present action as to whether the agreement of 25th October 1897 constitutes a proper and effectual exercise by Mrs Pringle of the power of appointment conferred on her by the Scottish settlement, and, if so, as to how far it extends.

" 14. The defendant William Charles Rowcliffe, as the administrator of the Countess Basta, and the defendant Count Basta contend that the agreement of the 25th October 1897 operated as a good and valid appointment in favour of Countess Basta of £366, 13s. 4d., part of the said £4666, 13s. 4d. heritable bonds to take effect in possession immediately upon her mother's death, and was a good and valid appointment in favour of the Countess Basta of the residue of the said heritable bonds to take effect in possession forthwith on the death of her brother, Claude Pringle, and alternatively, if the said agreement of the 25th October 1897 is held not to be a good and valid appointment as aforesaid, then, that the said heritable bonds were wholly unappointed and vested absolutely in Countess Basta and her brother, Claude Pringle, in equal shares. The defendant Claude Mark Elliot Pringle contends that the agreement of the 25th October 1897 operated as a good and valid appointment in his favour of a life interest in £4300, part of the said £4666, 13s. 4d. heritable bonds to take effect in possession immediately on his mother's death, and that subject thereto the said heritable bonds were wholly unappointed, and that he is entitled to one moiety thereof, and alternatively, if the said agreement of the 25th October 1897 is held not to be a good and valid appointment as aforesaid, then, that the said heritable bonds were wholly unappointed, and vested absolutely as to one moiety thereof in him; and the defendants Florenza Elena Adelaide Basta, Tecla Violetta Amalia Basta, and Dimitrio Leonardo Carmine Basta [the children of Count and Countess Basta] contend that the agreement of the 25th October 1897 did not operate as a good or valid appointment in any respect, and that the said heritable bonds were wholly unappointed and vested absolutely as to one moiety thereof in them in equal shares."

The following questions of law, inter alia, were submitted for the opinion of the Court:—" (1) Is the agreement of 25th October 1897 a proper exercise by Mrs Pringle to any extent of the power of appointment conferred on her by the Scottish settlement? (2) If the foregoing question is answered in the affirmative—(a) Is the appointment of a life interest in £4300 to Claude Pringle good and valid? and (b) Is the appointment of the principal of the £4300 (subject to the life interest of Claude Pringle) to Countess Basta good and valid? and (c) Is the appointment of the residue of the funds in excess of the £4300 to Countess Basta good and valid?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 12th and 13th November 1912.

Argued for Claude Pringle's guardian ad litem and for Count Basta;—Since the Powers of Appointment Act, 1874¹ an appointment was not invalid on the ground that an object of the power had been altogether excluded. A fortiori it was competent to give a liferent to an object of the power, provided that the fee, as here, was not appointed Nov. 19, 1912. to anyone outside the power.¹ That principle had been long recognised in England.² It was unnecessary for the power of appointment to contain words expressly authorising the imposition of conditions, restrictions, or limitations.³ The trustees were directed by the marriage-contract "to hold the fund," an expression which was quite consistent with the continuing trust which would result from a gift of lifeferent and fee. In any event, conditions which were ultra vires should be ignored, and the appointment in other respects should stand.⁴

Argued for the guardian ad litem to Florenza Basta and others;—The law distinguished between a strict power of apportionment and a general power to appoint or test upon a fund.⁵ The marriage-contract here entitled the appointer merely to apportion the capital and not to impose restrictions and limitations. It was therefore not a good exercise of the power to give a lifeferent to one person and the fee to another, even though both were among the objects of the power, and accordingly the appointment was wholly bad.⁶ The effect of giving a lifeferent to one person and the fee to another person "or his heirs" would be to suspend payment and create a continuing trust (for which there was no authority in the deed), and, as vesting was also suspended till the expiry of the lifeferent, the result in the present case was that the fee would go to the daughter's heirs, who were not objects of the power.

ON 19th November 1912 the Court, without delivering opinions, answered the first question and all three branches of the second question in the affirmative.

Sinclair's
Trustees v.
Sinclair.

JAMES SMITH AND ANOTHER (James Sinclair's Testamentary Trustees), First Parties.—Chree, K.C.—D. Anderson.
CHARLES WEMYSS SINCLAIR, Second Party.—Constable, K.C.—Ingram.

Trust—Termination of trust—Discretionary power to trustees to continue trust till estate cleared of debt—No reasonable prospect of debt being paid—Right of fiar to terminate trust—Succession—Testament—Construction.

A truster declared it to be his wish and intention that the trust should continue for ten years after his death and such further period as his trustees might consider necessary and expedient for carrying out the "ultimate object" of the trust (viz., the freeing of the heritable estate from debt) "in so far as this may reasonably be attained." Thirty-five years after the truster's death the estate had not been freed from debt, and the person who, if the period for distribution had arrived, was entitled to the fee demanded that the trustees should denude in his favour. Certain annuities charged on the estate were still current, and, as the fiar was alleged to be financially embarrassed, it was suggested that, if the trustees denuded in his favour, payment of the annuities might be endangered.

Circumstances in which held that, as the trustees admitted that there was no prospect that the estate could be freed of debt within any time that could be specified, they were bound to denude in favour of the fiar.

EXTRA
DIVISION.

JAMES SINCLAIR of Forss, by a trust-disposition and settlement dated 6th March 1874, conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees. The purposes were, inter alia:—" (First) that my trustees shall from the produce of my means and estate pay all my just and lawful debts and funeral expenses, and the expense of executing this trust; (Second) that they shall make payment to my son, George William Sinclair, or failing him, to the heirs of his body during the subsistence of this trust of the annual sum of Five hundred pounds, or such smaller sum as my trustees consider the rental of my estate, after payment of the interest of the debts thereon and the provisions and annuities provided or to be provided by any deed granted by me, will, having regard to my ultimate object of freeing the estate of debt, afford and admit of, and that quarterly during the subsistence of this trust; [(Third) (Fourth) and (Fifth) Payment of various liferents and annuities, including a liferent to his daughter Johanna]; (Sixth) I declare that it is my wish and intention that this trust shall subsist for ten years after my death, and such further period as having in view my ultimate object before mentioned, in so far as this may reasonably be attained, my trustees may consider it necessary and expedient to keep up the same, but in the event of the death of my said heir leaving a child before the expiry of the said ten years, or such further period as aforesaid, then this trust shall subsist until the said child succeeding shall attain majority; (Lastly) on the purposes of this trust being fulfilled, and my trustees judging it expedient for them to denude thereof, I hereby direct and appoint them to dispoise, convey, and make over, my whole heritable and moveable estate above mentioned and described, except such portions thereof as may have been sold as above directed, but under burden always of the liferent to my said daughter, Johanna Sinclair, as before particularly mentioned, to and in favour of my eldest surviving son, George William Sinclair, a Nov. 5, 1912. settler in Australia, and the heirs of his body, whom failing [to various substitutes] but under burden always of the heritable debts ^{Sinclair's} affecting my said estates, and such provisions and annuities as I may ^{Trustees v.} have provided to my children." Sinclair.

By deed of apportionment and provision, also dated 6th March 1874, the testator, after apportioning a sum of £4000 among his younger children, directed his trustees to pay annuities, amounting in all to £440, to six of these children, and the annuities were declared to be strictly alimentary and not liable to their debts or deeds or to the diligence of creditors.

James Sinclair, the testator, died upon 1st March 1876, survived by his eldest son, George William Sinclair, who died on 23rd July of the same year, survived by two sons and five daughters, the elder of the sons being Charles Wemyss Sinclair, who attained majority on 17th April 1883. All the testator's children to whom he left annuities survived him, but in December 1911 the annuities payable were by deaths reduced in number to three, and in amount to £190.

In 1911 Charles Wemyss Sinclair called upon the trustees to denude in his favour, and make over the estate to him subject to the heritable debts and the annuities, and in December of that year a special case was presented for the opinion of the Court, to which the trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased James Sinclair were the first parties, and Charles Wemyss Sinclair the second party.

The case set forth, inter alia :—" 8. When the said James Sinclair, the testator, died on 1st March 1876 his heritable estates were burdened with heritably secured debt to the extent of £62,600, with terminable rent charges amounting to £420 per annum, and with annuities created by his predecessor in the estate amounting to £200 per annum. The annual rental of the heritable estate amounted in 1876 to about £6100, and the annual income from the moveable estate to about £100, together £6200. From this there fell to be deducted approximately [interest, rent charges, and other charges amounting to] £5662, leaving a balance of £538 available to meet the expense of carrying on the trust and providing an allowance to the heir. As the moveable estate of the testator was insufficient to pay his moveable debts, funeral expenses, and provisions to younger children and others, his trustees, to meet these obligations, borrowed on the security of the heritable estates in 1877 £3760, and in 1879 £2500. Further, on the expiry of the lease to the Forss Caithness Pavement Company of Achscrabster Quarries in 1883 the trustees in terms of the lease took over the tenants' plant and machinery at valuation, and to meet the price thereof borrowed a further sum of £3000 on the security of the estates. Further, in order to meet expenditure for improvements on the estates and claims by tenants for meliorations, &c., the trustees in 1886 borrowed a further sum of £4300. The trustees thus borrowed a total sum of £13,560 during the first ten years of the trust, and this added to £62,600 of debt affecting the estates at the time of the testator's death, brought the amount of heritable debt in 1886 up to £76,160, apart from rent charges and annuities. The trustees have since repaid out of income heritable debt to the amount of £7300, and the amount now affecting the estates is therefore £68,860. All the before-mentioned rent charges had expired by 1st October 1892, and the annuities now payable are only £190. 9. Owing to the agricultural depression which set in soon after the commencement of the trust the rents of agricultural subjects have been considerably reduced, and there has also been a considerable diminution of rental through the decay of the pavement industry which has led to the Achscrabster Quarries on the estate of Forss being unlet since the year 1907. On the other hand, the rents of shootings and fishings have increased to some extent. The average gross rental of the estates for the five years ending 31st December 1910 amounted to approximately £4903, and the average gross income of the trust-estate from combined sources for the same period was £5018. The average outgoings for the same period were [interest and other charges amounting to] £4584, leaving a balance of £434 available to meet payments during the period in question for compensation to farm tenants, &c., and for carrying on the trust. It is not anticipated that for some time to come the revenue will appreciably exceed the average sums above stated, but the free revenue will be increased as the annuities (which now amount to £190 per annum) lapse on the death of the annuitants."

The case further stated that from the date of his father's death until July 1885 the trustees paid the second party a sum of £500 per annum, but that thereafter they paid him nothing, in consequence of the receipt by them of a notarial intimation of a bond and disposition and assignation in security granted by the second party for the principal sum of £14,595, which purported to convey the whole heritable estates which had belonged to the truster in security of the debt. The case also set forth a number of other bonds and dispositions in security over the estate of Forss granted by the second party and intimated to the trustees. The case then stated:—"12. In view of the amount of heritable debt affecting the trust-estates, and of the fall of the rental of the said estates since the testator's death, combined with increased taxation, the trustees do not see any prospect of clearing the estate of the debt existing at the testator's death within any period that they can specify."

The first parties maintained "that they are not bound or vested with any discretion entitling them to denude themselves of the trust-estate for the following reasons:—(1) That the whole trust purposes, and especially the primary purpose of the trust, to free the estate of debt, have not been fulfilled. (2) That if the trust is brought to an end by their denuding the payment of the annuities created by the trust-disposition and settlement and still subsisting will be endangered. (3) That their denuding in favour of the second party would, under existing circumstances, entirely defeat the main intention of the testator."

The second party maintained:—" (1) That the trustees have no discretion further to continue the trust on any ground whatsoever, and that he, or those in his right, are entitled to an immediate conveyance of the estate. He submits that on a sound construction of the settlement the only object for which the trustees could competently continue the trust was that of freeing the estate of the debt which existed at the truster's death, and that the power of the trustees to continue the trust has now ceased in respect that the course of the trust administration and the admission of the trustees show that that object cannot, within the meaning of the sixth purpose of the trust, be reasonably attained. He maintains that the additional considerations adduced by the trustees to the effect that he has incurred debt, and that it is doubtful whether, if the trustees denude, the remaining annuities can be effectually secured, are both entirely irrelevant in answer to his claim. The trust-deed contains no prohibition against his incurring debt, and it expressly directs a conveyance to be made under burden of any subsisting annuities. Moreover, the suggestion that the annuities may be prejudiced is unfounded in law. His creditors' rights cannot be higher than his, and if the directions to the trustees to convey under burden of the annuities is sufficient to secure the annuities in a question with the second party, it will equally secure them in a question with his creditors. If the annuities cannot be secured either against the second party or his creditors that will not warrant the trustees in refusing to convey in terms of the trust deed. (2) On the assumption that the trustees have a discretion to continue the trust the second party maintains that they have equally a discretion to end it, and are accordingly, in any case, entitled to denude in favour of him or those in his right. (3) He further maintains that in exercising such discretion the trustees are only entitled to have regard to the object of postponement expressed by the truster, viz., the clearing the estate of the original debt, and that for the reasons above stated they are not entitled to have regard to the other considerations adduced by them."

Trustees v.
Sinclair.

The following question of law (as amended) was, inter alia, submitted for the opinion of the Court:—"1. Are the first parties bound to denude themselves of the trust-estate in favour of the second party, provided he discharges the debts and obligations incurred by him, of which intimation has been made to the first parties, or which stand upon record?"

The case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on 30th October 1912.¹

At advising on 5th November 1912,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question in this case is whether the trustees are now bound to denude in favour of Mr Charles Wemyss Sinclair, provided he discharges the debts and obligations incurred by him of which intimation has been made to the trustees or which stand upon record. I am of opinion that the answer should be in the affirmative.

The trust was created by Mr James Sinclair of Foras who died so long ago as 1876. Mr Charles Wemyss Sinclair came of age in 1883. A consideration of the second and sixth purposes of the trust makes it plain what the ultimate purpose was that the truster had in his mind. It was not to create a trust that should subsist until the estate was cleared of all debt affecting it, but a trust which should subsist for the purpose of freeing the estate of debt in so far as this might reasonably be attained. The wish of the testator was that the trust should subsist for ten years, or until the heir should attain majority. Any further direction as to keeping up the trust is subordinate to what he called his ultimate purpose. On the purposes of the trust being fulfilled, the trustees were directed to convey the Lord Mackenzie.

Wemyss Sinclair is the person now entitled, if the time has arrived at which the conveyance ought to be made. Whether the conveyance ought now to be made depends upon whether the purposes of the trust have been fulfilled, because on a consideration of the last purpose I think the truster did not empower the trustees to delay granting the conveyance after the purposes had been fulfilled. The question therefore is, Have the purposes of the trust been fulfilled? Now, no word has been said against the way in which the trust has been administered, and [from the explanation given by Mr Chree it appears that the condition of the estate has materially improved. The trustees, however, make the frank admission that they "do not see any prospect of clearing the estate of the debt existing at the testator's death within any period they can specify." In these circumstances, is the trust to be kept up or not? It has been in existence for thirty-six years, and from what the trustees say there is no prospect of even another thirty-six years clearing the estate of the debt existing at the testator's death. In these circumstances, I think that the trustees have done all that may reasonably be required of them to attain the testator's ultimate object of freeing the estate of debt, and that accordingly they now have a duty to denude.

There is one clause in the settlement which shows that the testator did not mean that the trust should continue until the whole burdens affecting the estate had been cleared off. The direction to convey is "under burden always of the heritable debts affecting my said estate and such provisions and annuities as I may have provided to my children." The difficulty which was urged upon us by the trustees is in regard to the outstanding annuities of £190 per annum. I think that the clause I have just quoted justifies the trustees in conveying the estate under burden of the annuities even though they are declared to be alimentary. It was pointed out that if the trust administration is withdrawn the security of the alimentary annuities will not be so good, as prior creditors may force a sale of the estate, or enter into possession under their bonds. This, however, is the position in which matters were left by the testator himself and does not warrant the trustees in refusing to convey. Further considerations were dwelt upon of a character personal to the beneficiary himself. These matters do not in my opinion affect the present question. For the reasons stated I am of opinion that the second party is now entitled to a conveyance on the conditions already stated. It is unnecessary to answer the second and third queries.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion, and shall add but little to what your Lordship has said. Counsel for the second party suggested, rather than maintained, that the concluding sentence of the sixth purpose of the settlement should be read as a direction that the trust is to subsist until the occurrence of the event contemplated, and is then to cease. This view is, I think, plainly wrong; the direction is merely that, in the event postulated, the trust should not terminate before the grandson of the testator attained majority. The real point, however, of the case turns upon the proper effect to be given, in the circumstances which have arisen, to the declaration in the said sixth purpose of the trustor's intention that the Nov. 5, 1912.

trust should subsist for ten years after his death "and such further period as, having in view my ultimate object"—viz., freeing the estate of debt—
"in so far as this may reasonably be attained, my trustees may consider it necessary and expedient to keep up the same." About thirty-five years have elapsed since the testator's death, during which the estate has admittedly been administered in a most prudent and careful fashion; but it is stated in the case that "the trustees do not see any prospect of clearing the estate of the debt existing at the testator's death within any period that they can specify." In these circumstances, it seems to me that, upon the trustees' own showing, the testator's "ultimate object" cannot now "reasonably be attained" within the meaning of the said sixth purpose, and that the trust must therefore end. It was argued that, by the last purpose of the trust, denuding was to take place only "on the purposes of this trust being fulfilled"; that this could not be said to have happened while there are subsisting annuities, created by the settlement; and that, if the trustees were to denude, these annuities might be endangered. I hope that the annuities may not be endangered; but I do not think that the fact of their subsistence can be regarded as a sufficient reason for continuing the trust, looking to the express direction in the settlement that the conveyance of the estate by the trustees should be under burden of, inter alia, these annuities. Nor do I consider that we can give effect to the trustees' argument against denuding based on the indebtedness of the second party to creditors, which seems to be considerable. The second party undertakes, prior to any conveyance of the estate to him, to discharge the debts and obligations incurred by him of which intimation has been made to the trustees or which stand upon the record. On this being done, I do not think the trustees or the Court have any concern with the pecuniary affairs or liabilities of the second party.

On the whole matter I have come, not without a feeling of regret, to the conclusion that we must answer in the affirmative the first question put to us by the case (as amended). If this is done, the other questions do not require to be answered.

LORD KINFEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the affirmative.

A company, formed for the purpose of acquiring a rubber estate in the Philippines, issued a prospectus in which was quoted a report on the natural advantages of the estate by one of the directors, who was stated to be acquainted with the locality. The prospectus also bore that no portion of the price of the estate would be paid until the directors had received an independent report confirming the statements of the director.

A shareholder, who had received the prospectus and had applied for and been allotted shares, brought an action against the company for removal of his name from the register of shareholders and for repayment of the price of the shares, on the ground that he had been induced to apply for them by the statements in the report quoted in the prospectus, which statements he averred were false.

The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, in respect (1) that the statements in the report were not put forward as the statements of the company or any of its agents, and (2) that there was no averment that the company, in accepting the pursuer's application for shares, were aware that he had made it relying on the statements in the report.

Lynde v. Anglo-Italian Hemp-Spinning Co., [1896] 1 Ch. 178, approved and followed; In re Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association (Karberg's case), [1892] 3 Ch. 1, distinguished.

1ST DIVISION. ON 15th February 1912 William Henderson Mair brought an action against the Rio Grande Rubber Estates, Limited, for reduction of a letter of application by him for 200 shares in that Company, and of a relative letter of allotment, and a share certificate issued in his favour and an entry of his name in the register of shareholders. The summons also concluded for repayment of sums subscribed by the pursuer in respect of the shares allotted to him.

The pursuer averred;—" (Cond. 2) In or about the beginning of the month of March 1910 there was sent to the pursuer, by or on behalf of the defenders, a prospectus which stated that the Company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, with a capital of £70,000, divided into 70,000 shares of £1 each, and that the Company was formed for the purpose of acquiring a concession to be obtained by the vendors from the Government of the Philippine Islands, giving the exclusive right for twenty years to collect, work, and sell or export the rubber, gutta-percha, and other forest products in a territory estimated to contain about 100 square miles (about 60,000 acres) in the Rio Grande Valley, situated in Mindanao, Southern Philippines. Said prospectus further set forth that Mr C. A. Littler, late commercial agent in the East for the Government of Tasmania, was acquainted with the locality from long residence in the Philippines, and reported in the following terms:—'Glasgow, 9th February 1910.—To the Directors of Rio Grande Rubber Estates, Limited.—I have pleasure in submitting the following brief particulars of the rubber estates situated in the Rio Grande Valley, Cotobato, in the island of Mindanao, Southern Philippines. The territory is very extensive, and is estimated to contain about 60,000 acres. It is well drained and watered, has a warm and equable climate, with ample and well-spread rainfall (about 80 inches per annum), all necessary for the successful cultivation of rubber. Being just south of 7° north latitude, it is well within the rubber zone and out of the typhoon area. Shipping facilities are excellent, while labour is cheap. The area was a great centre for the collection of wild rubber until five years ago, when the Government cancelled all licences, owing to damage done to rubber trees and vines. Since then the area has been reserved with a view to the formation of a responsible organisation, which would undertake a scheme of collecting and re-planting. Even with the crude methods of extraction which then prevailed as much as 40,000 lbs. of rubber per month has paid royalty (only a little over one penny per lb.). In consequence of the Government not having allowed the rubber trees and vines to be tapped, they are now ripe for tapping on a large scale. Under an organised system of collection it should be easy to maintain an average annual output of wild rubber for the next seven years of at least 120,000 lbs., which, with rubber at only 4s. per lb., should give a net profit of not less than £12,000 per annum, thereby providing an excellent return while the Para trees to be planted are maturing. After the fifth year the combined revenues from wild and planted rubber will increase enormously, and at the end of ten years, with 2500 acres bearing, the net profit, taking rubber at only 3s. per lb., should be about £64,000 per annum. The estates are unique in my experience in respect that, in addition to the enormous possibilities of such a large territory if systematically developed, they contain wild rubber trees and vines in such quantities that immediate profits are assured. Under efficient and energetic management they cannot fail to yield large profits to the shareholders. I have made up the following detailed estimate of profits:—[Here followed a detailed estimate bringing out the figures given above]—Said Mr Littler was one of the directors of the Company. He was also the promoter, or one of the promoters, of the Company.” (Cond. 3) “Said prospectus further sets forth, ‘From the above report by Mr Littler, it will be seen that an immediate profit of not less than £12,000 per annum may be expected, out of which the directors propose to set aside each year a sum of £5000 for the further development of the property and the general purposes of the Company. This would leave a sum of £7000, equal to a dividend of 10 per cent on the total capital, which it is expected will be paid at the end of the first year after the Company has commenced operations on the property, and also in each of the five subsequent years, by which time the planted rubber trees should be producing. During this period a sum of £25,000 would thus be provided for additional working capital, which on the subscription of the present issue would give a total working capital of £65,000. This, the directors are advised, is considered sufficient to plant and bring to bearing about 2500 acres’; and further, ‘The statements in this prospectus are based mainly on Mr Littler’s report, on information furnished by him and the publications * above referred to. . . .’” (Cond. 4) “On or about the 1st day of March 1910 pursuer made application for the allotment of 200 shares of said Company. On or about the 7th day of March 1910 he received a letter of allotment informing him that the directors had allotted him 200 shares of the Company. Thereafter pursuer’s name was entered in the register of shareholders as the holder of 200 shares, and a share certificate in respect of his holding was duly issued to him. . . .” (Cond. 6) “The pursuer applied for the said shares, allowed his name to be put on the register, accepted the said certificate, and made said payments in reliance on the statements contained in the said prospectus and report therein incorporated, and in the belief that they were true. He has recently learned that the said statements were false and fraudulent. In particular in the said prospectus it is, inter

* The prospectus contained quotations from Philippine Government official publications on the subject of the suitability of the territory for the cultivation of rubber.

Nov. 21, 1912. alia, stated that up till 1905, 40,000 lbs. of wild rubber every month was got from the property which the Company was acquiring, and that from 1910 (the year of the Company's incorporation) onward there would be got from this property 120,000 lbs. of rubber annually. In point of fact there was no wild rubber or any rubber on said territory, or at all events such an insignificant quantity that it would not pay the cost of collection, and consequently there could be no income from this source from the property. The pursuer was induced to apply for shares in the Company because of these false and fraudulent statements."

Mair v. Rio
Grande
Rubber

The pursuer further averred that the prospectus, as a further inducement to the public to subscribe for shares, set forth:—"No portion of the price will be paid until the directors have received an independent report from their manager, or other expert acting for them, substantially confirming the statements in Mr Littler's report, and until the title to the subjects purchased has been delivered"; and that the directors, in direct breach of these representations, had paid over the whole of, or at least a great proportion of, the price before obtaining either such a report or a good or any title to the property.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—1. The pursuer having been induced to become a shareholder in the said Company by false and fraudulent statements contained in the prospectus of the Company, decree of reduction should be pronounced as craved. 2. The pursuer having entered into the said contract to take shares under essential error induced by the misrepresentations made in the prospectus, is entitled to rescind the said contract, and to decree of reduction as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—1. (a) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant to support the conclusions of the summons, and separatim, they are insufficient in specification. 1. (b) The pursuer's averments in article 6 of the condescendence are irrelevant and ought not to be remitted to probation.

On 2nd July 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) sustained the defenders' first plea in law and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the averments of the pursuer]—He [the pursuer] now asks a proof of the falsity of the averments to which I have referred. I should perhaps notice that although the statements are said to be fraudulent no averments are made imputing fraud to the Company. This, however, is not material as one who has been induced to enter into a contract by the false statements of the party with whom he has contracted is entitled to have the contract set aside whether the statements were made innocently or fraudulently.

"The difficulty, however, which the pursuer has to face at this stage is whether on a sound construction of the prospectus the statements which he complains of as false are really statements of the Company, i.e., made by the directors on behalf of the Company, or are merely statements contained in a report which is accurately set out in the prospectus. In the case of Reese River Silver Mining Company, (1867) L. R., 2 Ch. 604, Lord Justice Turner, at p. 611, said:—"If a company will take upon itself to assume the authenticity of, and give credit to, the reports which are made to it, and represent as facts the matters stated in those reports, it must take the consequences. If the company had confined themselves to saying 'We have received reports from which we believe, and have reason to believe, that these mines are in full operation, and are making daily large returns,'"

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Nov. 21, 1912. Division (without Lord Johnston) on 20th November 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—(1) The only inference to be drawn from the inclusion of Mr Littler's report in the prospectus—especially as he was a promoter and director of the Company—was that the Company held out that report to the public as a report on which the public were entitled to rely. The statements which it contained were false, and accordingly the Company could not avoid responsibility for the issuing of these false representations. (2) Even if the Company had not assumed responsibility for the accuracy of the report and were unaware that it was inaccurate, the reclaimer was still entitled to succeed on the ground that the Company had accepted his offer to take shares in the knowledge that the offer had been made in reliance on the statements in the report.¹ The Company could not deny that knowledge, for it was obvious that applicait might, and no doubt would, have been very difficult for Mr Smith to be relieved from the contract, but the company, instead of thus referring to the information received, stated the circumstances as facts.' Lord Cairns, at p. 615 of the same report, says:—'If they had been content to say, "We ourselves know nothing about the state of the mine, but we have been told it is a very valuable mine largely worked at present"; and if they had, in point of fact, been so told, no person could have complained of the prospectus as calculated to mislead; but in place of repeating as hearsay what they had been told, they affirm it as a positive fact, and apparently, according to the terms of the prospectus, as a fact within their own knowledge.' The decisions of Mr Justice Kay in Re British Burmah Lead Company, Limited, (1887) 56 L. T. 815, and Smith's case (In re British Burmah Land Company, Limited), (1888) 4 T. L. R. 631, illustrate the distinction thus drawn.

"I do not think that the directors, in issuing the present prospectus, adopted and put forward as their own, the statements contained in Mr Littler's report. It is expressly stated that 'The statements in this prospectus are based mainly on Mr Littler's report, on information furnished by him and the publications above referred to.' There is also a provision in these terms: 'No portion of the price will be paid until the directors have received an independent report from their manager, or other expert acting for them, substantially confirming the statements in Mr Littler's report.' The pursuer alleges that the Company did not carry out this undertaking. Even if this be established I do not think it would assist the pursuer in setting aside the contract on the ground of misrepresentation although it might found an action of damages for breach of the undertaking. The obligation, however, seems inconsistent with the view that the Company adopted as their own Mr Littler's statements.

"The pursuer also submitted to me that, on the principle upon which the case of Karberg, [1892] 3 Ch. 1, was decided, he is entitled to succeed upon establishing the falsity of the statements in the report referred to in the prospectus even although, on a sound construction of that document, the statements do not fall to be imputed to the Company. In Karberg's case a shareholder had taken shares upon the faith of a false statement which had appeared in a prospectus issued by the promoters of the com-tions for shares were made on the faith of the prospectus, and the main information that the prospectus conveyed to the public was the information contained in Mr Littler's report.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

At advising on 21st November 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—A limited Company, the Rio Grande Rubber Estates, Limited, issued a prospectus. The pursuer is a gentleman who applied for shares in the Company and was allotted certain shares. He avers—and we must, therefore, upon a question of relevancy, take it to be true—that he applied for those shares upon the faith of the prospectus. He raises this present action to have the contract, which he entered into by taking shares, rescinded, and his name taken off the register of shareholders, on the ground that the statements in the prospectus were untrue, and that it was in respect of those statements that he took his shares. [His Lordship quoted the statements in the prospectus, printed supra.]

Upon these averments the Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action as irrelevant, and his Lordship's ground is this—that there is no statement pany to the effect that certain gentlemen had expressed their willingness to become members of the council of administration. It was held that although the prospectus was issued before the formation of the company, yet as it formed the basis of his contract to take shares the shareholder was entitled to be relieved of the contract. In the subsequent case of Lynde, [1896] 1 Ch. 178, Mr Justice Romer explains that generally speaking to make a company liable for misrepresentations inducing a contract to take shares from it, the shareholder must bring his case within one or other of four heads. The fourth head he describes in these terms:—'Where the contract is made on the basis of certain representations, whether the particulars of those representations were known to the company or not, and it turns out that some of those representations were material and untrue—as for example, if the directors of a company know when allotting that an application for shares is based on the statements contained in a prospectus, even though that prospectus was issued without authority or even before the company was formed, and even if its contents are not known to the directors.' It is under this head that he puts the case of Karberg. Lord Lindley in his work on Companies (6th edition vol. i. p. 96), dealing with the same case says:—'It is to be observed that the judgments of the Court contain no finding that the directors, when making the allotment to Karberg, knew that his application was based upon the prospectus issued by the promoters. It is, however, apprehended that such knowledge is essential to the decision, and was tacitly assumed by the Court.' The present case is, I think, quite different from Karberg's case. The prospectus was no doubt the basis of the contract; but if my interpretation of that document is sound, there was no misstatement therein of which the pursuer complains. I do not think that the report of Mr Littler can be said to be the basis of the contract; and, in any event, the terms of the prospectus appear to me to be inconsistent with the view that knowledge that the application was based upon the report must be imputed to the directors.

"As therefore, the only statements complained of as false are contained in the report which is accurately set forth in the prospectus, and as these statements do not appear to me to be adopted and stated as facts by the directors, I shall sustain the defenders' first plea and dismiss the action as irrelevant."

made in the prospectus as a statement of the directors which can be said to Nov. 21, 1912. be untrue. In other words, that the Company does not say through its directors in the prospectus that there is this large rubber field. It only says —what is admitted to be the fact—that Mr Littler has reported that there is a large amount of rubber in this field. And his Lordship quotes from the judgments in the well-known case of Reese River Silver Mining Company,¹ and holds accordingly that there is no averment here of a false statement made by the Company.

Mair v. Rio Grande Rubber Estates, Limited.
 Ld. President.

Upon a construction of the prospectus I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I do not think you can read this prospectus fairly as showing anything except that the Company itself has been told these various things about the property by Littler, who is a man acquainted with the spot. They back that up by saying that official publications say that the soil is well suited for the cultivation of rubber. I need scarcely point out that what was meant to be engaged in was rubber plantation, and the eventual future of the Company would depend, not upon the wild rubber that was originally there, but upon the success of the rubber cultivation which would be initiated by the Company. But I do not for one moment doubt that the statement that the territory had so much wild rubber in it that the Company would pay its way for the years during which it is always necessary to wait before planted rubber trees come into bearing is a very material statement in itself; but then, as I have already said, that statement is not made by the directors in the prospectus as from themselves. All they say—and they say truly—is that a man who has been there reports it to them. And I think they make that very clear by the paragraph in the report that I have already quoted, in which they particularly call attention to the fact that the statements in the prospectus are based upon Littler's report. And I think they make it inferentially clear by the other paragraph which I quoted, in which they announce their policy of not paying the price until they have had a report from their manager or other expert substantially confirming the statements in Mr Littler's report. That seems to me to show clearly that they themselves cannot vouch the truth of what Mr Littler has said, and that they propose not to pay the price until they have somebody else who vouches for the truth of these statements. Accordingly, to the question, Is this a misrepresentation as it stands in the prospectus? I answer that there is no misrepresentation to anyone who reads the prospectus fairly, and that the pursuer cannot be relieved upon that ground, and therefore has not made a relevant case.

We had, however, a very ingenious argument from Mr Sandeman in which, upon the assumption—because, of course, if he had won upon the meaning of the prospectus, he would not have needed to go any further—but upon the assumption that what I have said so far is right, he still said the pursuer was entitled to be relieved, and he put his argument upon the case known as Karberg's case.² Now, Karberg's case is a peculiar case, I think it is, if I may say so, unique; indeed the very eminent Judges who decided it confessed that it was so. Lord Justice Lindley, who gave the leading judgment, says that he can find no case exactly in point, and (at p. 13)

Nov. 21, 1912. he says quite truly that, "speaking generally, there is no doubt that a misrepresentation in order to vitiate a contract must be made by a party to it, or by his agent." The facts in *Karberg's case*¹ were these: A prospectus had been issued by the promoters before the company was formed, and that prospectus announced the intended formation of the company and solicited persons who received it to take shares in the company when it was formed. That prospectus contained a statement that two well-known persons, Lord Brabourne and Admiral Mayne, were to form part of a sort of directing body which was to control the company's operations. The company was formed, and the plaintiff sent in an application admittedly based upon the prospectus—that is to say, the only information he had about the company was derived from this prospectus. He accordingly applied for and got shares. He afterwards discovered that, as a matter of fact, neither Lord Brabourne nor Admiral Mayne had consented to join the company, and he therefore brought an action to get rid of his shares upon the ground that he had contracted upon the faith of the representation contained in the prospectus, which representation had not been made good by the company when it came into being. Accordingly, the misrepresentation there had been made in a document which had not been issued by the company itself, because the company itself was not in existence, and nobody could make a misrepresentation on its behalf before its birth. Well, Lord Lindley proceeds (at p. 13): "But this rule is not without exception. *Stewart's case*² and *Downes v. Ship*³ warrant the proposition that an application to a company when formed for shares, based upon a prospectus issued by the promoters of the company before its formation, cannot be disavowed by the company from such prospectus."

With great deference to Lord Lindley, I do not think that *Stewart's case*² and *Downes v. Ship*³ are really good illustrations for what he says, because I think both of these cases depended upon a different principle. *Downes v. Ship*³ went to the House of Lords. *Stewart's case*² was decided in the Court of Appeal. They were both cases where what was complained of was that, when the company came out, the contents of the memorandum—which, of course, constitutes the company—went far beyond the objects of the company as disclosed in the prospectus. Now there is, perhaps, a slight difficulty of words in this matter, and I will explain it as clearly as I can. In one sense there is no mistake as to identity, because there was only one company—a company registered in the office in London under such-and-such a name—and the company which was mentioned in the prospectus as going to be born was, in that sense, the same company which was born after registration. But in another sense there was not identity. As your Lordships very well know, a limited company is a creature of statute, and it can only do the things which are set forth in its memorandum. And therefore the company, as registered in that case, was really a different being from the being as set forth in the prospectus, and I think it is upon that view that those cases were truly decided. In other words, I think you do not come properly into the region of misrepresentation at all but into the region of essential error as to the subject—the chapter of law which is dealt with in the Digest in the well-known passages the heading of which might be “Si aes pro auro veneat,”¹ which I had occasion to comment on (and I will not repeat what I said) in January last in the case of Edgar v. Hector.² Accordingly, with deference to Lord Lindley, I do not think that *Stewart's case*³ and *Downes v. Ship*⁴ had much to do with what he was dealing with, though they were, so to speak, illustrations of the fact that you might get rid of a contract in respect of something that had been said in a document not issued by the person against whom you were claiming to have the contract rescinded. I think what was at the bottom of these cases was essential error and not misrepresentation.

But, none the less, I say, with great respect, that I entirely approve of the decision in *Karberg's case*⁵; I think it was rightly decided. But the point of it—as indeed is acknowledged by Lord Lindley in the book which he afterwards published—the point of it is that in *Karberg's case*⁵ the directors of the company were held to have known, when they accepted the application for the allotment, that the application was made upon the faith of the prospectus issued by the promoters. Without that knowledge I do not think that the plaintiff could have been relieved. And I am confirmed in this view by a correction which Lord Justice Buckley made in his well-known work (the last edition) in commenting upon a judgment of Mr Justice Romer's in the case of Lynde v. The Anglo-Italian Hemp-Spinning Company.⁶ In that case the company was registered to take over certain hemp works which had belonged to the promoters, whose names were Thomson and Waithman. Thomson and Waithman went about—if I may use the word—puffing the company and making extravagant and (I will assume) false statements as to the company and its prospects. Upon the faith of those statements the plaintiff applied for shares. He sought to be relieved upon the ground that he had been induced to take his shares by misrepresentation. But Mr Justice Romer refused him relief because he had not connected the company in any way with those statements of Thomson and Waithman. The statements had not been made in any document issued by the company, and there was no proof that Thomson and Waithman were, in any way, acting as agents of the company in what they did. And Mr Justice Romer distinguished the case from Karberg's case,⁵ because it was not shown that the directors knew that the application was made upon the faith of what Thomson and Waithman had said. Unfortunately, in setting forth, as he does in his opinion, the various heads under which cases fall in which rescission may be effectually craved, he makes a slip in the phraseology of the fourth head. That it is only a slip is made clear by the decision in the case, and by another subsequent passage of the opinion as given. I think the analysis of Mr Justice Romer is so well expressed and so valuable that I do not apologise

What he says (at p. 182) is this: "It appears to me that, speaking generally, to make a company liable for misrepresentations inducing a contract to take shares from it the shareholder must bring his case within one or other of the following heads:—(1) Where the misrepresentations are made by the directors or other the general agents of the company entitled to act and acting on its behalf—as, for example, by a prospectus issued by the authority or sanction of the directors of a company inviting subscriptions for shares; (2) Where the misrepresentations are made by a special agent of the company while acting within the scope of his authority—as, for example, by an agent specially authorised to obtain, on behalf of the company, subscriptions for shares. This head of course includes the case of a person constituted agent by subsequent adoption of his acts; (3) Where the company can be held affected, before the contract is complete, with the knowledge that it is induced by misrepresentations—as for example, when the directors, on allotting shares, know, in fact, that the application for them has been induced by misrepresentations, even though made without any authority." Well, that is only another branch of the old doctrine that nobody can ever take benefit by anybody else's fraud if they know that it is fraud. Well, then, last and fourth, the learned Judge says: "Where the contract is made on the basis of certain representations, whether the particulars of these representations were known to the company or not, and it turns out that some of those representations were material and untrue." Now, Lord Justice Buckley¹ has corrected that by substituting the following words: "Where the contract is made to the knowledge of the company or its agents on the basis of certain representations." That Mr Justice Romer meant that is, I think, perfectly certain. In the first place, if you took the sentence as it stood, the judgment would have been the other way, because in that case the contract had been made on the basis of representations by Waithman and Thomson, and it turned out that some of those representations were material and untrue. And, secondly, when Mr Justice Romer comes to deal with Karberg's case,² which he puts under that fourth heading, he says this (at p. 185): "Lastly, this is not a case like Karberg's case,² or coming at all within the fourth head. The application for shares made by the plaintiff was not one made conditional upon, or to the knowledge of the directors based upon, any special or other representations made by Waithman." And indeed it becomes clear if one considers what would be the result of the opposite doctrine. The result of the opposite doctrine would be that any contract that you like might be set aside, because one party to the contract could afterwards come to the other and say: "Well, I never would have gone into this contract if it had not been that I trusted to statements made to me by A, B, or C, behind your back it is true, but still that is what induced me to make the contract with you"; which would really be an end of all business.

Well now, applying that case to this, I think it will be found that the argument just comes back again to the question what is the true meaning of the prospectus. There is no proof offered here—and none could be—that the application was made, to the knowledge of the directors, upon any representation at all. I agree that it would be inferred and held against the directors here that they must consider that any application which came to them might be, and probably was, based upon statements in their own prospectus. And therefore I would be perfectly willing to hold it as proved against the directors that, when they entertained the application, they must have known that it was made upon the statements that they had put into their own prospectus. But then, as soon as you come to that, you come to the prospectus as a whole, and then, if what I said at the beginning is right, you just have the same question as before. The truth is that the fallacy of Mr Sandeman's argument is this: In order to equiparate this case with Karberg's case,¹ he would have had to set forth that he had had an interview with Littler, or had had a letter from Littler, in which Littler had put, by themselves, the statements in his report, and that in some way or other it had been brought to the knowledge of the directors that the application was made upon the faith of what Littler had then said. Instead of that, the only thing that can be brought to the knowledge of the directors is that the application was made upon the prospectus as a whole. You cannot simply take out one bit of the prospectus and, taking out that bit, say, "This is the statement to which you, the directors, invited me to pin my faith."

Ld. President.

Upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was right, and that his interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that the pursuer has set forth any relevant case for getting rid of the shares for which he applied. The pursuer's offer to take these shares was an offer to take them on the terms of the prospectus and on no other terms, and the acceptance of his application of the allotment of the shares was an acceptance of his offer on these terms. But then by the prospectus is meant the prospectus as a whole. I agree with the construction already put upon its terms, and do not think it necessary again to go over the different clauses. I content myself with saying that I am unable, on a just construction of this prospectus, to find that the Company put forward Mr Littler as their agent in making any of the representations that are contained in his report; and, therefore, there is no relevant averment that the Company or the directors, either by themselves or through their agent, made any misrepresentation in regard to matters of fact, and more particularly any misrepresentation as set out in article 6 of the condescendence.

But then, if Littler is taken as an outside party—and that was the condition of the alternative argument presented to us by Mr Sandeman—equally I think the pursuer has made no relevant averment, because, in order to get relief as against the defenders, he would require to aver that the contract that he made with them was not only on the basis of representations contained in the report, but was, to the knowledge of the directors, based upon the statements made by Littler in his report. That is to say, I entirely adopt the view of Mr Justice Romer's judgment in the case of

Nov. 21, 1912. Lynda,¹ which, as your Lordship has pointed out, is contained in the ninth edition of Lord Justice Buckley's work, at p. 90. The same point is dealt with in the sixth edition of Lord Lindley's book on Companies, vol. 1, p. 96. As it is impossible for the pursuer here, looking to the terms of the prospectus, to say that the contract he made was, to the knowledge of the directors, based upon statements in Littler's report, I agree that the action must fail.

Glasgow Court

Glasgow
Parish Council.

Rates and Assessments—Exemption—Crown—Buildings held by statutory body and occupied for public purposes—Law Courts—Buildings partly let.

Held that a statutory body of commissioners created for the purpose of holding buildings in Glasgow, which were used for certain public purposes, viz., Justiciary Courts, Sheriff Courts, and Justice of the Peace Courts, were exempt from assessment both for owners' and occupiers' rates, except with regard to certain portions of the buildings which were let to the County Council and for which rents were paid; and that in respect of these portions, seeing that they were held as mere investments, the commissioners were liable for owners' rates.

Coomber v. Justices of Berks, (1883) 9 App. Cas. 61, followed.

1ST DIVISION. ON 12th November 1912 a special case was presented by the Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners, first parties, and the Parish Council of the Parish of Glasgow, second parties, for the opinion and judgment of the Court with reference to the liability of the first parties for rates in respect of certain buildings held by them.

The case stated as follows:—

"1. The Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners, incorporated by the 'Glasgow Court Houses Amendment Act, 1872' (35 and 36 Vict. cap. vi.), who are the first parties to this case, are charged with the statutory duty of providing court house buildings for the city of Glasgow, and the lower ward of the county of Lanark, and also courts for the sittings of the High Court of Justiciary on circuit for the city of Glasgow and surrounding districts. The Commissioners incorporated in 1872 come in place of the unincorporated body of commissioners appointed by the first Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1836, and they now administer the following local and private Acts all relating to the Glasgow Court Houses:—[Here followed a list of these Acts.]

"2. Since 1836 the Commissioners have from time to time acquired lands and heritages, and have built, furnished, and equipped, and now maintain and regulate, all under said various Acts of Parliament

² 6 and 7 Will. IV. cap. xxiv.; 19 and 20 Vict. cap. xxxv.; 31 and 32 Vict. cap. lxxxix.; 35 and 36 Vict. cap. vi.; 45 and 46 Vict. cap. lxxxii.; 53 and 54 Vict. cap. lviii. Also (so far as relating to Sheriff Court Houses) 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 79; 29 and 30 Vict. cap. 53; and 47 and 48 Vict. cap. 42.

relating thereto, extensive Court House Buildings known as (1) The County Buildings, Glasgow, and (2) The Justiciary Court Buildings, Glasgow.

"3. The County Buildings comprise the whole block bounded by Ingram Street on the north, Brunswick Street on the east, Wilson Street on the south, and Hutcheson Street on the west. These buildings are used for (first) the Sheriff Courts of the lower ward of the county of Lanark, and the Sheriff's Appeal Court for the whole county, and (second) the Justice of the Peace Courts for the county of the city of Glasgow and also for the county of Lanark. Accommodation is provided within the buildings also for the offices of the sheriff-clerk of the county of Lanark and his deputes, the clerk to the Justices of the Peace for the county of the city of Glasgow and for the county of Lanark, the Procurator-fiscal of the county of Lanark, and the Fiscal of the Justice of the Peace Court, and the subsidiary employees. There is also a dwelling-house consisting of four rooms and kitchen occupied by the superintendent of the buildings, who is a servant of the first parties.

"4. Further, under the terms of the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. lviii.), section 18, the Commissioners are empowered to sell or let to the County Council of the county of Lanark any portion of the lands, houses, and other property which the commissioners then possessed or which they might acquire; and under these powers they have leased the following portions of the County Buildings:—

"(1) To the County Council of the county of Lanark for their meetings and general business, three rooms at a gross rental of	£121 2 10
"(2) To the said County Council, for use as headquarters of the County Police for the Lower Ward of the said county, two rooms at a gross rental of	45 0 0
"(3) To the District Committee of the district of the Lower Ward of the county of Lanark, for the administration of their Sanitary Department, three rooms at a gross rental of	100 0 0
	£266 2 10

"The gross rentals, however, include payment for the supply of lighting, cleaning, and attendance, which are not properly rental; and the net rental of the above premises may be taken at £90, £75, and £33 respectively, or £198 in all, the figures agreed to between the Commissioners and the Treasury in settling the annual Treasury allowance for maintenance, as aftermentioned.

"5. The Court Houses Commissioners also have vested in them the Justiciary Court Buildings in Jail Square at the foot of the Saltmarket, Glasgow. These buildings are at present under reconstruction, but they have been, and will again be, used for the sittings of the Justiciary Courts in Glasgow, held for the counties of Lanark, Dumbarton, Renfrew, and Ayr, with occasional cases from other adjoining counties. The buildings will also be used for criminal cases tried before the Sheriff and a jury, and for pleading diets in Sheriff and High Court cases, and they will also be available for ordinary Sheriff Court purposes should the accommodation in the county

Nov. 21, 1912. Buildings at any time be temporarily overtaxed. A court room, with retiring room attached, is being provided as an extra Sheriff Court. Board of Trade inquiries and inquiries under special Acts, such as the Fatal Accidents Act, may also be held there in preference to the County Buildings, if found more convenient. The Justiciary Buildings also contain a dwelling-house of four rooms and kitchen for the superintendent of the buildings, who is a servant of the first parties. The first parties have not hitherto leased any portion of said Justiciary Court buildings under their powers.

"6. The duties of the Court Houses Commissioners are defined in the series of Acts of Parliament quoted, and relate solely to the proper provision of court houses within the city, and their maintenance and regulation.

"Under the Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland) Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. cap. 79), the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury pay one-half of the cost of erecting Sheriff Court Houses in Scotland, and this Act was in 1872 first made applicable to the County Buildings in Glasgow so far as the accommodation is required for the Sheriff Courts only. Prior to 1872 the Commissioners had paid the whole cost of erecting the County Buildings, providing furniture, &c., from money raised by them by assessments for the purpose, and no part of this expenditure has been repaid by the Treasury. Since 1872, however, the Treasury has paid one-half of the cost of reconstruction and adaptation for Sheriff Court purposes of the buildings facing Ingram Street, which were acquired from Glasgow Corporation under the special Act of 1890, under deduction of the proportion of said cost applicable to the portions of said buildings devoted to Justice of Peace Courts, the latter being defrayed by the Commissioners out of assessments levied by them. The Treasury has paid no part of the cost of erecting and furnishing the Justice of Peace Courts and relative offices, safes, &c., which cost has been defrayed entirely from money raised by the Commissioners.

"The Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland) Act, 1860, was also made applicable to the Justiciary Buildings under the provisions of the Glasgow Court Houses Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. lxxxii.), after inquiry by the Secretary of State as to the accommodation afforded by these buildings, and this was confirmed by the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890.

"7. By section 16 of the Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland) Act, 1860, the expenses of maintaining, managing, and keeping in repair, and of cleaning, lighting, and warming the court houses erected or improved under the Act . . . were to be paid by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury . . . This section was, however, repealed by section 6 of the Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. 42), which provided that 'from and after the passing of this Act it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to contribute towards the expense of maintaining, managing, and keeping in repair, and of cleaning, lighting, and warming any court house within the meaning of the principal Act (that is the Act of 1860) . . . such fixed annual sum as may from time to time appear to them to be sufficient for that purpose . . . If there is any excess of expenditure under the said several heads over such fixed annual sum such excess, unless specially sanctioned by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, shall be defrayed by the county . . . and the burgh or burghs situated therein . . .

"8. By section 7 of the last-mentioned Act the First Commissioner Nov. 21, 1912.
of Works was authorised to depute an officer from time to time to inspect any court house towards the cost of maintenance of which a contribution is paid from public funds, with power to the Secretary of State to call upon the persons in whom the court house is vested to execute any repairs which may be necessary. By section 8 of the same Act it is provided that if any court house is destroyed by fire the persons in whom such court house is vested are bound to re-erect and restore the same if required to do so by the Secretary of State and that the provisions of the Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland) Acts, 1860 to 1884, and the special Acts relating to the court houses, shall extend and apply to its re-erection or restoration.

"9. Under the provisions of the Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland) Acts, 1860 to 1884, the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury make the following annual payments for the maintenance of the court houses buildings:—

"(1) For the County Buildings, Sheriff's Department, in Wilson Street and Ingram Street, £2546, 10s.

"(2) For the Justiciary Buildings at present under reconstruction a provisional allowance of £370.

The latter sum covers the extra expenditure, ordinary and extraordinary of the Commissioners at the County Buildings during the reconstruction of the Justiciary Buildings, but is merely an interim payment, and is subject to readjustment when the Justiciary Buildings are completed.

"(3) For extraordinary expenditure an annual allowance is made for County Buildings of £143, 10s.

The annual allowance from the Treasury for maintenance is made in respect of the Sheriff Courts only, and not for the Justice of Peace Courts, but a deduction of £99 is made from the foresaid maintenance allowance of £2546, 10s. in respect of one half of the net rents received for those portions of the County Buildings let to the County Council of Lanarkshire for general, police, and sanitary purposes, on the ground that the Treasury, having contributed one half of the cost of the buildings, are entitled to be credited with one half of the rents received in reduction of their liability for maintenance.

"10. No annual allowance is made by the Treasury for the maintenance of the Justice of Peace Department (which occupies about one-eighth of the total accommodation), the cost of which is provided from a local assessment under the powers of sections 7, 8, and 9 of the Glasgow Municipal Buildings Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. lxxix.), and section 15 of the Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890. By this assessment, also, any deficiency arising in the first parties' annual accounts for the Sheriff's Department, after crediting the annual maintenance allowance from the Treasury, is made good from the city of Glasgow, the royal burgh of Rutherglen, and the county of Lanark in certain proportions. For the year to 31st August 1912 the deficiency of the Sheriff's department thus raised by assessment amounted to £686, 11s. 11d. or thereby.

"11. The Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury voluntarily make an annual contribution to the local assessing authorities in lieu of payment of occupiers' poor and school-rates and municipal assessments in respect of all property occupied by Government departments. The contribution so made in respect of the County proportion of said rates has, up to and including the year 1911-12, been met by a contribution by the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, who were entered in said Valuation and Assessment-rolls as aforesaid.

Nov. 21, 1912.
Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners v.

"15. Up to and including the year 1911-12 the first parties have been assessed in the owners' proportion of said rates, and have paid the same except for the year 1911-12, and as the amount was not recovered from the Treasury as maintenance, it swelled the balance of expenditure not covered by Treasury contributions, which balance is recovered by the first parties under their own powers of assessment year by year from the local bodies bound to pay the same in virtue of the Court Houses Acts. In making up the accounts for the maintenance and repair of the Court Houses for the three years, upon the average expenditure of which the present amount of the Treasury contribution is fixed, and also in 1908 and 1909 when an application which was made for an increased grant was refused, the owners' rates and assessments were entered as a proper expenditure of the Court Houses Commissioners; but in 1910 this item of expenditure was objected to by the Treasury on the ground that the buildings being public Courts for the administration of justice and for carrying on the business of the country fell within the privilege of the Crown and were not liable to assessment for local rates. This item of expenditure was therefore disallowed by the Treasury as not enforceable, and it was intimated that if paid, it could only be considered as a voluntary contribution to local rates by the first parties.

Glasgow
Parish

"16. The first parties as proprietors have hitherto paid the local assessments on owners on the assumption that they were legally liable for them; but they are now advised that the rates leviable by the Corporation of Glasgow and the Parish Council upon owners of property cannot be legally charged against them. The first parties maintain (1) that the entries in the Valuation-roll for the year 1912-13, above set forth, represent the facts correctly; (2) that the said buildings are vested in the first parties for purposes required and created by Government for the administration of the government of the country, of justice, and of police; (3) that the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury and the Justices of the counties of the city of Glasgow and Lanark occupy the parts of the said buildings of which they are entered as tenants for the said purposes or one or other of them; or, otherwise, that the occupiers of the said parts of the said buildings are the Judges, Sheriffs, and Justices who administer justice there; and (4) that the parts of the said buildings of which the County Council of the county of Lanark and the District Committee of the district of the Lower Ward of the said county are entered as tenants, are occupied by them respectively for the said purposes or one or other of them. The first parties consequently contend that they are not liable for any local rates, and in particular for the rates levied by the Parish Council of the parish of Glasgow.

"17. The second parties, on the other hand, maintain that the first parties, as proprietors of the lands and heritages in question, have no statutory or other right of exemption from rating, and are liable to be assessed in the owners' proportion of the poor and school-rates of the parish of Glasgow calculated upon the annual value thereof entered in the Valuation-roll and parish Assessment-roll, and that whatever exemption there may be of the tenants or occupiers thereof from payment of the tenants' or occupiers' proportion of said rates in respect of the nature of the occupancy, such exemption does not operate to relieve the proprietors of the proportion assessed and levied upon them; that, in any event, exemption of the first parties in respect of occupancy by them, or alternatively by the Crown for the administration of justice, can only relate to the proportion of the annual value applicable to such occupancy, and the first parties still remain liable in the owners' proportion of the rates due in respect of the rentals paid by the County Council of Lanarkshire. The second parties further contend, in regard to the unlet portions of the County Buildings and the Justiciary Court Buildings, that the first parties—and not the Crown, or the Treasury as representing the Crown, nor the Judges, Sheriffs, and Justices who administer justice there—are within the true intent and meaning of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Acts the occupiers thereof in respect of the occupation thereof for the purposes of repair and maintenance and regulation, and of supervision thereof by themselves and by their superintendents and servants resident therein, and that in respect of such occupancy the first parties are liable to be assessed in the occupiers' proportion of said rates."

The questions of law were:—"1. Are (a) the first parties, or (b) the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury as representing the Crown and the Justices of the Peace for the counties of the city of Glasgow and Lanark, or (c) the Judges, Sheriffs, and Justices who administer justice there, the occupiers within the meaning of the Lands Valuation Acts of the portions of the buildings in question appropriated to the administration of justice? 2. On the assumption that question 1 (a) is answered in the affirmative, are the first parties liable for (a) the owners' rates, and (b) the occupiers' rates assessable in respect of the said portions of the buildings in question? 3. On the assumption that question 1 (b) or 1 (c) is answered in the affirmative, are the first parties liable for the owners' rates assessable in respect of the said portions of the buildings in question? 4. Are the first parties liable for owners' rates assessable in respect of the parts of the buildings in question let respectively (a) to the County Council of the county of Lanark for their general administration, (b) to the said County Council for their police administration, and (c) to the District Committee of the district of the Lower Ward of the said county?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 20th and 21st November 1912.

Argued for the first parties;—The buildings in question, in view of the purposes for which they were occupied, must be regarded as in the constructive occupation of the Crown, and as the Crown was not mentioned in the statutes imposing the rates, they were accordingly exempt from all occupiers' assessments.¹ The same principle was applicable to owners' assessments for, even if there could not be such a thing as constructive ownership by the Crown, the first parties were at any rate holding as bare trustees for the Crown. With regard to the owners' rates demanded for those portions which were let to the County Council, the position of the first parties was admittedly not so strong; but even with regard to these the first parties were merely holding them for public purposes, and therefore the same principles should be applied.

Argued for the second parties;—The law laid down in the case of Coomber v. Justices of Berks,¹ which, when regarded in the light of earlier decisions,² was an extension of the Crown exemption on the ground of constructive occupation for the Crown, could not be applied in the present case, inasmuch as the first parties were owners of the buildings here in question, and although there might be constructive Crown occupation, there could be no constructive Crown ownership. The test was exclusive use for the service of the Crown, and that did not exist here.³ Therefore the authority of Coomber's case¹ could not be appealed to as exempting the first parties; but, even if exempt from occupiers' rates, they were clearly liable for owners' rates, especially as there was no provision for exemption in the Acts under which they held the buildings.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—The questions put to us here are as to the liability of the Court Houses Commissioners for poor-rates. They are a statutory body, created originally by a statute of 1836, but having had various additions to their powers and establishments by subsequent statutes which it is not necessary more particularly to describe. But the reason and sum of their existence may be described thus: they are a body created simply to hold certain buildings in Glasgow which are used for various public purposes—Justiciary Court, Sheriff Court, Justice of the Peace Court. The present state of the occupation of the property is quite well brought out by the entry in the current Valuation-roll of 1912-13. That shows that there is a block of buildings, part of which is put under the figure 105 in the Roll and consists of what I may call the Sheriff Court buildings. For them no rent is paid by anybody, and the entry put in the Roll as tenant and occupier is "The Commissioners of H.M. Treasury, the Justices of the Peace for the county of Lanark, and the Justices of the Peace for the county of the city of Glasgow," this part of the building being used for the purposes of the Sheriff Court and the Justice of Peace Court. Then there are three smaller parts of the same building, 106, 107, and 108, which are let by the Court Houses Commissioners in virtue of their powers under their recent Act of 1890, section 18, to the County Council of Lanark, and are occupied by the County Council and by the District Committee of the Lower Ward for general administrative, sanitary, and police purposes. Then there are also the Justiciary Court buildings in Jail Square, which are used for judicial purposes only.

Now, the substance of the questions that are put to us is whether there is a liability on the first parties in respect of these buildings (1) for occupiers', and (2) for owners' rates.

³ Surveyor of Taxes v. Smith, (1901) 4 F. 31.

⁴ M'Isaac v. Mackenzie, (1869) 7 Macph. 598.

Nov. 21, 1912. It is useless to go at any length into the origin of these questions, because the whole matter is authoritatively settled by the case of Coomber Houses Commissioners v. The Justices of Berkshire.¹ In England the rate is upon the occupier; and therefore the rate that was there in question was an occupiers' rate, and the particular results to which the decisions have come are given in that case. I can conveniently refer to a passage of Lord Watson's opinion in *Coomber*¹ at p. 72, in which he quotes a passage in Lord Blackburn's opinion in the earlier case of the *Mersey Docks*² to this effect:—"Long series of cases have established that where property is occupied for the purposes of the government of the country, including under that head the police, and the administration of justice, no one is rateable in respect of such occupation. And this applies not only to property occupied for such purposes by the servants of the great departments of State"—he states some of them and gives the authority for each—"in all which cases the occupiers might strictly be called the servants of the Crown; but also to property occupied by local police, . . . to county buildings occupied for the assizes, and for the Judges' lodgings, . . . or occupied as a County Court, . . . or for a jail. . . ." Now, in view of these high authorities, it is quite useless to go into the reasons from which that result was reached. It is enough for us to apply the result to the facts here, and the application at once answers the question as regards all occupiers' rates, because all occupation by the first parties of these buildings is for public purposes in the sense of Lord Blackburn's judgment.

But then a separate argument has been addressed to us on the question of owners' rates. Now, upon the owners' rates, generally, I think, the same case of *Coomber*¹ applies. Lord Blackburn, in the course of his opinion, where he had to deal with a Scotch case, Clerk v. Dumfries Commissioners of Supply,³ which was overruled by Coomber,¹ observes (at p. 69), "It has been pointed out that in the Scottish poor law half the poor-rate is imposed on the owner." Then he goes on to say:—"Whether the rate is exigible in respect of property, or in respect of occupation, the ground of exemption must be the same, viz., as said by the Lord Chancellor (Cairns) in Greig v. University of Edinburgh,⁴ 'The Crown not being named in the English or Scottish statutes on the subject of assessment, and not being bound by statute when not expressly named, any property which is in the occupation of the Crown or of persons using it exclusively in and for the service of the Crown is not rateable to the relief of the poor.'" In other words, the same proposition seems to be true for ownership as for occupation. I could quite understand that this would not apply if the ownership was really not the ownership of the Crown at all, but was the ownership of a private individual, because I do not think there could be constructive ownership of the Crown where a private individual merely lets out the property for occupation by the Crown. But here we have to deal, not with a private individual, but with a statutory body who really exist merely for the purpose of holding. In other words, although not the Crown itself, I think the Commissioners are what may be called an absolutely bare trustee for the Crown; and that accordingly the same class of argument that holds Nov. 21, 1912. good for occupation holds good for ownership.

Now, that solves the question of liability for owners' rates except as regards Glasgow Court House Com-three of the parcels. I think it solves that question wherever the ownership missioners v.
and occupation are both devoted to what is called, in the extended view, Glasgow Parish Crown purposes. But where the ownership is used to get rent, then, I Council. think the matter is altered. Accordingly, so far as 106, 107, and 108 are Ld. President.
concerned, I do not think the ownership is a Crown ownership for the moment, because I think that the Commissioners meantime hold these offices really as a mere investment. They have made a building which is too large for their own purposes and they let part of it, as they are allowed to do by the statutes under which they act. By so doing, I think they turn that small portion of the building into a mere investment, and, in so far as they actually take money and put it into their pocket, I do not think there is any reason for exemption for this investment.

I do not think the questions are framed in a way in which it would be desirable for us to answer them. I do not think it is part of our duty to frame an entry in the Valuation-roll, which is what the first question proposes. I should propose simply to answer the questions put to us in the case by saying that, in the circumstances put before us in the special case, we consider that there is liability for the assessments, in so far as laid upon the owner, upon 106, 107, and 108, and that as regards all other owners' assessments and the whole of the occupiers' assessments there is no liability.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:

—"Find in answer to the questions of law in the case that, in the circumstances set forth in the case, there is liability upon the first parties for owners' but not for occupiers' assessments in respect of the items of property entered in the Valuation-roll for 1912-13 under numbers 106, 107, and 108, but that there is no liability upon them for assessment either as owners or occupiers in respect of the other portions of property held by them as set forth in the case; and decern . . ."

A Special List of Household Articles to be given to Relatives & friends at My death—
 [Here followed a list of such articles.]

M. A. MILNE.”

The parties to the case were Peter Milne, executor-dative of the testatrix, first party; Percival Waugh and others, trustees of Bristo Place Baptist Church, Edinburgh, second parties; the Reverend John Fraser and others, the Kirk-Session of the West United Free Church, Brechin, third parties; and Peter Milne, as sole next of kin of the testatrix, fourth party.

The case stated:—

“1. Miss Mary Ann Milne, Isla Bank Cottage, Park Road, Brechin (hereinafter called the testatrix), died domiciled there on 3rd May 1911, aged seventy-five years. For the last twenty years of her life the testatrix resided alone except during the three months immediately prior to her death, during which time she was attended by a domestic servant. The testatrix was from time to time visited by friends and relatives. Her sole next of kin is her only surviving brother, Peter Milne, who, as her executor, is the first party hereto, and as an individual is the fourth party hereto.

“2. The testatrix left the testamentary writings which are printed in the appendix hereto, and held as forming part of this case. After the death of the testatrix the said writings were found by the first party on the day of the death of the testatrix in a closed envelope which was contained in a locked desk found in a drawer of a chest of drawers in one of the rooms of her house. The key of the desk was found in another drawer of the same chest. The envelope was gummed up and addressed in the handwriting of the testatrix as fol-

Nov. 21, 1912. Milne's Executor v. Waugh. lows:—‘To Mr Peter Milne, Annerley House, South Esk Street, Brechin.’ The envelope was opened by the first party and found to contain the said writings. The originals of the said writings, and the envelope in which they were found, will be made available to the Court at the hearing of the case. The flap of the envelope has been lost. The said writings are holograph of the testatrix.

“4. The said holograph testamentary writings, when found by the first party, were in their present condition and contained the scorings or deletions which they bear. Apart from any inference which the Court may draw, there is no evidence to show when or by whom these scorings or deletions were made.

“5. The testatrix was connected with the congregation now known as the West United Free Church, Brechin, during the whole of her life, and she was a member of that church up to the date of her death. Her ordinary residence was in Brechin, and while there she regularly attended the services of the said church. For a considerable number of years the testatrix worked as a Biblewoman amongst the poor of Brechin. Her salary as Biblewoman was furnished either by the said church or by Miss Foote, the daughter of one of the ministers of that church. In 1885 a brother of the testatrix, who was in the employment of the Indian Government, died leaving a considerable estate, which was divided equally between the testatrix and the fourth party, and after succeeding to that money the testatrix gave up her position as Biblewoman and lived on her own means. About eighteen years ago, in consequence of views which she came to hold upon the doctrine of baptism, she joined the Bristo Place Baptist Church in Edinburgh, there being no Baptist Church in Brechin. She continued a member of that church also till her death, and was in the habit of going to Edinburgh twice a year, staying there over two weeks, and while there attending Communion and other services in connection with the church.

“6. The estate left by the testatrix, besides a dwelling-house in Macgregor Street, Brechin, consisted of moveables, as given up in the inventory, at £2457, 9s. 8d. After paying the various personal and specific legacies bequeathed by the testatrix, there will be a sum of over £1000 falling to be dealt with as residue.

“7. Questions have arisen as to the rights of the second, third, and fourth parties under the said testamentary writings.

“The second parties contend that the bequest by the testatrix of £50 to the Building Fund of the Bristo Place Baptist Congregation, Edinburgh, and of one-half of the residue of her estate to the said congregation for missions at home and abroad are valid and effectual and ought to receive effect, notwithstanding the scorings or deletions of the passages containing these bequests, inasmuch as the said scorings or deletions are not authenticated in any way.

“The third parties contend that in the foregoing circumstances, and in the absence of any evidence that the scorings or deletions were made by anyone other than the testatrix, these must be presumed to have been made by the testatrix herself and must be given effect to.

“The fourth party contends that effect must be given to the deletions in the testamentary writings of the testatrix in respect that these deletions must be presumed to have been made by the testatrix herself.”

The first question of law was:—“(1) In the circumstances set forth in this special case, ought the scorings or deletions in the testamentary writings of the testatrix to receive effect as cancelling the bequests so scored or deleted?" Nov. 21, 1912.

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 21st November 1912. Milne's Executor v.
Waugh.

Argued for the third and fourth parties;—The admitted facts with regard to the condition in which the testatrix's testamentary writings were found were sufficient to lead to the inference that the deletions were made by the testatrix herself with the intention of revoking these particular bequests.¹

Argued for the second parties;—In the absence of proof (1) that the testatrix made the deletions or ordered them to be made, (2) that they were final and not deliberative, the words deleted were to be treated as forming part of a subsisting will.² The circumstances of the present case supplied no such proof as was required in order to make the deletions effectual, such as might be found in the case of holograph interlineations or notes. If effect were given to the deletions half of the residue would fall into intestacy, and that pointed to the conclusion that they were to be regarded as deliberative, particularly in view of the nature of the markings themselves,³ and of the presumption being, in the absence of explanation to the contrary, in favour of a completed settlement.⁴ The case of *Lamont v. Magistrates of Glasgow*⁵ was distinguishable, because in that case a separate writing was found which explained the deletion; and the case of *Nasmyth v. Hare*⁶ was distinguishable, because removal of the seal in that case was only consistent with cancellation of the deed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question in this case is whether the deletions which are found in the testamentary writings of the late Miss Milne are to have effect. I think it is quite clear that they must, when they are taken in connection with the facts and circumstances which are put before us in the special case. Here is an old lady, of probably not very great education, who lives alone and leaves behind her a set of testamentary writings, carefully addressed to a relation, in a closed envelope. All this is found with no suggestion of opening or tampering by anybody. And inside the closed envelope is found this set of holograph testamentary writings. It makes various bequests. There is more than one sheet, and there are additions made at various times, and there are, as it stands, deletions. These deletions are, so to speak, quite appropriate to the additions that are afterwards made. For instance, first of all, there originally stood a bequest of £50 to a building fund of a proposed new church. Well, that is taken

Nov. 21, 1912. out, and one may guess that Miss Milne had either changed her mind, or Milne's that by the time of the deletion that particular purpose had been made Executor v. good by other funds from other people. One deletion I particularly refer Waugh. to. In the document of 1909 she leaves to the session of the West Church, Ld. President. Brechin, £100, and then that is deleted, and in August 1910 she bequeathes to the West Church, Brechin, a certain property in Macgregor Street. It would be quite natural that, when she came to leave this property in Macgregor Street to the West Church, she should cancel the legacy of £100 to the church.

I mention these things only to show that the deletions, so far from making the will unintelligible, are just such deletions as you might expect to find. But I put my judgment upon what was laid down in the House of Lords (*Nasmyth v. Hare*¹), that if, in circumstances like these, you find apparently undisturbed the holograph testamentary writing of a person which bears certain alterations there is then a presumption of fact that these alterations were made by the testator or testatrix. If that is so, that seems to me to end the question, because, if these deletions were made by the testatrix herself, I cannot imagine that they could have been made for any purpose except to alter the will to the extent of the deletions. Mr Brown argued that there must be a second stage, and that you must show, not only that the deletion had been made by the testatrix, but that it had been made with the intention of being final, and was not merely deliberative. I cannot think there is any such second stage. I quite agree that you must be satisfied that it is a proper deletion. It is not every ink mark upon a writing that necessarily infers a deletion, but in this case there is no doubt about that. We have had the advantage of seeing the original, and there is no question that these are proper deletions. The consequence is that, if I once come to the result, as I do here, that they were made by the testatrix herself, I also come to the conclusion that she made them for the purpose of altering her will.—[His Lordship then dealt with another point with which this report is not concerned.]

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. I think that, in the circumstances stated here, we are quite justified in drawing the inference and coming to the conclusion which your Lordship proposes.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative.

MRS A. SUTHERLAND OR BRYDEN AND OTHERS, Petitioners (Appellants).—D. Anderson.

No. 28.

JOHN H. CORMACK, Respondent.—Riach.

Nov. 22, 1912.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Subject of gift—Words importing gift of heritage—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 33 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 20. Bryden v. Cormack.

A testatrix, by her holograph testamentary disposition, on the narrative that she had "resolved to provide for the settlement of my affairs," appointed a "trustee and executor"; and after making bequests which were all of moveable property, declared "that if there be any residue after all expenses and legacies are paid, I bequeath the said residue to" three nieces, reserving her "life use of the whole estate and effects hereby conveyed."

Held that the testatrix's heritable property was not carried by this deed, but passed to her heir-at-law.

THIS was a petition presented in the Sheriff Court at Wick by Mrs A. Sutherland or Bryden, Miss Jessie A. Sutherland, and Miss Elizabeth A. Sutherland, the residuary legatees under the testamentary disposition of Mrs Catherine Adamson or Cormack, for authority to make up title to Mrs Cormack's heritable estate in terms of section 10 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Caithness,
Orkney, and Shetland.

The petition set forth that Mrs Cormack's brother, William Adamson died in 1908, being then infest in certain heritable property in the parish of Wick. By his trust-disposition and settlement he conveyed to Mrs Cormack the liferent of these subjects, but did not dispose of the fee thereof; and accordingly one-half pro indiviso share thereof fell to Mrs Cormack as heir-portioner, the other half passing to the son of another sister of Mr Adamson who predeceased him.

Mrs Cormack died on 22nd June 1910, without having feudalised her title to her half share of the subjects, and leaving a holograph testamentary deed, dated 17th July 1909. This deed was in the following terms:—"I, Catherine Adamson or Cormack (Widow), Newton Swiney, Lybster, parish of Latheron, Caithness, having resolved to provide for the settlement of my affairs in the event of my death, and to prevent all disputes regarding same: Do hereby legate and bequeath—[Here followed a number of pecuniary legacies]. I also leave and bequeath all valuations and compensations payable by landlord, or due to me for outlays on dwelling-house, croft, &c., occupied by me at Newton Swiney, with farm stock, implements, furniture, napery, and personal effects and clothing, with all farm produce to my three nieces (my late sister's daughters) Amelia, Jessie, and Elizabeth, each of them to share and share alike. They, before sharing same, to give my nephews, Alexander and Donald Sutherlands, anything out of the dwelling-house they would like to have. If any of my nieces have trouble in nursing me at my death, they must be paid first along with all just debts and funeral expenses.—[Here followed pecuniary legacies to two institutions.] I hereby nominate and appoint my nephew, Alexander Sutherland, Draper, Lybster (failing whom from any cause, Donald Sutherland, Merchant, Latheronwheel) to be my sole trustee and executor, to do all that is competent for an executor to do by the laws of Scotland. Further declaring, that in the event of any dispute arising about the succession to these bequests, said trustee and executor shall interpret my

Nov. 22, 1912. wishes, determine the matter in dispute, and his decision shall be final. I further declare that if there be any residue after all expenses and legacies are paid, I bequeath the said residue to my three nieces, Amelia, Jessie, and Elizabeth. I reserve my own life use of the whole estate and effects hereby conveyed, and power at any time to alter or revoke the presents in whole or in part as I think proper. In witness whereof, I subscribe these presents written on these pages by mine own hand at Newton Swiney, Lybster, on the seventeenth day of July, nineteen hundred and nine years.

Bryden v.
Cormack.

"CATHERINE ADAMSON OR CORMACK."

On 9th February 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Trotter) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds . . . that the trust-disposition and settlement of Mrs Catherine Adamson or Cormack . . . imports a conveyance of the whole means and estate of the said Mrs Catherine Adamson or Cormack, including the subjects set forth and described in the petition, to Alexander Sutherland as trustee under and appointed by said trust-disposition and settlement: Therefore, and also in respect the petitioners do not found on and produce a disposition or conveyance by the said Alexander Sutherland, as trustee foresaid, in their favour, of the subjects described in the petition, refuses the prayer of the petition, and dismisses the petition, and decerns."

The petitioners appealed to the Court of Session. On 15th June 1912 the case was heard before the Second Division and was continued in order that the petition might be served on Mrs Cormack's heir-at-law. Thereafter her heir-at-law, John H. Cormack, lodged answers, objecting to the prayer of the petition being granted in respect that Mrs Cormack's settlement was not habile to convey heritage.

The case was again heard before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 22nd November 1912.

Argued for the petitioners;—The subjects in question were carried by Mrs Cormack's settlement, because that settlement showed that she intended to dispose of her whole estate. This appeared from (1) the preamble setting forth her desire to settle her "affairs"; (2) the appointment of a "trustee" and executor; (3) the residuary bequest; and (4) the reservation of her life use of "the whole estate and effects hereby conveyed." As the authorities,¹ and particularly the more recent decisions, stood, a will conceived in such terms was habile to convey heritage.

Argued for the respondent;—In order that a will should be habile to carry heritage it was necessary that there should be either (1) a bequest of the testator's whole estate in general terms; or (2) words directly referring to heritage.² Neither of these features was present in Mrs Cormack's deed. The word "affairs" was primarily referable to moveable property; the expression "residue" was not appropriate to heritage unless there was also a direction to sell or realise¹; the word "effects" included only moveable property,² while "estate" was at best a flexible term³; and the scope of the phrase "estate and effects" was restricted by the reference to the earlier portion of the will contained in the words "hereby conveyed." Nor did the use of the word "trustee" in conjunction with the word "executor" indicate that the estate to be administered included heritage. None of the decisions were adverse to the respondent's contention. In M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod,⁴ and M'Leod's Trustee v. M'Luckie,⁵ and also in the three cases reported in 1908 S. C., cited for the petitioners, there was a direction to "realise" the estate; in *Wallace*⁶ there was a bequest of certain heritage; and the decision in *Forsyth*⁷ was doubted in M'Laren on Wills and Succession.⁸

Nov. 22, 1912.
Bryden v.
Cormack.

LORD DUNDAS.—The first question, and, indeed, in the view which I take of this case, the only question which we have to decide is whether the testamentary disposition of the late Mrs Cormack carried the heritable subjects which were vested in her at her death, or whether there was intestacy with regard to them. The disposition bears to be holograph of the testatrix, but its language suggests to one that it probably was not her own unassisted handiwork. We must consider whether the instrument is habile to convey heritage, whether Mrs Cormack's intention, as it may be gathered from the language used, was to do so, or not. Our answer must, in my opinion, be in the negative; and I shall state, as briefly as I can, my reasons for this conclusion.

I turn at once to the disposition, and shall notice the clauses which seem to make for one or other of the two views. The preamble relates a resolution "to provide for the settlement of my affairs in the event of my death, and to prevent all disputes regarding same." Mr Anderson seized on these words as importing a universal settlement of the whole estate, of whatever kind. I think that this is asking too much of the words, which are, after all, common words of style. They must, of course, be construed; but I do not think they necessarily imply a disposition of estate of every kind. To see whether or not they were intended to do so, we must read them in connection with the other clauses of the deed which follow. The testatrix goes on to leave a number of money legacies to various persons, then she bequeathes all valuations and compensations due to her in respect of the croft she occupied, and stock and personal effects, and then come more legacies of money. All her bequests are of a pecuniary nature, and of no other. Then she appoints her nephew "to be my sole trustee and executor, to do all that is competent for an executor to do by the laws of Scotland." In many of the cases on this branch of the law, the use of the word "trustee" or "executor" figures in the discussion. The word "executor" points, prima facie, to a disposition of moveables, and the mere collocation of the word "trustee" has

Nov. 22, 1912. been held not to produce a different result. On the other hand, I do not suppose that the mere fact that an "executor" is nominated would be in itself conclusive. One need only say that the clause here seems rather to favour the view that this disposition is intended to convey moveables only. The testatrix goes on to declare that "if there be any residue after all expenses and legacies are paid, I bequeath the said residue to my three nieces." Mr Anderson founded on the word "residue," but I think "residue" is a flexible term, colourless in itself. It is really identical with "remainder"—what is left over—and may relate to moveable or heritable estate, according to the context and the facts of any particular case. The concluding portion of the instrument contains a reservation of the liferent use of "the whole estate and effects hereby conveyed." Now, as to the words "estate and effects," I take it that "effects" is a word importing moveables, while the word "estate" is more flexible, and may include heritage. But then the estate and effects are expressly designed as the "estate and effects hereby conveyed," and that necessarily takes one back to find, from the language of the settlement as a whole, what it was that was truly intended to be conveyed. These are all the clauses which need to be noted, and the points which Mr Anderson founded on were just the four already indicated, viz. :—(1) the terms of the preamble; (2) the nomination of a "trustee and executor"; (3) the gift of residue; and (4) the words "estate and effects" in the reservation of liferent. On the other hand, I can find no words of general gift importing a conveyance of the whole estate of every kind, and no language sufficiently indicating an intention to deal with heritage.

I think it would be idle to review the authorities, which are very numerous. Every time they are cited, as they were to-day, it strikes one how fertile they are in judicial doubts, dissents, and reversals. This is not surprising, for it just shows how largely all these cases depend on impression. They are, at best, illustrations of the application of general rules which are well understood, and are explained in many of the cases. But each individual case has its own special features, which were sufficient to bring down the balance on one side or the other. In the case now before us, a consideration of the clauses of the particular deed in question leads me to the conclusion that it is not habile to carry heritable estate.

Mr Anderson admitted that if the Court held this view there was no other question to be decided. I think, therefore, that we ought to recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor; find that the heritable subjects in question were not carried by Mrs Cormack's disposition; and of new refuse the prayer of the petition, and dismiss it.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. We have had an able argument in this case, and my opinion has varied in the course of the discussion. The deed might have contained by a slight alteration words which would have made the testator's meaning clear one way or the other. As an illustration I refer to the words "whole estate and effects" used in the clause of reservation of liferent, which, if they had occurred in a clause of conveyance, would have carried the heritage. The trouble is that that clause, by the addition of the words "hereby conveyed," merely throws you back to the clause of residue, which says,—“I further declare that if there be any residue after all expenses and legacies are paid, I bequeath the said residue to my three nieces.” That seems rather to indicate that what was in the testator’s mind was moveable estate. Then there are the introductory words, but these are equivocal. We are thus thrown on the other parts of the deed itself, and it is not possible to find in them any words of general gift which in one form or other are to be found in all the cases to which we were referred. It is true that the tendency in recent decisions has been to endeavour, if the words of the deed make it possible, to hold that the testator intended to deal with his whole estate. It may be that the lady here had that intention, but I am not able to find words under which we can hold that she has carried it out.

Bryden v.
Cormack.

Lord Guthrie.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Dundas. The features of the deed on which Mr Anderson relied were the testatrix’s declaration that she was resolved to provide for the settlement of her “affairs”; the bequest of “residue”; and the reservation of her liferent of the “whole estate and effects hereby conveyed.” But none of these features unequivocally indicate that the testatrix intended that the will should carry her heritage, and, looking to the whole will and to the position of these expressions as used in it, I am satisfied that it does not have that effect.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find that the trust-disposition and settlement of Mrs Cormack . . . is not habile to convey the heritage which belonged to the said truster, Mrs Cormack: Therefore of new refuse the petition.”

Reparation—Negligence—Safety of the public—Unfenced sandpit on private ground—Use of pit by children as playground—Hidden danger.

Mackenzie v.
Fairfield Ship-
building and Engineering
Co., Limited.

In an action by a father for solatium for the death of his daughter, aged seven, the pursuer averred that the defenders were the owners of ground abutting on a public path and separated therefrom by a hedge in which there were gaps; that on the ground there was an unfenced sandpit 80 yards from the path; that children were in the habit of entering the ground and using the pit as a playground; that the defenders knew of this practice and “allowed” it; that the pursuer’s child was killed by a fall of sand while playing in the pit; and that the defenders knew, before the accident happened, that the face of the sand was at a dangerous angle and liable to fall, but took no steps to have the danger removed or to exclude the children.

Held that the pursuer’s averments were relevant, and issue allowed.

Devlin v. Jeffray’s Trustees, (1902) 5 F. 130, and Cummings v. Darnagavil Coal Co., Limited, (1903) 5 F. 513, distinguished, on the ground that the dangerous state of the sandpit was not a danger that was manifest to a child of that age.

Nov. 26, 1912. ON 4th March 1912 John Mackenzie, blacksmith, Govan, brought an action against The Fairfield Shipbuilding and Engineering Company, Limited, Govan, concluding for £300 as solatium in respect of the death of his daughter.

Mackenzie v.
Fairfield Ship-
building and

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Ormisdale.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 2) "The defenders are owners and occupiers of a piece of ground situated immediately to the west of their shipbuilding yard on the south side of the River Clyde. The said piece of ground is bounded on the north by a hedge which separates it from a public path along the south bank of the Clyde. The said hedge was, on 1st August 1911, and had been to the knowledge of the defenders for a considerable time prior thereto, in a defective condition, in respect that there were a number of gaps in it, some of these being 5 or 6 feet wide. The public were in the habit of going to the said piece of ground through the said gaps, and children were in the habit of playing constantly on said ground on which the sandpit after mentioned was situated, and that with the knowledge of the defenders. . . ." (Cond. 3) "In the centre of the said piece of ground, about 80 yards from the said path, there is an unfenced sandpit belonging to the defenders from which they are in the habit of taking sand for use in their yard, leaving a large hole 15 feet deep. The sandpit was a dangerous place, as the defenders were well aware. It is believed and averred that to their knowledge several accidents had occurred previous to the accident to the pursuer's daughter, as hereinafter described. In particular, in the autumn of 1909, a man named Robert Dunlop, care of M'Menemy, 31 Hamilton Street, Govan, was injured by a fall of sand which had been left by defenders' servants in a dangerous position. This the defenders were well aware of. Nevertheless the defenders and their servants have for a considerable time past allowed children to enter the said ground and use the sandpit as a playground, and that when it was a source of great danger to those frequenting the place. . . ." (Cond. 4.) "On 1st August 1911 the pursuer's daughter, Maggie Paterson Mackenzie, aged seven years, along with other children, went to the said ground from the public path, and proceeded to the sandpit. Whilst they were playing there the wall of the sandpit fell upon them and killed the pursuer's said child. The face of the sand was at the time 15 feet high, and at the place where the accident happened the top overhung the face about 5 feet, thus being most dangerous to anyone approaching it. . . ." (Cond. 5) "The said accident was due to the fault of the defenders in respect that they and their servants, being aware that the said pit was dangerous to the public, and particularly to children, knowingly allowed children to use the said pit as a playground, while it was in a highly dangerous condition as aforesaid, without seeing that the sand was left at such an angle as to be safe for the public and children who frequented the place. In such sandpits it is usual, and indeed necessary even for those employed at them, to have the top of the face taken down and the face at a safe slope. This the defenders culpably failed to do, with the foresaid result. The said place immediately adjoined a public path, and was as aforesaid a common resort of children for the purpose of recreation. Further, the defenders culpably failed to have the said sandpit properly fenced or guarded. In the circumstances known to them it was the duty of the defenders to take reasonable precautions to exclude children from the said pit. This they failed to do, and on the contrary for a long period had allowed the foresaid hedge at the public path to be in such a dilapidated condition as practically to be an invitation to the youth of the district (which is a populous one) to use the said ground as they constantly did. The death of the pursuer's child was the natural and probable result of their failure to take such precautions."

Nov. 26, 1912.
Mackenzie v.
Fairfield Ship-
building and Engineering
Co., Limited.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the averments of the pursuer were irrelevant.

On 17th July 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) allowed an issue.*

* "OPINION.—I sustain the relevancy of this action, and I arrive at that result chiefly because of the case of Cooke, recently decided in the House of Lords ([1909] A. C. 229).

"As I read this record there is a distinct averment that the sandpit was a place of resort for children, that they constantly went there and used the sandpit as a playground, and that they did so with the full knowledge of the defenders. I do not go much upon the gap in the hedge being an invitation to the children to pass on to the ground in question, because I think the children would have gone there whether there had been a gap in the hedge or not. It is of importance that the ground in which the sandpit is situated abuts upon the public footpath, which entitled the children at any rate to be in the neighbourhood.

"The only difficulty I have had in the matter is whether I am entitled to consider, looking at the case from any point of view, that the sandpit was a feature that was attractive or alluring. If it is, and the pursuer says that it is, then I think the case is exactly covered by the case of Cooke. Without some inquiry I cannot very well say that it was, or was not. So far as the child was concerned, I can very well understand that it was a dangerous attraction. It was a dangerous attraction, and I do not think the danger of it could be realised by children.

"Now, according to the House of Lords, the liability of the defenders in the matter of taking precautions may vary according to the qualities of the person injured. He may be an adult or a child, an insane or a blind person. Here the averment of the pursuer is that no precautions were taken by the defenders to safeguard children from the danger to which they were exposed when they played about the sandpit. Mr Crawford maintained that the position was different here because the ground was not a waste piece of ground on which there was an old disused quarry or anything of that sort, but that the sandpit was in the actual industrial occupation of the defenders. That is certainly a distinction, but I do not think there is any real difference in principle. I am entitled to infer that apparently the sandpit was not in constant use, and that at the time we are dealing with there were no workpeople about. The defenders may have taken some precautions by warning the children off or in some other way, but the averment of the pursuer is that they took none.

"These being the circumstances as stated by the pursuer, I think the case of Cooke covers this case, especially as in the case of Cooke the House of Lords appears to have made no distinction between mere licensees and persons who have been actually invited on to the ground. As I read the decisions in this Court, the decision in Cooke is not entirely in accord with the decisions upon which Mr Crawford very rightly founded. In the cases of Devlin (5 F. 130) and Cummings (5 F. 513) what was considered a vital distinction was taken by the Judges between a person who is there merely with the permission of the defenders or the owners of the ground and a person who is actually invited on to the ground by the defenders.

"With regard to the point advanced by Mr Crawford that the case is more suited for proof than for jury trial, the case belongs to a class which is generally remitted to jury trial on an issue, and I do not think, although

Nov. 26, 1912. The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Guthrie) on 26th November 1912.

Mackenzie v. Fairfield Ship-building and Engineering Co., Limited. Argued for the reclaimers;—The facts averred disclosed no duty on the defenders to ensure the safety of the child. Responsibility could arise in respect of ownership of a dangerous piece of property, only if (a) it was contiguous to a public place, or (b) was dedicated to public use. In the present case the point of danger was 80 yards from the road. Further, dedication was negatived because the sand-pit was admittedly in the industrial occupation of the defenders. This distinguished the case from that of Cooke,¹ where the ground was practically derelict, and was not used by anyone except the public. The pursuer's child did not come by invitation; she was at most a mere licensee, and, accordingly, took all the risks incidental to the use of the property.² The proximate cause of the accident was the fault of the pursuer in allowing his child to go to a dangerous place. In any view, the case raised difficult questions of law, and should be tried before a Judge, as was done in the case of Holland.³

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think that we should interfere with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. As regards the mode of proof, I think he was quite right to allow an issue. It may be, and often is, said that certain cases would be better tried before a Judge than before a jury, but this case is just one of the class which are generally remitted to a jury, and therefore my view is that we should not interfere in that matter.

As to the relevancy, I have no doubt that the case is relevant. It is averred that the defenders, knowing that their sandpit was a dangerous place, allowed children to enter their ground and use the sandpit as a playground. It is also averred that the place immediately adjoined a public path in the fence of which there was a gap, and that it was a common resort of children for the purpose of recreation. What force is to be given to the averments as to the dilapidated condition of the fence will depend entirely on the evidence. But the real ground of liability as alleged is the fact that the defenders allowed the children to make use of the pit.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am of the same opinion. I think the crucial distinction between this case and the cases of *Devlin*⁴ and *Cummings*⁵ is that the danger here was not manifest to a child of tender years. Every child which is able to go out by itself is supposed to know that a pond or a hole is dangerous, but not that a bank of sand may give way because it is at a greater angle than the angle of repose. As the case is to go to a jury, and in one view of the case there may be delicate questions of law involved, there will be any difficulty in keeping the law of the matter quite clearly before the jury, and directing them accordingly. No exception has been taken to the form of the issue which is proposed, and I shall approve of it as the issue in the cause."

the facts may turn out to be otherwise than the pursuer avers, I refrain from commenting upon these averments except to say that I agree with your Lordship in the chair that they disclose a relevant case.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 2 (1)— Delay in giving notice and making claim—"Mistake or other reasonable cause."

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the arbitrator found that the claimant alleged that he was injured by an accident on 1st June 1911; that thereafter he suffered from pain in his neck and shoulders, which he attributed to the accident; that on 5th August he consulted a doctor, who diagnosed his trouble as, and treated him for, muscular rheumatism; that on 11th November the claimant left his employment and thereafter was treated for severe strain of the neck; that on 13th December he consulted another doctor, who told him that he was suffering from partial dislocation of the head from the spine, and advised him that his case was dangerous and required treatment in a hospital; that in January 1912 (i.e., after he had left his employment and more than six months after the accident) he for the first time gave notice of the accident to his employers and claimed compensation from them.

Held that, as the delay in giving notice and claiming compensation was due to the workman's ignorance of the serious nature of his injury, it was occasioned by "mistake or other reasonable cause," within the meaning of sec. 2 (1) of the Act, and so was not a bar to the maintenance of proceedings for compensation.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58)—Arbitration—Procedure—Preliminary defences—Duty of arbitrator to dispose of whole case.

Where an arbitrator had allowed a separate proof on preliminary defences and had issued findings thereon without having heard the case as a whole, opinions that, there being no exceptional circumstances calling for the procedure followed, the arbitrator ought to have heard and disposed of the case as a whole.

Observations per Lord Kinnear in Rankine v. Alloa Coal Co., Limited, (1903) 5 F. 1164, at p. 1169, approved.

THIS was a note presented by William Ellis, shipwright, Govan, for an order on the Sheriff-substitute (Lyll) at Glasgow to state a case in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, between the pursuer and the Fairfield Shipbuilding and Engineering Company, Limited, Fairfield Works, Govan. In the arbitration the pursuer claimed compensation in respect of injuries alleged to have been received on 1st June 1911 while at work in the defenders' employment.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Notice of the accident to the pursuer not having been given to defenders as soon as practicable

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

Nov. 27, 1912. after the happening of said accident, and the defenders being prejudiced by want of such notice, the pursuer is barred from insisting in the present proceedings. (2) The pursuer having failed to claim timeously from the defenders is barred from insisting in the present proceedings.*

Ellis v.
Fairfield Ship-
building and
Engineering
Co., Limited.

The Sheriff-substitute, having allowed the defenders a proof as to the alleged want of notice and claim, found "that the failure to make a claim within the statutory period was not occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause," and dismissed the application.

The pursuer requested the Sheriff-substitute to state a case for appeal. The Sheriff-substitute refused, and the pursuer presented this note for an order on the Sheriff-substitute to state a case.

Appended to the certificate of refusal to state a case was a statement by the Sheriff-substitute in the form of a proposed stated case, which, for the purposes of argument, was adopted by parties at the bar.

The proposed case stated:—

"Having considered the cause together with the proof led, and heard parties' procurators, I found the following facts to be established:—(1) That it was alleged that the accident in question occurred on 1st June 1911. (2) That the appellant remained in the employment of the respondents until 11th November 1911, when he left and did not return. (3) That no notice of the alleged accident was given and no claim for compensation made until 30th January 1912. (4) That it was practicable for the appellant to have given notice of the accident immediately after the happening thereof and before he left the employment.

"In these circumstances I found in law that these proceedings were not maintainable unless it should be proved (a) that the respondents were not prejudiced by the want of timeous notice, and (b) that the appellant's failure to make a claim within six months was occasioned by mistake, absence from the United Kingdom, or other reasonable cause; and in this connection I found further in fact:—(5) That it was not proved that the respondents were not prejudiced by the appellant's failure to give timeous notice; but, on the con-

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), enacts, sec. 2:—"(1) Proceedings for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured, and unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, or, in case of death, within six months from the time of death:

"Provided always that—

"(a) the want of or any defect or inaccuracy in such notice shall not be a bar to the maintenance of such proceedings if it is found in the proceedings for settling the claim that the employer is not, or would not, if a notice or an amended notice were then given and the hearing postponed, be prejudiced in his defence by the want, defect, or inaccuracy, or that such want, defect, or inaccuracy was occasioned by mistake, absence from the United Kingdom, or other reasonable cause; and

"(b) the failure to make a claim within the period above specified shall not be a bar to the maintenance of such proceedings if it is found that the failure was occasioned by mistake, absence from the United Kingdom, or other reasonable cause."

trary, that they were so prejudiced by being deprived of the opportunity, of which they would have availed themselves, of having the appellant medically examined. (6) That from the date of the alleged accident up to 5th August 1911 the appellant suffered pain in his neck and shoulder, which he himself attributed to the result of the accident. (7) That on 5th August 1911 he consulted a doctor at the Western Infirmary, who diagnosed his disease as, and treated him for, muscular rheumatism of the right shoulder. (8) That up to 11th November 1911 the appellant remained in his employment, being off work for certain short periods during that time, but on the said 11th November 1911 he finally left his employment and did not thereafter return to work (it is alleged that on that day he was attacked by severe pains in the neck, but this was not proved, the appellant himself not being examined as a witness). (9) That the appellant was thereafter treated by a doctor for a severe strain of the neck up to 13th December 1911. (10) That on 13th December 1911 the appellant consulted another doctor, who found, and informed the appellant, that his head was partially dislocated from the spine, and recommended his removal to the infirmary for treatment, the said doctor's opinion being that the appellant was then in a dangerous condition. (11) That, at the request of the appellant, respondents obtained for him free removal in an ambulance of the St Andrew's Ambulance Association to the infirmary on 20th December 1911. (12) That the respondents are in the habit of obtaining this privilege for their workmen in all cases where removal to the infirmary is ordered whether on account of accident or disease. (13) That some time in January 1912 the appellant's wife intimated, for the first time, to an official of the respondents' Company that the appellant claimed compensation, in respect that his then condition was attributable to the alleged accident on 1st June 1911. (14) That a claim, signed by the appellant, was made on 30th January 1912 for compensation for injury by accident not on 1st June 1911, but 'on the middle of June.'

"I found further in fact that, although the appellant may have been under a mistake as to his symptoms and condition between 5th August 1911 and 13th December 1911, he was under no mistake, but himself attributed his condition to the result of the alleged accident from the date thereof until 5th August 1911 and from 13th December 1911 to 30th January 1912.

"I therefore found in fact and law that the failure to make a claim within the statutory period was not occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause, dismissed the application, and found the respondents entitled to expenses."

The proposed questions of law for the opinion of the Court were :—(1) Was the arbitrator right in holding that these proceedings were not maintainable unless it should be proved (a) that the appellant's failure to give notice as soon as practicable and before leaving his employment was not to the prejudice of the respondents; and (b) that his failure to make a claim within six months of the accident was due to mistake or other reasonable cause? and, if so, (2) Was it competent for the arbitrator to hold on the facts proved (a) that the appellant's failure to give timeous notice was to the prejudice of the respondents; and (b) that the appellant's failure to make a timeous claim was not due to mistake or other reasonable cause?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 27th November 1912.

Nov. 27, 1912.

Ellis v.
Fairfield Ship-
building and
Engineering
Co., Limited.

Argued for the pursuer;—Section 2 (1) (a) provided that failure to give notice was excusable if caused by mistake; and such mistake was an excuse even though prejudice had been suffered by the defenders. This part of the proviso had been disregarded by the Sheriff-substitute in framing the first question, and apparently also in disposing of the case. Failure to give timeous notice here was clearly due to mistake, and to a mistake that was obviously a reasonable cause.¹ The present case was a fortiori of Rankine v. Alloa Coal Company.² Egerton v. Moore,³ founded on by the defenders, was distinguishable from the present case, in that the claimant in *Egerton*⁴ was not ignorant of his true condition.

Argued for the defenders;—By section 2 of the Act notice of the accident was to be given before the workman voluntarily left his employment and notice of claim was to be given within six months of the date of the accident. Neither of the conditions had been fulfilled in this case. This case was ruled by Egerton v. Moore,⁵ and the cases relied on by the pursuer were distinguishable, because in them it was not possible, as it was possible in this case, that notice could have been given timeously. There was sufficient evidence before the arbitrator to entitle him to find as he did.⁶

LORD PRESIDENT.—William Ellis, a shipwright and an inmate of the Victoria Infirmary in Glasgow, sought to recover compensation from the Fairfield Shipbuilding and Engineering Company, Limited, Govan, in respect of an accident which he alleged happened to him, when he was in their employment, on 1st June 1911. The respondents in their answers to the application pled that notice of the accident had not been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof, and also that a claim had not been made within six months of its occurrence. Seeing that plea, the learned Sheriff-substitute, as arbitrator, allowed the respondents a proof as to the alleged want of notice and claim, and to the applicant a conjunct probation, and did not allow a proof at this stage as to the general facts of the case. In so doing I think that the learned arbitrator adopted an inconvenient procedure—I do not say an incompetent, but an inconvenient procedure—a procedure which has more than once been said in this Court not to be, except in very exceptional circumstances, the proper procedure, with the result (as will be presently apparent) that the case has got into a more or less unfortunate position. On this point I may remind your Lordships of the remarks that were made by Lord Kinnear, with the approbation of the other Judges of this Division, in Rankine v. Alloa Coal Company, Limited.⁷

The learned arbitrator decided that proper notice had not been given, and that a claim had not been timeously made, and therefore dismissed the application. The workman, wishing to bring that judgment under review, asked the arbitrator to state a case, and eventually, after a certain amount of difference between the parties as to what form the case should take, the learned Sheriff-substitute did state a case which, although it was not at the time accepted by the workman, has been accepted quite properly by his learned counsel to-day, and quite properly also by his opponent. We have therefore had the argument upon the stated case as framed by the Sheriff-substitute, which, although not technically before us, is so of consent of parties.

Ellis v.
Fairfield Ship-

Ld. President.

Now, taking the stated case as framed by the Sheriff-substitute, he first finds that it was alleged that the accident occurred on 1st June 1911. I do not think there can be any more obvious commentary upon the procedure adopted than this, that we have, for the purposes of argument, to assume that the accident happened without really knowing anything about the accident, and yet when it comes to the question whether there has been reasonable delay or not, it is quite evident that a good deal turns upon the fact of the accident and what happened afterwards. The learned Sheriff-substitute then goes on to say "that no notice of the alleged accident was given, and no claim for compensation made, until 30th January 1912." Now that is a finding in fact, and indeed there is no dispute that no actual notice or claim was made until that date. He then makes this finding, "that it was practicable for the appellant to have given notice of the accident immediately after the happening thereof, and before he left the employment." It is perhaps difficult to say exactly how far that finding, standing by itself, goes. If it means that the man knew on the 1st June that something had happened to him, and that therefore he could have said so, it is really no more than a truism. If, on the other hand, it means more than that, then, upon the face of it, it is perfectly impossible to discover how much more it does mean. The learned Sheriff-substitute then goes on to enumerate certain other facts which he finds established, but he first interpolates this finding in law, "that these proceedings were not maintainable unless it should be proved (a) that the respondents were not prejudiced by the want of timeous notice, and (b) that the appellant's failure to make a claim within six months was occasioned by mistake, absence from the United Kingdom, or other reasonable cause." I do not think that the Sheriff-substitute there is really wrong, but he has certainly made a slip. He has left out something that he ought to have put in, because he means to echo what the statute says. Now what the statute says in section 2 is this: "Proceedings . . . shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured, and unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, or, in case of death, within six months from the time of death: Provided always that," and then there follows a double proviso, one branch applying to each of the two requisites I have mentioned. And so far as the requisite of notice is concerned, the want of notice is not to have any effect if it is found in the proceedings that the want of notice did not prejudice the employer. That is mentioned by the learned Sheriff-substitute. But then the same branch of the proviso goes

Nov. 27, 1912. on to say, "or that such want . . . was occasioned by mistake, absence from the United Kingdom, or other reasonable cause," and that he

Co., Limited.

Ld. President.

The Sheriff-substitute then proceeds, as I have said, to make certain other findings, and first of all he finds that it was not proved that the respondents were not prejudiced by the appellant's failure to give timeous notice, but that in fact they were, inasmuch as they were deprived of the opportunity of having him medically examined. Then he gives us what really are the material facts upon which I think we can dispose of the case. He finds "that from the date of the alleged accident up to 5th August 1911 the appellant suffered pain in his neck and shoulder which he himself attributed to the result of the accident; that on 5th August 1911 he consulted a doctor, who diagnosed his disease as, and treated him for, muscular rheumatism of the right shoulder"; that up to 11th November 1911 he remained in his employment, but that he left on the 11th November; "that the appellant was thereafter treated by a doctor for a severe strain of the neck"—that is much the same as muscular rheumatism—"up to 13th December 1911," when he consulted another doctor, who informed him that his head was partially dislocated from the spine, and recommended his removal to the infirmary for treatment; that he was removed on 20th December 1911; and that afterwards, sometime in January 1912, he intimated for the first time that he "claimed compensation in respect that his then condition was attributable to the alleged accident on 1st June 1911." He does not actually say, but I think it is obvious, that the appellant, in the infirmary, after the 1st January, was suffering from a condition which, in his own opinion at least, and in the opinion of his advisers, was consequent upon the state of matters which had been diagnosed by the last doctor on the 13th December, namely, partial dislocation of the head from the spine. He further finds that a formal claim was made upon 30th January 1912.

The learned Sheriff-substitute then proceeds to say: "I found further in fact that, although the appellant may have been under a mistake as to his symptoms and condition between 5th August 1911 and 13th December 1911, he was under no mistake but himself attributed his condition to the result of the alleged accident from the date thereof until 5th August 1911, and from 13th December 1911 to 30th January 1912." With regard to this last finding I cannot help saying that it seems to me that there is a play upon the word "condition." In view of the facts that the learned Sheriff-substitute has just found, it is clear that in one sense this man was aware of his condition from the date of the accident until 5th August 1911,—that is to say, he knew that he had had an accident and that his shoulder was sore; but if "condition" means true condition, he, upon the facts, is found to know nothing about it, because he was suffering from something he did not know anything about—dislocation of the head—until he was told on the subsequent 13th December. It is true, I think, that from the 13th December until January he did know from what he was suffering, for he had been told by the doctor on the 13th December; and afterwards, when he got into the infirmary, it is probable—though the learned Sheriff-substitute does not tell us so—that the infirmary doctor then told him that his condition was serious and that it bore out the diagnosis Nov. 27, 1912. of the 13th December. The learned Sheriff-substitute then says this: "I ^{Ellis v. Fairfield Ship-building and Engineering Co., Limited.} therefore found in fact and law that the failure to make a claim within the statutory period was not occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause, dismissed the application, and found the respondents entitled to expenses." He had previously found in fact that it was not proved that the respondents ^{Ld. President.} were not prejudiced by the want of timeous notice, but he had made no finding at all as to whether such want of notice was or was not occasioned by mistake, absence, or other reasonable cause.

I am of opinion, and I must say very clearly, upon the facts as found, that the learned Sheriff-substitute's finding cannot be supported. There is ample authority upon this matter. There is first of all the case of Randine v. Alloa Coal Company,¹ which was followed in this Court by the case of Brown v. Lochgelly Iron and Coal Company, Limited,² and by the cases of Hoare v. Ardning & Hobbs,³ and Moore v. Naval Coal Company,⁴ in the Court of Appeal in England, and, finally, by the case of Egerton v. Moore,⁵ to which I shall refer more particularly later on. Now, the result of the cases which I have mentioned, other than Egerton v. Moore,⁵ seems to me to affirm this proposition perfectly clearly—that a man may have an accident, and honestly believe at the time that nothing serious has happened to him, and therefore, not conceiving that he has a good claim against his employer, make no claim, but if it afterwards turns out that he has made a mistake in fact and really has been injured, that may be (I do not say must always be, because the question of time might enter into it) reasonable cause for his not making the claim within the six months, or not giving notice of the accident before he left the employment; or, if one likes to use the other words, that his failure to give notice or make a claim in such circumstances may be occasioned by a mistake, in the sense of the statute, for I think the words "mistake, absence from the United Kingdom, or other reasonable cause" are really exegetical of each other—that is to say, reasonable cause is ejusdem generis with mistake.

I think, further, that in this case the whole facts point clearly the one way. Not only did the man himself not think at the time that he was much injured, but on going to the doctor for skilled advice, he was told, "You are suffering from muscular rheumatism." Well, muscular rheumatism may sometimes be occasioned by an accident. In the strict sense of the word it is not so caused, because a blow cannot directly occasion rheumatism. In fact, to borrow the words of Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton in *Egerton v. Moore*⁵ (he is talking of a tubercular abscess, but, mutatis mutandis, the same language may be applied to a case of rheumatism being caused by a blow),—"The medical evidence showed that the abscess might have come from other causes, although it most probably came from this blow, but it must be remembered that the ultimate mischief was only an indirect consequence of the blow. The blow would not produce the tubercular abscess, but, like any other lesion of the tissues, it might produce a state of things which would cause the tubercular tendency which was in the Nov. 27, 1912. man's system to show itself there. Other lesions might have caused it to show itself elsewhere." Substituting rheumatism for tubercular abscess, Ellis v. Fairfield Ship-building and Engineering Co., Limited. that is exactly in point in this case. This workman is told by his doctor: "You have only got muscular rheumatism, and that is a thing which will pass off." He does not think it is anything very serious, he does not make a claim, and he goes on in that state of ignorance until nearly the end of December, when he gets much worse, and then he goes to another doctor, who makes, I suppose, a more careful examination and finds out that he has sustained a very serious injury. I agree that after that the man might have given notice. But then, as I think was said by one of the learned Judges in this Division, "We are not to measure this question of notice in very nice scales"; and I think the trouble occasioned to this man by his removal to the infirmary and his being laid up there, are all reasonable causes for a little longer delay in giving of the notice. I therefore think that there is only one conclusion to be reached upon these facts, viz., that there was here a reasonable cause for the man not giving notice of the accident.

Ld. President.

Now, I come again to what I think shows the inconvenience of the procedure which was adopted here. In all that I have said I have been bound to assume that it could be clearly proved that the man's present condition, following upon the partial dislocation of his head from his spine, was really the result of the accident, an accident of which we do not know the details. It is quite clear that this workman is not entitled to get anything unless he proves that his present condition is due to the accident, and that he will still have to prove in the proceedings before the Sheriff-substitute; and it would have been much more satisfactory if one had not had to give a decision upon the question of reasonable cause upon an assumed state of facts. But, on the other hand, I do not think it would be justice to the workman not to give a decision upon the assumed state of facts, because, if the facts are as assumed, then undoubtedly I think there was here reasonable cause in the sense of the statute.

I said that I would refer specially to Egerton v. Moore.¹ *Egerton v. Moore*¹ was relied on by the learned counsel for the employers here, because in it there are certain criticisms upon Lord Adam's judgment in Rankine v. Alloa Coal Company.² I am satisfied that there is nothing in *Egerton v. Moore*¹ which is at all inconsistent with the judgment in Rankine v. Alloa Coal Company,² or with what was said in that case by Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear, or, indeed, with what was said by Lord Adam, except in one portion of his judgment, where—with great respect for all Lord Adam says—I agree with the English Judges in thinking that he went beyond the necessities of the case and seemed to lay down some general propositions which go too far. As it is well put by Lord Justice Buckley: "There are expressions in the judgment of Lord Adam in *Rankine v. Alloa Coal Company*² which might be used to sustain an argument that the two expressions 'to make a mistake' and 'to take a wrong course' are equivalent expressions." But nothing could be clearer than Lord Justice Buckley's opinion itself to the effect that *Rankine v. Alloa Coal Company*² was well decided, because, after making that criticism upon what Lord Adam says, and pointing out Nov. 27, 1912. that "mistake" in the Act of Parliament does not mean "taking a wrong course," he goes on to say this: "Let me instance what might be a mistake —Assume a person who has sustained an injury which, for the time being, is latent. He does not know whether it is going to result in anything serious or not. He may for some time be under a mistake of fact whether he has really received an injury, and may not give notice. That would, I think, be a mistake within the meaning of the word in the Act of Parliament." I could not have a better description in very few words, according to my view, of the facts of this case.

Ellis v.
Fairfield Ship-

Engineering

Ld. President.

On the whole matter, I think the case must be remitted to the Sheriff-substitute with instructions to allow the applicant to prove his original averments as to the accident and as to his state in order that compensation may be assessed if it is found that what he is suffering from is the result of the accident.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion, for the reasons which your Lordship has given. The only question which is actually before the Court at present is whether, upon the averments of the applicant for compensation that are before us, and upon the state of the facts which the Sheriff-substitute has found with reference to these averments, the applicant has lost his right to maintain these proceedings by reason of his failure to give notice of the accident as soon as practicable after it had happened, or by reason of his failure to make a claim within the statutory specified period.

Now, the answer to both these objections is that the want of notice and the failure to make a claim were occasioned by mistake or some other reasonable cause, and that is the only question that is formally before us now. It is primarily a question of fact for the arbitrator. But the appellant is entitled to say that, in answering it, he has been misled by an erroneous construction of the statute; and that is a question which he is entitled to bring under the consideration of the Court. Upon the statement which the learned Sheriff-substitute has made, it appears to be proved to his satisfaction that immediately after the alleged accident by which this man says he was injured, he suffered from pain in his neck and shoulder, that he consulted a doctor, and that the doctor told him that he was suffering from muscular rheumatism. In that state of opinion, he gave no notice of the accident and made no claim against his employer. He remained under that impression, induced by his doctor's advice and by his own suffering, until 13th December 1911. He then consulted another doctor, who informed the workman that his head was partially dislocated from the spine. From this second diagnosis, therefore, he found that he was suffering from a very serious injury of a totally different kind from that which he supposed he had been suffering from before. That he should not have made a claim when he thought that the accident resulted in nothing worse than rheumatism, and yet have made a claim when he found it had caused a dislocation of the head from the neck, is perfectly intelligible. He abstained from making the claim when he did not know the extent of his injury; and when he was at last informed what the extent of his injury was, it was reasonable that he should make his claim.

Nov. 27, 1912. I agree with your Lordship that his delay in giving notice and making a claim was occasioned by a reasonable cause, and therefore that the delay should form no bar to carrying on proceedings for obtaining compensation under the statute. I agree that the course your Lordship proposes to take is the right one in the circumstances. I only add that I still adhere to the opinion expressed in the case of *Rankine*¹ on the merits, and also to the decision in the first stage of that case² as to the proper course of procedure in actions of this kind, in which it is extremely desirable that if a case is to be brought to this Court at all it should be brought once for all, and not by several successive appeals upon different questions raised at different stages.

Ellis v.
Fairfield Ship-
building and
Engineering
Co., Limited,
Lord Kinnear.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The course adopted by the learned Sheriff-substitute is, I think, competent, though, unless in exceptional cases, inconvenient. There is nothing in the present case to make it an exceptional case, and I therefore agree that the Sheriff-substitute should here have dealt with the whole matter as one. On the merits of the preliminary questions dealt with by the learned Sheriff-substitute I entirely agree with your Lordships.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships. It is apparent from the findings of the learned arbitrator that the injury for which the workman here seeks to recover compensation was partial dislocation of the head from the spine, and it also appears that he was not aware that he had sustained this injury until the 13th December 1911, although the accident is assumed, for the purposes of this case, to have happened on the 1st June. Now, in these circumstances, I think that the case is really a fortiori of the decision in the case of Rankine v. Alloa Coal Company.¹ I cannot hold that the workman had not reasonable cause for his failure to give notice of the accident or to make the claim within the time specified in the section of the Act.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in answer to the questions of law in the case that on the facts stated to have been proved there was good and reasonable cause for the failure of the appellant to give earlier notice of the accident and intimation of his claim: Recall the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator appealed against, and remit to him to allow to the appellant a proof of his averments, and to proceed as accords."

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)— Burns v. Summerlee Iron Co., Limited.
Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Miner taking upon himself duty not entrusted to him.

A repairer was engaged in making repairs on an air course in a mine, and it was necessary for him to bring wood to that place for the purpose. This could be done by hauling the wood up the air course, or by taking it up in hutches by a wheel brae, and the repairer was directed to take it by the air course and not by the wheel brae. The wheel brae was worked by gravity, an empty hutch or a hutch loaded with wood being pulled up by a descending hutch loaded with coal. At the foot of the wheel brae was posted a "hanger-on," to whose sole charge was entrusted the duty of attaching hutches there, and of giving the necessary signals to the man at the top who then set the hutches on the wheel brae in motion. The hanger-on had attached an empty hutch and had given the appropriate signal to the man at the top, and then temporarily left the foot of the brae to wheel out a full hutch. In his absence the repairer loaded the empty hutch in an unskillful manner with wood, and the man at the top, having already received the necessary signal, attached a full hutch and started the wheel. The chain broke, and the repairer was struck by the descending full hutch and killed.

Held that the repairer was killed while arrogating to himself a duty which he was neither engaged nor entitled to perform, and accordingly that the accident did not arise out of his employment.

Kerr v. William Baird & Company, Limited, 1911 S. C. 701, followed.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in which Mrs Elizabeth Burns claimed compensation in respect of the death of her husband, John Burns, road repairer, from the Summerlee Iron Company, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire at Airdrie (Glegg) found that the accident to Burns did not arise out of his employment, and, at the request of the pursuer, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth the following facts as admitted or proved:—

"(1) John Burns was a repairer in the employment of the Summerlee Iron Company, Limited, at an average weekly wage of 32s. 4d. (2) Burns worked along with and under Hugh Waters. (3) A plan of the section of the pit at which these men were engaged at the time in question was roughly an oblong. (4) The left-hand side was a wheel brae, 57 fathoms long, and with a rise of 1 in 3½ from the bottom to the wheel. (5) The bottom side of the oblong was a way across to a return air course forming the right-hand side. (6) This return air course at its start at the right-hand corner was nearly level for a few feet, then it was a perpendicular shaft for 19 feet, then it was level for 24 feet, and for the rest of its course it rose in 1 in 2 or 2½. (7) Near the foot of the wheel brae and above the previously mentioned crossway, there was a 'through' to the air course, and near the top there was another 'through.' (8) Waters and Burns had been working for some months at repairs on said air course, and prior to the day of the accident had worked for a day or two at least, at a point in the air course above the perpendicular shaft. (9) In taking 1st Division.

 Sheriff of

Nov. 28, 1912. supplies of wood to these points above the perpendicular shaft they had taken them past the foot of the wheel brae through the crossway to the air course, and hauled them up and along the air course with a chain or wire, and not up the wheel brae. (10) On the day of the accident, 13th November 1911, they were working at a point of the air course opposite the upper 'through.' (11) On this day Burns asked White, the hanger-on in charge of the wheel brae, to put the wood they had there on to a hutch to be taken to the head of the wheel brae. (12) White agreed, and loaded one hutch with part of the wood, taking care that the wood was so stowed as to distribute its weight equally between the fore and hind wheels of the hutch so that an equal pressure was kept on both sets of wheels. (13) The wheel brae was worked by gravity, a full hutch put on at the top bringing up, by a chain passed over the wheel, an empty hutch put on at the bottom. (14) When the hanger-on put on an empty hutch he belled two. (15) The man at the top then attached a full hutch if one was forward, or waited, as was usually the case, till one was forward, and then without further signal released the brake on the wheel and let the hutch away. (16) When wood was sent up, which was done for the coal getters at the workings at the top of the brae, four bells were signalled, the procedure otherwise being the same as in the case of an empty hutch. (17) When a person walked up the incline three bells were signalled, and the hutch was kept stationary until the person arrived at the top. (18) The deceased was ignorant of the signals. (19) On the occasion in question Waters and Burns went up the wheel brae after the first hutch of wood, and Burns returned to the bottom of the brae to get the rest sent up. (20) Burns arrived at the bottom of the brae after White had attached an empty hutch and belled two, and had gone out to the lye with a full hutch. (21) The man at the wheel started it after getting a full hutch forward, and after ten or fifteen yards of the chain had gone out the chain broke. (22) Burns's dead body was then found towards the foot of the brae; and between the empty and the loaded hutch, which were both derailed. (23) Burns was killed by being struck by the loaded hutch. (24) In White's absence Burns had loaded the left-over portion of the wood, and had done so unskilfully, as he had let it project over the back of the hutch. (25) This had a tendency to raise the front, and derail the hutch. (26) It is not proved whether Burns preceded or followed the hutch with the wood, or whether he started before the hutch was in motion. (27) No further signal was given than the two bells sounded by White. (28) Burns, as well as Waters, had been directed by the fireman to take their supplies of wood by the air course, and had been also directed by him not to use the wheel brae. (29) There were duly posted at the pit head Special Rule 81 under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887:—' Benchers, hangers-on, or other persons employed in connection with inclined or engine planes shall control the putting forward and coupling of hutches, and the attaching of the chains or ropes thereto. They shall make and attend to the signals, and shall prevent anyone approaching or travelling on self-acting inclined planes on which hutches are in motion. They shall stand clear of hutches in motion, so as to avoid danger from breakages or runaways'; and (30) also Special Rule 100:—' All workers are prohibited from entering or remaining in any place throughout the whole mine, where not absolutely required by duty to be at the time; and on no account shall they proceed through any fence or pass any notice erected to indicate that danger exists.' (31) White had the sole charge of loading and attaching hutches at the foot of the wheel brae, and of giving signals. Nov. 28, 1912.

Burns v.
Summerlee
Iron Co.,
Limited.

"On these facts I found that the accident to John Burns did not arise out of his employment with the Summerlee Iron Company, Limited. I assoilized the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and found them entitled to expenses."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"In the circumstances stated, was I right in holding that the death by accident of the said John Byrne or Burns did not arise out of his employment with the Summerlee Iron Company, Limited?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 22nd October 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—Burns's employment required him to carry wood to his working place, therefore, in doing so, he was acting in the scope of his employment, and the fact that he had adopted a wrong, even a forbidden, method of doing so did not take him out of the scope of his employment.¹ Apart from any orders he might have received, Burns had not departed from the ordinary course of his employment, because, from the signals employed, it was shown that the wheel brae was habitually used for the conveyance of wood, and it had been so used by him on this occasion for the purpose of expediting the work upon which he was employed. In the cases cited for the respondents a distinction was drawn between the introduction of a risk in the performance of the employment and a risk foreign thereto. On this ground the cases of Kane v. Merry & Cunningham, Limited,² and *Barnes v. Nunnery Colliery Company*³ were distinguishable from the present case. In the case of Conway,⁴ in which the facts were less favourable to the workman than those here, an accident had been held to have arisen out of and in the course of his employment. In any event, it was not proved that the loading of the hutch was the cause of the accident. Any breach of orders committed by Burns was over before the accident happened, and the danger from breaking of the chain was a risk incidental to walking up the wheel brae which, from the finding as to the signals, was shown to be a practice in the mine. If the Court were not prepared to sustain the appeal, the matter should be remitted to the arbitrator for an explanation of finding 28.

Argued for the respondents;—The only question for the Court was whether on a consideration of the facts found proved the decision of the Sheriff-substitute could competently be reached.⁵ It appeared clearly that the use of the wheel brae was not permitted for the carriage of any wood except that required by coal-getters at the top of the brae. The appellant had failed to show that the accident arose in any way out of the employment of Burns, for his work was in the air course, and he was ignorant of the signals used on the wheel brae, and of all the other requirements specified in the Special Rule quoted in finding

In making use of the wheel brae he had not only done what he was directed not to do, but had arrogated to himself duties which were not his, and had exposed himself to an added peril which did not arise out of his employment.¹ In the case of Conway v. Pumpherston Oil Company,² the workman exposed himself to a risk for something that was required for his employment, and that case was therefore clearly distinguishable from the present.

Burns v.
Summerlee
Iron Co.,
Limited.

At advising on 28th November 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a stated case in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act in which a woman, for herself as widow, and as tutrix for her child, asks for compensation in respect of the death of her husband, John Burns, who was killed in a pit belonging to the respondents. The learned Sheriff-substitute held that the death did not arise out of the employment of the deceased, and the question before your Lordships is whether that finding can be supported on the evidence.

The case is exceedingly clearly and well stated by the learned Sheriff-substitute, and discloses the following facts :—[His Lordship narrated the facts]. The learned Sheriff-substitute has held that in these circumstances the workman's death did not arise out of his employment.

Upon the general matter that is raised by such a question I have nothing to say beyond what I said in two cases, both reported in 1911 S. C., namely, the case of Conway v. Pumpherston Oil Company (at p. 664), and the case of Kerr v. William Baird & Company, Limited (at p. 703); and the whole point here is under which of these two categories does this case fall. Put in a single sentence, the law, I think, is perfectly well settled, that mere disobedience to an order will not take a man out of the scope of his employment. Therefore, if the learned Sheriff-substitute held that this man was out of the scope of his employment because he had gone to the wheel brae instead of doing what he had been told to do, viz., to take wood by the direct access to the air course, that, I think, would not have taken him out of the scope of his employment. He would have been engaged in what was his employment, namely, getting the wood to the place where it was wanted, although doing it in an improper way, and in a way in which he had been told not to do it. But, on the other hand, if the true view of the case is that, to use my own words in Kerr's case,³ "he was arrogating to himself duties which he was neither engaged, nor entitled, to perform," then he was out of the scope of his employment.

This is the view that the learned Sheriff took, and I cannot say that I think he was wrong. I mean that I think there was evidence on which he could reach that conclusion. Indeed, I think that he was right, because it was not a mere case of taking up the wood in a wrong way ; it was a case Nov. 28, 1912.

 of taking upon himself to do what nobody except the "hanger-on" ought to have done. He had no right to make himself a "hanger-on" and to take upon himself the work of the wheel brae. He knew nothing about the signals or the method of packing, and it is just because he knew nothing about the signals and nothing about the method of packing that the accident happened. He really went into the department of the "hanger-on" with which he had no concern. His doing so exposed him to a risk which his ordinary employment did not call on him to face. Therefore I think that this case falls within the category of cases of which *Kerr*¹ is an example, and not within the category of which *Conway*² is an instance, and that the judgment must stand.

Burns v.
 Summerlee
 Iron Co.,
 Limited.
 Ld. President.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion for the reasons which your Lordship has given. The statement of facts by the learned Sheriff-substitute shows that the "hanger-on," White, had the sole charge of loading the hutches at the foot of the wheel brae and of giving signals to the man at the top, and that the deceased man, Burns, took it upon him to perform the duty which was entrusted not to him but to White. On that statement I think that what he undertook to do was not part of his employment. It is found that he did it unsuccessfully, because he loaded the hutch in such a way as to raise the front and derail the hutch, and not only had he loaded the hutch unsuccessfully, but he had failed to give the proper signals, which he does not seem to have known anything about because it was not part of his business to know. In these circumstances, as I understand the learned Sheriff-substitute's judgment, he finds that the man exposed himself to an additional risk outside the risks incidental to his employment, and therefore that this accident which he met with was not one arising out of his employment. I think that was a question of fact for the learned Sheriff-substitute, and I see no ground upon which we should be justified in interfering with his judgment.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think there is sufficient evidence in the eighteenth and twenty-fourth findings, both of which have been referred to by your Lordships, to justify the Sheriff-substitute in reaching the conclusion that he has reached. From the facts set out in these two findings I think there is evidence from which it may be inferred that the deceased man usurped the functions of another, and that he suffered in consequence. Therefore I agree with the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative.

 Trustees v. —Chree, K.C.—T. G. Robertson.

Marriage-Contract—Provisions for children—Obligation by father to pay "at such times and in such sums as he finds it convenient"—Jus crediti or right of succession—Bankruptcy of father—Competition with father's creditors.

A husband, by antenuptial contract of marriage, bound himself to pay to the trustees thereunder "before his death, at such times and in such sums as he finds it convenient," a sum of £4000, and, until it was paid over, to pay interest thereon to the trustees or to his wife. The trustees were directed to hold this sum and the profits thereof for the liferent alimentary use alienarily of his wife, and on her death, in the event of her predeceasing him, then for himself as an alimentary liferent provision for himself and the children of the marriage, and on the death of the survivor of the spouses to hold the sum for, or pay it over to, the children of the marriage.

No part of the sum having been paid to the trustees, and the father having become bankrupt, the trustees claimed to be ranked as creditors for this sum in the bankruptcy.

Held that, as the father had come under no obligation in favour of his children which involved his parting with the control of this sum, the children's right therein was not a jus crediti, but only a right of succession; and claim for the trustees rejected.

Opinion (per the Lord President) that the wife would have a good claim for the actuarial value of her liferent provision.

Herries, Farquhar, & Co. v. Brown, (1838) 16 S. 948, commented on. Fotheringham v. Fotheringham, (1734) M. 12,941, and Fair v. Hunter, (1861) 24 D. 1, discussed and explained.

1ST DIVISION. ON 18th March 1912 William Henderson Donaldson and others, the Sheriff of Lanarkshire. trustees acting under an antenuptial contract of marriage between Thomas Neil Mackinnon and his wife, dated 26th September 1882, appealed to the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow against a deliverance by William Dunlop, C.A., the trustee on Mackinnon's sequestrated estate, rejecting a claim by the pursuers as creditors of the bankrupt based on the provisions of his antenuptial contract.

Mr Mackinnon undertook in his marriage-contract (to which he was the first party and his wife was the second party):—"(Tertio) To pay to the said trustees before his death, at such times and in such sums as he finds it convenient, a further sum of Four thousand pounds, and until the said sum is paid over to pay to the said trustees or the second party half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday interest thereon at the rate of four per cent per annum, all which subjects and the profits and produce thereof shall be held by the said trustees in trust as follows:—(First) For behoof of the second party in liferent for her liferent alimentary use alienarily till her death or second marriage, and on her death, in the event of her predeceasing the first party, then to him in liferent as an alimentary provision for behoof of himself and the children of the marriage, for the proper upbringing, education, and maintenance of such children, and that in such sums or proportions as the said trustees shall deem proper, and of which they shall be the sole judges: (Second) On the death of the survivor of the said spouses or the second marriage of the said Rachel Nov. 28, 1912.

Catherine Donaldson [the second party], the said trustees shall hold the said estate for behoof of or pay and convey the same to the children Mackinnon's of the said marriage and the issue of any child or children who may Trustees v.
have predeceased leaving issue, in such proportions and on such Dunlop.
conditions and subject to such restrictions as the first party, whom failing, the second party, may appoint by any writing, whether testamentary or otherwise, and, failing such appointment, then equally among the said children per stirpes, the issue of any predeceasing child or children taking equally among them the share which would have fallen to their parent if in life, payable said shares to children as after provided: and (Third) In the event of there being no children or remoter issue of the said intended marriage surviving at the dissolution thereof by the death of one of the spouses, then the said trustees shall, in the event of the first party being the survivor, pay and convey the said estate to him or his assignees, and in the event of the second party being the survivor then the said trustees shall hold the said estate and apply the annual interest or produce thereof for behoof of the second party for her life for her alimentary use alienably during all the days and years of her life till her death or second marriage, and on her decease or second marriage shall pay or convey the said estate to the heirs or assignees of the first party."

Both the spouses were alive, and there were eight children of the marriage. The further facts giving rise to the appeal were thus stated by the pursuers and admitted by Mr Dunlop, the defender:—(Cond. 3) "The said Thomas Neil Mackinnon has never paid the said sum of £4000 to the trustees. The value of the obligation before set forth is £4000. The pursuers accordingly, on the sequestration of the said Thomas Neil Mackinnon, lodged an oath and account of debt, in which oath and account of debt they claim, inter alia, the said sum of £4000. Said oath and account of debt was dated 24th March 1911. The defender rejected the said claim by deliverance dated 4th March 1912, in respect that 'the terms of the obligations for payment of the £4000 to the claimants do not import a jus crediti in the trustees entitling them to rank in the sequestration.'"

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The bankrupt having been at the date of his sequestration indebted to the pursuers in respect of the obligation contained in the said contract of marriage before condescended on in a sum of the value of £4000, the defender's deliverance falls to be recalled, and the pursuers to be ranked for said sum, and the defender found liable in expenses.

The defender pleaded that the averments of the pursuers were irrelevant.

On 2nd July 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Recalls the deliverance of the trustee appealed against: Finds that the pursuers are entitled to be ranked as creditors in terms of their affidavit and claim lodged in the sequestration, and ordains the trustee to rank them accordingly."*

* "NOTE.— . . . (1) Is there a jus crediti in the trustees in respect of the obligation to pay them £4000? I think there is. The authorities are numerous, and after comparing them and the above provisions I conclude that in a competition with creditors the wife in this marriage-contract has a jus crediti. With regard to the children, I think

Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
Dunlop.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 19th November 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—On a sound construction of the terms of the marriage-contract the rights of the children of the bankrupt were not rights of credit but only of protected succession.¹ Interest was not payable to them directly at any time upon the amount of the provision, and no jus crediti in their favour could be set up in the absence of provisions creating obligations prestatable at their instance against their father during his life.² Here the father had undertaken only an indefinite obligation to pay to the pursuers funds in which his children would have an interest at his death, but with regard to which he had placed himself under no restriction as to his power of disposing of them during his life, and so had not secured his children against himself.³ This was a claim against the onerous creditors of the father, and the decisions relied upon by the respondents which dealt with solvent estates, as in the case of Fair v. Hunter,⁴ did not affect the present question.

Argued for the respondents;—The pursuers were entitled to rank

I may conclude from the authorities that when a father undertakes obligations in their favour to be performed after his death, but with interest to run on it before his death, then there is a jus crediti in the children and not a mere spes successionis. The sum may be retained for the father's convenience, but the right of the children in it is so real that interest is due on it. If interest is due it seems to follow that the capital sum must be a debt of the father. Here there is an obligation to pay to the trustees before death, and interest is to run. A fortiori I think a jus crediti is established.

"The principles applicable are to be found in Erskine, iii. 8, 40 to iii. 9, 22; Bell's Commentaries, i. 682-685; Bell's Principles, sec. 1946; Fraser, Husband and Wife, 1355-1358; M'Laren, Wills and Succession, sec. 1209, 1211, 1215, 1217, 1219. The earlier cases which start in Morrison, voce Provisions to Heirs and Children, with Lyon v. The Creditors of Easter Ogle, 12,909; Douglas, 12,910; Ballingall, 12,919; Mackenzie, 12,924 (where the sum was not due till the father's death, but interest was due from the majority or marriage of the children), seem to have been all considered and given effect to in the leading case of Wilson's Trustees v. Pagan or Wilson, 2nd July 1856, 18 Dunlop, 1096.

"The defender's view is that no action was competent against the father during his lifetime to compel performance, and unless the provisions conferred a jus exigendi a jus crediti did not exist. So far as I am aware the case of Wilson's Trustees has never been overruled, and I think from it and the cases that precede it I may conclude that, although the right of action may never come, yet a jus crediti may be conferred. I think it was conferred in the present case."

pari passu with the other creditors of the bankrupt. An obligation to pay at convenience, such as had been undertaken by the bankrupt in his marriage-contract, was distinguishable from an obligation to pay at pleasure, because objective convenience, dependent upon mercantile or other considerations, was a suspensive condition to which the death or bankruptcy of the debtor at once put an end.¹ The pursuers might enforce payment in terms of the marriage-contract at any time during the life of the bankrupt on proving that he could conveniently pay.² Thus, there being an obligation upon which either the pursuers or the children of the bankrupt might have sued during his life, so as to transfer the fee from him or restrict his right of administration, there was a jus crediti in the pursuers entitling them to rank in competition with his other creditors.³ The obligation to pay interest was alone sufficient ground for the presumption of a jus crediti in favour of the children of the marriage,⁴ and it was immaterial who were the particular individuals at different times entitled to the interest. The deliverance of the defender upon the pursuers' claim to a ranking could not be supported except on the ground that the provision was made for the benefit of the truster, who was the bankrupt, or was so indefinite as not to be enforceable. Neither of these grounds could be supported; and on a construction of the whole clauses of the marriage-contract—for that was the test by which alone the matter fell to be determined⁵—the pursuers were entitled to be ranked for the interests of the wife and children.

At advising on 28th November 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case arises in the bankruptcy of Mr Thomas Neil Mackinnon, and the point is whether the learned Sheriff-substitute has been right in recalling the deliverance of the trustee and ranking the marriage-contract trustees of the bankrupt for the sum of £4000.

The bankrupt entered into an antenuptial marriage-contract under which he became bound to make good certain provisions in favour of his wife and children. As to some of these provisions no question arises, but the one upon which the whole matter turns is this—[His Lordship read the clause of the marriage-contract quoted supra, and continued]—

The marriage-contract trustees claimed for this £4000, which de facto had never been paid to them, and the trustee in the sequestration rejected the claim. The learned Sheriff-substitute recalled the trustee's deliverance and ranked them in terms of their claim, and he states the question thus: "Is there a jus crediti in the trustees in respect of the obligation to pay them £4000?" He thinks there is. He gives a general citation of authorities; but he particularly calls attention to the fact that when a father undertakes obligations in favour of his children to be performed after his death, "but with interest to run on it before his death, then there is a jus

Here there is an obligation to pay to the trustees before death, and interest is to run. A fortiori I think a jus crediti is established." I

Ld. President. think there the learned Sheriff-substitute made a slip. It may follow from the fact that interest is to run that a jus crediti is created, but only if interest is to run in favour of the same people to whom the principal is payable, in this case the children. Now, the Sheriff-substitute has not noticed here that the children directly never get any of this interest at all. The wife gets it so long as she is alive, and, after her death, the father gets it or else nobody gets it; and, accordingly, that ground of judgment fails as soon as that is explained.

We had a very good and very able argument on the general question with which the Sheriff-substitute does not more particularly deal than by a citation of authorities, and the whole question comes to be whether in this marriage-contract there is a jus crediti or not.

I am not going through all the cases that have been decided upon this matter, which would indeed be a lengthy proceeding. I could not possibly put the general result so well or with the same authority as was done long ago by Mr Bell in his Commentaries.¹ He puts the point that applies to this case in one single sentence in the middle of p. 684, vol. i. After stating all the ways in which a husband may be able to provide for a wife and children in case of his own bankruptcy, he says: "6. It is quite incongruous to attempt to give to the husband the command of his funds, and at the same time secure the wife and children against the effect of his insolvency." Now that would be just the attempt that is made here if the obligation were intended to confer a jus crediti, because it is perfectly clear that when the only thing this gentleman binds himself to do is to pay the £4000 at such time and in such sums as he finds convenient, then, in the words of Professor Bell, he retains the "command of his funds." The locus classicus on the subject which bears out what Professor Bell says is the judgment of the Court in Herries, Farquhar, & Company v. Brown.² The consulted Judges, in their opinion (at p. 963), began with the general proposition, which is undoubtedly law, that "Whether a provision in an antenuptial contract of marriage, to children nascituri, does or does not vest in them, when they come into existence, a proper right of credit, depends on the terms in which the obligation is conceived, and the conditions with which it is affected." Reverting to the matter, there is another passage which was quoted by the learned Judges in the subsequent case of Wilson's Trustees v. Wilson,³ and may be taken really to be the foundation of the matter. I quote now from the bottom of p. 964 of the opinion in Herries, Farquhar, & Company:—"As we have already observed, if it be a simple and unconditional provision liberis nascituris, the term of payment being suspended till the father's death, the presumption of law has been received and is still in force, that no jus crediti is contemplated, although the obligation is conceived in favour of the children directly, so that, ex figura verborum, they are creditors. But, if words are used which express, or plainly imply, a restriction on the father's power of disposal, or if any conditions are adjoined incompatible with that power, the presumption ceases, and the children are held not to have a spes successionis merely, but a proper right of credit." That is putting exactly the same criterion as Professor Bell—Is there a restriction upon the father's power of disposal during his life—time? There is, if he has to part with his own funds so far as to pay interest at a time which may arrive before his death. There is not, in a case like this, where he makes it clear that he is going to keep the management of his own fortune in his own hands.

³ 18 D. 1096.

I think that would be enough, and I could now stop, were it not for the case that is mentioned in the opinion of the consulted Judges in Herries, Farquhar, & Company,¹ which would certainly, as they put it, seem to go the other way, and although it seems almost sacrilegious to touch this opinion which has always been looked on as a very great authority, and which I think is a very great authority, still, none the less, I feel bound to point out what I think is an undoubted slip in the opinion. In that opinion a certain case is discussed, and if that case can be used as it is used there, it would go against the doctrine I have laid down and against its application to the present case. In the opinion of the consulted Judges it is said²: "A case still more applicable to that which is now before the Court is noticed in the case of *Gordon v. Sutherland*³:—'In a contract of marriage in which the husband "became bound to join the sum of 3000 merks with 17,000 merks of portion received with his spouse, and to lay out the same upon security to himself and spouse, and longest liver in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the children of the marriage in fee; and how often the sum should be uplifted, that he should so often re-employ the same in the above terms"; the man having died bankrupt, action was brought against the cautioner, who was bound with him in the contract: His defence was that the obligation barred only gratuitous deeds, and was no impediment to the husband from laying out the money upon trade, though it should be sunk thereby. But the Court found the import of the obligation to be that, in all events, this sum should be secured to the children of the marriage; and therefore sustained action against the cautioner for replacing the same.'" So far quotation from the notice of the case in Gordon v. Sutherland.³ Then the opinion of the consulted Judges proceeds: "In that case there was not only no stipulation that the father should denude of the fee in his lifetime; but it was necessarily implied that he should not denude, for it is contemplated that he might employ and re-employ; that is, that after having employed the sum, he should have the power of uplifting it at his pleasure. Neither was it stipulated that any part of the sum, nor of the interest accruing upon it, should be payable during the father's lifetime. But the Court held the obligation that the father should employ, and if he uplifted that he should re-employ, to import that he was bound to make the provision effectual to the children after his death, and consequently that they were proper creditors to the father." Now, if the case referred to had decided that, I quite agree it would be contrary to what my view of the true meaning of the restriction of the Nov. 28, 1912. father's power of disposal is, and to the application to this case ; but I think it is clear that that was not decided in that case. It is quite evident that the learned Judges in referring to that case did not know what case it was, because they only refer to it as "noticed in" *Gordon v. Sutherland*¹ ; they would have given the name of it if it was known. And it is only referred to in the argument in Gordon v. Sutherland.² I notice, to begin with, that the decision in *Gordon v. Sutherland*¹ was to the opposite effect. It is perfectly well brought out by the rubric : "A settlement in a contract of marriage is in dubio not understood to give more to the heirs nascituri than spes successionis." And the obligation there was as to land, instead of as to merks as in this other case, but it was an obligation to provide for the spouse in life-rent and to the children in fee. But it is not impossible, although it is not done by the learned Judges, to find the case that was quoted in the case of Gordon v. Sutherland,¹ and I have no doubt whatsoever that the case is the case of Fotheringham v. Fotheringham of Pourie,³ which is reported as follows : "In a contract of marriage the husband's cautioner being bound to employ a sum for the use of the wife in life-rent, and the children of the marriage in fee ; and the husband having died bankrupt without implementing, in a process at the instance of the children against the cautioner, the defence was, that the pursuers, as heirs of provision, are ultimately liable to relieve the cautioner, and frustra petit quod mox est restitutus. Answered, the pursuers have got nothing by their father, and so cannot be liable for any of his debts ; nor will the sum they recover from the defender make them liable for their father's debts, because their claim is not qua heirs to their father, but as the defender's creditors. The Lords found the cautioner bound to implement, and that without relief." I concede that, reading that case as I have read it, there would not be a necessary identity with the case referred to in Gordon,¹ but the identity is satisfactorily made out when one goes to another report of the same case which is found in Lord Elchies' Decisions, voce Cautioner, No. 2. And if you compare the report of the case in the first volume of Elchies with the report in the second volume, i.e., in Elchies' Notes, there is no longer any doubt about it. In the first volume of Elchies it is thus : "Cautioner in a contract of marriage for the husband's employing and re-employing his stock, and the bride's tocher, to them two in conjunt fee and life-rent, and the bairns of the marriage in fee, found liable to the children for the money, without relief against them as heirs of provision to their father ; and it was found no good defence, that the father had employed and lost the money in trade, being a merchant." Now, there you have the expression "employing and re-employing" of the bride's tocher along with the husband's provision. And then, when you come to the same case in the second volume, Elchies' Notes, voce Cautioner, No. 2, you find there that there is a special mention of this sum of 3000 merks : "The Lords sustained the defence in the discharge quoad the life-rent of the 3000 merks paid, but repelled it quoad the remainder of the life-rent, and found Powrie" (that is, Fotheringham's cautioner) "liable to the children of the marriage for the whole sums without relief." That makes the identity, I think, absolutely certain.

Now, having got the case, it is perfectly clear that it was not decided Nov. 28, 1912. upon the ground stated by the learned Judges in Herries, Farquhar, & Mackinnon's Company,¹ viz., that the children were proper creditors to the father, but Trustees v. Dunlop. what the case was decided upon is rightly set forth by Mr Erskine in his Institutes (iii. 8, 40), where, after having dealt with this question of jura Ld. President. crediti, he says: "Though such marriage-settlements, when executed in the ordinary form, are postponed to every onerous debt of the granter" (that is to say, do not create a proper jus crediti), "even those contracted after, and so cannot come in competition with his extraneous creditors; they are nevertheless effectual against a cautioner who has engaged himself in the marriage-contract for the father's performance of his obligation. For the plain language of that engagement is, that he shall make the provision effectual to the heir in case the father himself shall fail; so that the claim competent to the heir of the marriage in such case is not as heir to his father, but as creditor to the cautioner." Then he cites the case of *Dickson*² and the case of Fotheringham.³ So that, in other words, the case of *Fotheringham*³ was decided against the cautioner upon the hypothesis that there was no proper jus crediti in favour of the children against their father's estate. That, I think, ends the matter, and leaves it precisely as Mr Bell put it, namely, Can you find any proper restriction upon the power of the husband? Here I find none, and, in point of fact, if the argument upon the other side is right, the husband here would have succeeded in doing what Mr Bell says above all things he cannot do—he would have reared up a claim on behalf of his children which never could incommode him, because he need never pay except when he liked, but which would always incommode his creditors, because it would be a jus crediti the moment he became bankrupt.

Counsel for the respondents in a very able argument particularly appealed to the case of Fair v. Hunter,⁴ in which it was held that an obligation to pay "as soon as I have it in my power" was a proper debt. Well, all depends on what one means by proper debt. The truth is, there are three forms of obligations in such matters. There is the form of an ordinary debt which you are bound to pay the moment that you are sued upon it. It is not suggested that there is such a debt here. Then, on the other hand, there is a form of quasi-obligation which is truly no obligation at all, which simply says, "I promise to pay if I like to pay"; and I agree with the learned counsel that the obligation here is not of that kind. But there is the third and intermediate case of which I think *Fair v. Hunter*⁴ was an instance, in which a debtor may be bound in the sense that the obligation is good against him and yet it cannot come into competition with his ordinary and proper creditors, and that is just where the respondents' case fails, because there is no proper jus crediti which will destroy the father's power of disposal.

The circumstances in Fair's case⁴ were that Mr Hunter had a son through whom Fair had lost money, and the father was very anxious to make up to Fair the money which his son had lost. He was not in a condition at the Nov. 28, 1912. time to do so. He had not any ready money, his money being locked up in Australia, and he was a member of a firm of Writers to the Signet in Edinburgh under a contract of copartnery by which he had become bound not to enter into any obligation, and he therefore did not wish to transgress the terms of his own copartnery. He entered into negotiations with Fair, and they came to an agreement by which Fair remitted a certain considerable portion of the son's debt, and the father gave an obligation that he would pay the rest when he could. And the father wrote a letter in which he said: "I shall be most happy to pay to you, with interest, so soon as I have it in my power, by remittances from Australia or otherwise."¹ The father died, and an executor was appointed who proceeded to realise the estate, and the action was brought by Fair for constitution of the debt against the father's executor. The learned Judges held that it was a debt which could be constituted against the executry. But I think they clearly held that it was a debt of what I may call the intermediate kind, because the Lord Ordinary (Lord Kinloch), after giving his views, in which he said that this was not a mere promise which was no promise at all, namely, to pay if he chose, says this²: "Whether or not the pursuer shall be entitled to rank on the executry funds in competition with other creditors of the deceased, is not, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, now the question. Those creditors are not here. No question is or can be raised in this process with them. It will be for the pursuer to consider, when he has got his decree, what he will do with it; and for other creditors of the deceased, and for the defender, to consider what effect is due to it, as respects any ranking on the estate of the deceased." And Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis says the same thing at the end of his opinion³: "We are not going one step beyond that in giving judgment in this action. What the executor may have to say as to the condition of the executry estate"—that is to say, whether it can pay or not—"we are not here to inquire. But that there is this legal obligation against Mr Hunter, created by means of these letters, and which we are bound by our decree to constitute against his executry estate, I entertain no doubt, and I do not think it the least necessary to proceed one step farther in deciding the present case." Accordingly that judgment merely comes to this, that it was a good obligation as against Hunter, and therefore a good obligation against the free estate which Hunter left in his executry. But then, it was not in any way decided that it was a good obligation against the onerous creditors of Hunter if, as a matter of fact, Hunter died insolvent, which we do not know.

Now, here I am not doubting that this would have been a good obligation against the estate of this gentleman, supposing he had never paid the sum during his lifetime and had died leaving free executry, and I am not doubting, under the authority of Fotheringham,⁴ that if a cautioner had been bound along with him, it would have been a good obligation against the cautioner, but that is a different thing from saying it is a jus crediti ranking along with the claims of present creditors in bankruptcy, and upon the doctrine I have examined, that depends on whether the father is or is not maintained in full possession of his funds. I think he is; and I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned Sheriff-substitute should be recalled and the deliverance of the trustee replaced.

I ought to state, and I think it follows from the judgment, that if the wife chooses to make a claim, which she has not done at present, for the actuarial value of her life interest right to the interest which is due, that would be a perfectly good claim in the sequestration; that, indeed, was admitted by the learned counsel who appeared for the trustee.

LORD KINNREAR concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The decision in this case turns upon whether the children of the marriage have a jus crediti in the sum of £4000 dealt with in the third article of the marriage-contract.

The statement of the law applicable to the question I take from the opinion of Lord Moncreiff in the case of Goddard,¹ and from Lord Deas's summary in Wilson's Trustees,² which is the law laid down in 1 Bell's Com. 684 (6) and *Herries, Farquhar, & Co.*³ A father cannot secure his children against his other creditors without securing them against himself. He cannot secure them against himself without making such a provision that his own powers of administration or beneficial enjoyment are or may come to be abridged in his own lifetime. It is because the provision in question here fails to satisfy, on any reasonable construction, this condition, that it cannot be regarded as conferring a jus crediti. If the fund had been made payable at majority or marriage of the children, even though this should happen in the father's lifetime, or if it had been provided that interest was to run from a term which might happen in his lifetime, the children would then have had a jus crediti. There is, however, no such provision here in favour of the children. We are not concerned in the present case with the interests of the wife, whose provision is of a different character. So far as regards the rights of the children the father does not appear to me to have tied his hands in any way.

It was argued on the authority of *Fair v. Hunter*⁴ that the proper construction to be put upon this clause is that it contains an absolute obligation to pay money qualified only to this extent that it was only to be paid if and when it should be convenient, in a commercial sense, to do so. The opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in Fair's case⁴ was founded on to the effect that the death or bankruptcy of the debtor puts an end to all such conditions. The case of *Fair*⁴ was, however, different from the present. As the Lord Justice-Clerk points out in the concluding portion of his opinion, the question that was then being disposed of was only the constitution of the obligation against the executry estate. Here the obligation is a good one against the father, and will subsist notwithstanding any discharge he may obtain in the sequestration, but it is an obligation that must be construed according to its terms. To construe it as conferring a jus crediti on the children in a question with creditors would be to hold that although the father retained full control of the £4000 during his life (except in a Judicial Factor—Powers—Power to grant lease of urban subjects—Application for special powers.

Apart from special circumstances it is unnecessary for a judicial factor who desires to grant a lease of urban subjects to apply to the Court for authority to do so, the granting of such a lease, if the approval of the Accountant of Court has been obtained, being within his ordinary powers of administration.

Observations, per the Lord President, on the meaning of an application by a judicial factor for special powers.

1ST DIVISION. ON 6th January 1911 Henry Moncrieff Steele, chartered accountant, Glasgow, was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate constituted by a minute of agreement, dated in November 1898, between Mrs Jane Lauder or Tosh, widow of Henry Tosh, ironmonger in Glasgow, of the first part, his surviving children of the second part, and certain trustees of the third part.

The purposes of the trust were to hold the estate for the widow in liferent and the children in fee. One of the sons died in 1910, leaving two pupil children.

On 21st March 1912 the judicial factor reported to the Accountant of Court that he had received an offer to lease for ten years certain business premises in Buchanan Street, Glasgow, belonging to the trust. The judicial factor stated that he considered the offer to be very favourable to the trust, and was desirous of accepting it.

On 8th July 1912 the Accountant of Court issued an opinion containing the following passage:—

"The factor at a meeting with the Accountant raised once again a question which, although it crops up repeatedly in the course of factorial management, has never been judicially decided. Can a factor as part of his ordinary administration grant a valid lease of urban subjects, or can he not do so without first obtaining powers from the Court? The point was discussed in the case of Carnochan, (1894) 2 S. L. T., p. 79, where, on authority being asked to grant a five years' lease of urban premises, the Lord Ordinary 'suggested that the curator had power to grant the lease without authority from the Court, and that the note was unnecessary,' but after hearing counsel intimated that 'in view of the doubt which appeared to exist as to the power of the curator bonis to grant the lease without the intervention of the Court he would grant the authority craved.'

"The statutory powers of a factor in regard to granting leases would appear to be as follows:—

"(a) By the Act of Sederunt of 1730 he can 'grant tacks or leases to continue during all the time that the estate set in tack shall remain under the inspection of the said Lords of Session and for one year further.' Nov. 28, 1912.

- "(b) By the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, section 2, trustees have power to 'grant leases of the heritable estate of a duration not exceeding twenty-one years for agricultural lands, and thirty-one years for minerals.'
- "(c) By the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884 'trustee' is defined to include tutor, curator, and judicial factor.
- "(d) By the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 19, factors are given power to make abatements or reductions of rent.

"By the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, section 3, trustees have to petition the Court before they can grant 'feus or long leases,' and it does seem anomalous that a factor should have extensive powers of granting leases of agricultural and mineral subjects, and yet be unable to let a house or shop for a period of five to ten years without on each occasion putting the estate under his charge to the expense of an application to the Court. But unless he does so, he cannot at present let that class of property to advantage. A tenant is often at considerable expense in fitting up premises to suit the requirements of his business, and naturally he is not willing to enter on a lease which, through no fault of his own, may be brought to an end at any time on comparatively short notice.

"Section 2 of the 1867 Act above quoted being somewhat ambiguous in its terms, the Accountant for his future guidance reports the matter to the Court. In the present case, if powers are considered necessary, they may, in his opinion, be granted as craved."

The judicial factor accordingly presented a note to the Court craving for special power to grant the lease, and, on 25th July 1912, the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills (Kinnear) reported the note to the First Division.*

On 12th November 1912 counsel for the petitioner formally moved the Court to grant the special power in order that the question whether the application was necessary might be disposed of, but he submitted that a judicial factor had power to let urban subjects with the approval of the Accountant of Court. The undernoted cases were referred to.¹

* "OPINION.—This case is reported on the motion of the judicial factor. I should have granted the powers craved in accordance with the opinion of the Accountant, but it appears that there are other subjects within the factory with reference to which a similar question may arise, and the factor considers it to be for the interest of the estate that he should have a general power to let urban property subject to the supervision of the Accountant without incurring the expense of an application for special powers in each particular case. It is said to be an open question whether the granting of such leases falls within the general powers of administration conferred upon a judicial factor by his appointment, or whether it is a special power to be given or withheld by the Court with reference to the circumstances, and it is desirable that this should be definitely settled by an authoritative judgment."

Nov. 28, 1912. At advising on 28th November 1912,—

Tooh's Judicial Factor.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case was reported by Lord Kinnear when officiating on the Bills in vacation, and raises a question as to granting special powers to a judicial factor. The factor on this trust-estate has under his charge heritable property consisting of urban subjects in Glasgow, and he approached the Accountant of Court to ask whether he would be entitled to grant a lease of a certain portion of these urban subjects under circumstances which I need not detail but which leave no doubt whatsoever—and that is also the Accountant's view—that it was very desirable that the lease should be granted. But the factor, as the Accountant of Court says in a note now before the Court, “raised once again the question which, although it crops up repeatedly in the course of factorial management, has never been judicially decided. Can a factor, as part of his ordinary administration, grant a valid lease of urban subjects, or can he not do so without first obtaining powers from the Court?” In order to bring the matter to a head, the factor accordingly applied for special powers, and the application coming to depend before Lord Kinnear on the Bills, his Lordship reported the matter to the Court. The Accountant of Court brings before the notice of the Court the various provisions in Acts of Sederunt and statutes which deal with this matter. By the Trusts Act of 1867, section 2, trustees have power to grant leases of heritable estate of a duration not exceeding twenty-one years for agricultural lands and thirty-one years for minerals, and by the subsequent amending Act of 1884 “trustee” is defined to include “judicial factor.” I am of opinion that the section does not directly apply. I think it is limited in its terms to heritable estate of the class of agricultural lands and minerals, but, on the other hand, I do not look upon the Trusts Act of 1867 as giving the only powers which trustees have got. In that matter it is probably more a declaratory Act than an enacting Act, and I am far from adopting the proposition that before the Act trustees had no power in regard to leases. I do think that there is sometimes a little confusion in the minds of those who apply for them as to what special powers are. The Court has not ex nobili officio the power to validate anything which it allows the applicant to do, it can only do so if that right resides in it either in respect of the common law, or in respect of some special powers given to it by statute. These applications for special powers might, I think, more accurately be called applications for special directions, because what the Court is asked to do is to give a special direction to its own officer, namely, the factor. In a case like the present there is, so far as I see, no necessity for a special direction. In other words, it seems to me to be part of the duty of the factor to deal with urban property by letting it. Whether he is to let it for a term of years depends upon several considerations. It depends first of all upon the practical consideration whether the lease is a good lease for the trust-estate, or whether he could get better terms elsewhere. That is for the determination of the judicial factor, with, of course, the assistance that he gets from the Accountant of Court, to whom he must go. But there is also a set of considerations which depend upon the particular circumstances of each trust. Where a trust is likely to continue for some time and where a beneficial return to the trust-estate can be got by a lease for a term of years which could not Nov. 28, 1912. otherwise be got, then obviously the course is expedient. On the other hand, if a trust is of such a character that in all probability there will be an early distribution of the trust-estate it is quite conceivable that even although the factor might get a better return of income for, say, the next year by granting a lease, this advantage would be more than paid for by the hampering effect of the lease upon the distribution. One cannot lay down a rule, because each case depends on its own circumstances. I only say that it is a question which the factor must consider, and in which he must also be guided by the Accountant of Court, to whom he has to refer all such matters. The result to which I come generally is that the letting of urban property is within the ordinary powers of a factor, and that it is only necessary to go beyond the Accountant to the Court for special powers where there is some special circumstance. I can figure a case where the circumstances might be so balanced as to make the proper duty of the factor a question of great difficulty, and that would be a case for coming to the Court for further direction. But where there is no complication and the Accountant is satisfied that the course proposed by the factor is beneficial for the trust-estate in both senses I have mentioned, then there is no reason to come to the Court for special powers. I think that, as the case is here, there will be no harm in granting the special powers; but it follows from the opinion that I have just given that had it not been for the absence of authoritative pronouncement upon this matter there would have been no need for the factor to come to the Court.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—In this case the difficulty that I felt arose from the Pupils Protection Act, 1849, which, while it clearly recognises that factors had no power to make leases for a period of years, makes, by section 7, an express provision for their applying for special powers to that end. Had it not been for that I do not think there would have been any difficulty. But then comes the Trust Act of 1867, which I quite agree is a declaratory Act, and which declares the powers of trustees to make leases of ordinary duration of agricultural or mineral subjects. The Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act of 1884 follows, and declares that the term "trustee" in the Trusts Acts shall for the future apply to judicial factors. That would have got over the difficulty created by the Pupils Protection Act, 1849, if it had not been for the limited nature of the subjects to which the Trusts Act of 1867 expressly applies. But I think that on reading the two Acts of 1867 and 1884 together one may conclude that these Acts indicate by implication that trustees and factors have, and are to have, similar powers with regard to all classes of heritage. But that does not quite solve the whole question because, as your Lordship has pointed out, there are two aspects in which a lease has to be considered by a factor—one in deciding whether it is within the scope of the trust which he is administering, and the other in deciding whether it is a beneficial and proper lease to be entered into. On the former subject I think that he is quite entitled to direction from the Court, but on the latter that it is his duty to act on his own discretion. Accordingly I agree with your Lordship.

Dalziel & Co. Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule
(1) (a)—Where death "results" from the injury—Death from disease following on an accident.

A workman had a fall from a ladder whereby his ankle was injured, and he also suffered from severe pain and general shock. He was thereafter confined to bed and, although the injury to his ankle improved, he continued to suffer pain and remained in a low state of health until, about a month after the accident, he was seized with violent internal pains and died, the cause of death being certified as appendicitis peritonitis.

In an arbitration upon a claim by his widow for compensation, in which two doctors were examined for each side, there was a conflict of medical evidence, one doctor, for the pursuer, being of opinion that it was probable that the workman "would have been alive now had he not met with the accident," the other being of opinion that the condition of which the workman died "was consequent, indirect if you will, of the accident," and that "in all probability" he "would not have died but for the accident." The two doctors examined for the defenders could see no connection between the accident and the cause of death.

The arbitrator having found that the death was the result of the accident, held that there was evidence upon which that judgment could be supported.

1st DIVISION. (REPORTED ante, 1912 S. C. 966.)

Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, between Mrs Agnes Euman, widow of Robert Euman, mill foreman, and James Dalziel & Company, manufacturers, Walkerburn, Euman's employers, the Sheriff-substitute at Peebles (Orphoot) found that the death of Euman was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and, at the request of the employers and in pursuance of a remit from the Court of Session,¹ stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the following facts were proved or admitted:—

"1. The respondent is the widow of the late Robert Euman, and at his death was dependent upon him. He was sixty-two years of age when he died.

"2. Up to the time of the accident aftermentioned Robert Euman was a healthy man. He was a mill foreman in the employment of the defenders at Tweedholm Mills, Walkerburn.

"3. On 18th July 1911, in the course of and arising out of his employment by the appellants, Euman required to ascend a ladder supplied by the defenders in order to examine and take down from a shelf yarns for the mills in which he worked. While he was on that ladder it accidentally slipped, and he was thereby thrown to the ground, and sustained injuries to his right ankle and otherwise.

Nov. 28, 1912.

Euman v.
Dalziel & Co.

"He was dazed by the fall and suffered great pain, but was assisted, practically carried, home by two friends, who supported him one on each side to his house, which was close to the mill. He was at once put to bed, and in his trousers, which, owing to the pain he suffered, could not then be removed. The doctor, Dr MacRobert (the family doctor), was immediately sent for, and he found Euman suffering very much from general shock, and locally his right ankle was very badly damaged, though not broken, being what is known as a 'staved' ankle, i.e., damaged inside the joint. Euman also complained of feeling being gone from the heel and of pains generally all over him. A district nurse was immediately sent by the appellants. The treatment by the doctor was specially directed to the ankle.

"4. Euman was thereafter confined to bed till 10th August. The doctor thought that he called every day during July, and he certainly called every second day after that except on two occasions. For about two weeks of that time Euman's drawers could not be removed owing to the pain which he suffered on moving his body. To the nurse Euman always complained of pain all over the body. During that time the foot was slowly getting better, but the nurse never thought him really convalescent. Euman occasionally made general complaint of digestive mischief and constipation, which was treated with mild aperients. The rest of the medical treatment was directed to the ankle. During this period the motions of the bowels did not give proper relief, and several times when these motions occurred in presence of the nurse, Euman suffered so much pain that the nurse ordered him to get a little brandy to prevent him from fainting. During this period Euman's temperature was normal and his pulse about seventy-two.

"5. On 10th August Euman's ankle was better, but it had got better very slowly, and his vitality was very low. He was allowed by Dr MacRobert to get up in the afternoon, which he did. On Sunday, 13th August, he again rose. He then went to the garden with assistance, but on returning to his house he was very tired and glad to get back to bed.

"6. On Monday, 14th August, about 5 A.M., Euman was seized with violent pains in the stomach and all over. Dr MacRobert was sent for and found his temperature to be 104, pulse at or over 120. The doctor prescribed remedies which relieved Euman's pain, but Euman never rallied and he died next day about 3 P.M. Dr MacRobert certified the death to be due to appendicitis peritonitis, but in Court he explained that while it was his opinion that appendicitis and consequent peritonitis were the cause of death, that might have happened from ulceration and perforation of the duodenum, which might have existed although he did not think they were present. The sufferings of Euman on 14th August were such that a complete examination of the abdomen could not be made, and therefore while peritonitis certainly was present the cause of that disease could not be ascertained definitely.

"The medical witnesses for the respondent were:—Dr MacRobert, B.M.M.S. Glas., Innerleithen; Professor John Glaister, M.D. and

Nov. 28, 1912. D.Ph. of Cambridge, F.R.S. Edin., Professor of Forensic Medicine in Glasgow University and in consulting practice there.

Euman v.
Dalziel & Co.

"The medical witnesses for the appellants were:—Alexander Miles, M.D., F.R.C.S. Edinburgh, surgeon in Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh, and consulting surgeon to Leith Hospital; Archibald Nathaniel Shirley Carmichael, M.B., C.M. Edinburgh, 1892, Fellow, late President of Royal Medical Society, resident medical officer of Chalmers Hospital.

"Dr MacRobert was of opinion that looking to the previous good health of Euman, to the accident with severe nervous shock and consequent lowering of vitality, then confinement to bed with digestive trouble, the strong probabilities are that Euman would have been alive now had he not met with the accident. Professor Glaister, proceeding upon Euman's previous healthy condition, upon the accident and the sequence of symptoms which followed upon it, 'was fairly clear of the view that the condition of which Euman died was consequent, indirect if you will, of the accident, and that in all probability Euman would not have died but for the accident.'

"Dr Miles could not see any causal connection between the accident and Euman dying of peritonitis, or between the symptoms during his illness and appendicitis. Euman would probably have had appendicitis just the same without any accident. Dr Miles did not hear the evidence in Court of the symptoms of Euman's illness, but he had seen a statement by Dr MacRobert as to the treatment of the deceased, and the diagnosis of the deceased's symptoms. Dr Carmichael 'could not associate the accident as the cause of death.' Euman was just as likely to have died of appendicitis if there had been no accident. Dr Carmichael had read a statement of fact and precognition of Dr MacRobert taken by the defenders. While the medical witnesses for the defence saw no connection between the accident and the death, or between the accident and appendicitis, they do not as specifically state that they saw no connection between the accident and ulceration and perforation of the duodenum—two possible causes of death.

"The preceding facts are those bearing upon the question whether the death of Robert Euman was the result of an accident.

"Upon the remaining question raised in the question of law remitted, viz.:—Whether there is evidence upon which it can competently be found that the accident arose out of and in the course of Euman's employment as already stated, the appellants admit that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment by them.

"Upon the foregoing facts proved or admitted before me, I was of opinion that there was evidence upon which it could competently be found that the death of Robert Euman was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and I therefore so found."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether there was evidence upon which it could competently be found that the death of Robert Euman was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment."

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 15th October 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—There was no evidence upon which the arbitrator was entitled to hold that the death of the deceased was the result of the accident, because to justify such a holding it was necessary for the pursuer to exclude any other cause. That onus Nov. 28, 1912.

 the pursuer had not discharged. Here not only were two alternative Euman v. internal complaints put forward as possible causes of death, but there Dalziel & Co.
 was no proof that either of these was connected with the accident.
 The arbitrator had proceeded only on surmise, and surmise was not enough. It was not even enough to prove that but for the accident the workman would not have died at the time at which, and in the way in which, he did die.¹ That the death was the result of the accident must be the legitimate inference to be drawn from the facts established.² The case of *Golder v. Caledonian Railway Company*³ was distinguishable from the present, because in that case the chain of causation was complete, it being proved that death was accelerated by injury from an accident. In view of the second finding it could not even be said that the accident here had "given life to certain latent causes of mischief in the body."⁴ The case of Jackson v. Scotstoun *Estate Company*⁵ did not help the pursuer, because in that case there was medical evidence which directly supported the decision of the arbitrator, while here there was no such direct evidence.

Argued for the respondent;—The medical evidence supported the proposition that but for the accident Euman would not have died, and that sufficed to justify the arbitrator's award.⁶ The case of *Dunnigan v. Cavan & Lind*⁷ was primarily a decision upon the form of the arbitrator's finding, but when that case came to be disposed of on the merits, it was entirely in favour of the respondent's contention here. Where there was a direct conflict of testimony it could not be said that there was no evidence upon which the Sheriff's finding could be based, because he was entitled, as the judge of fact, to decide which of the witnesses was to be believed.⁸

At advising on 28th November 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question here arises upon a stated case, which was stated in deference to an interlocutor of your Lordships. The learned Sheriff-substitute, as arbitrator, originally found that there was a claim for compensation, but the respondents were desirous that the facts should be set forth, in order that they might be enabled to argue that no evidence had been led upon which it could competently be found that the death of the man whose widow is claiming was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The Sheriff-substitute has now stated a case, and from the facts which he there states it appears

Nov. 28, 1912. that on 18th July 1911 the deceased workman, Euman, had a bad fall off a ladder. He was thrown to the ground and was shaken and bruised, and in particular he suffered locally from an injured ankle. He was thereafter confined to bed from 18th July to 10th August. During the time that he was in bed (I abbreviate the findings) he complained of pain all over the body, and had a certain amount of disturbance of the functions of his bowels. He was attended by a doctor, but the treatment was, not unnaturally, mainly directed to what was obviously thought at the time to be the chief if not the only injury, the injury to his ankle. On 10th August his ankle was rather better, but he was in a low state. He was allowed to get up in the afternoon. On the 13th he again got up for a little and went out, but he was very tired, and came back and went to bed. On the 14th he was suddenly seized with violent pains in his stomach. His temperature went up considerably, and he died next day about 3 P.M. He never rallied. The cause of death, as certified by the doctor at the time, was appendicitis peritonitis. I take it that the collocation of those two words means that there was severe inflammation of the appendix, and that the inflammation had spread to the peritoneum. He was in such pain that a complete examination of his abdomen could not be made, and there does not seem to have been a post-mortem examination upon him.

Euman v.
Dalziel & Co.
Ld. President.

The learned Sheriff-substitute, after stating these facts, goes on to tell us who the medical witnesses were and what they said. I do not think that is quite the form the stated case should have taken. It is not for us to judge of what the witnesses said; it is for the learned Sheriff-substitute to find as the result of their evidence the facts which he held to be proved. But, taking the case as it stands, we are told that two doctors were examined for the workman's representative and two doctors for the employer. The first doctor, if his testimony is correctly reported by the Sheriff, makes that old mistake which I have already had to call attention to in other cases, of substituting a test of his own for the test of the statute. He says that "the strong probabilities are that Euman would have been alive now had he not met with the accident." Well, that is not the question that he really had to answer. The question that ought to have been put to him, and that he ought to have been made to answer directly, one way or another, was whether, in his opinion, seeing the man's symptoms, death was the result of the accident. The next doctor, Professor Glaister, does, I think, go that length. He says that he is "fairly clear of the view that the condition of which Euman died was consequent, indirect if you will, of the accident, and that in all probability Euman would not have died but for the accident."

The two other doctors could not see any connection between the accident and Euman dying of peritonitis. They said he might have had appendicitis peritonitis without the accident; but they did not say that it was impossible that the accident should have caused the general condition upon which the tendency to inflammation seized, which gave rise to the peritonitis and appendicitis. As regards that there are a few words in the judgment of Fletcher Moulton, L.J., in the case of Egerton v. Moore,¹ which are very much to the point. In that case his Lordship points out that a blow—and Nov. 28, 1912.

 the same thing might be said of a fall—could never, in one sense, be the Euman v.
 direct cause of a thing like an abscess, but that, like any other lesion of the Dalziel & Co.
 tissues, it might produce a state of things which would cause a tendency Ld. President.
 which was in the man's system to declare itself. I suppose there is no question that the state of modern knowledge is that an abscess itself, if you want the actual cause, is caused by the presence of a certain bacillus ; but still, an abscess is in the class of diseases that might be brought about by an accident or blow.

Your Lordships will remember that before he stated the case the Sheriff-substitute had already found that the workman's representative was entitled to compensation, that is to say, he had made a positive finding that the accident did arise out of and in the course of the employment. He now says, first, that the appellants admitted that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment in this sense, that when he had the fall from the ladder the workman was actually engaged in his employment. Then he says, "upon the foregoing facts proved or admitted before me, I was of opinion that there was evidence upon which it could competently be found that the death of Robert Euman was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and I therefore so found." I think there the Sheriff-substitute has fallen into a very unfortunate form of expression, because he is really confounding the question your Lordships have to decide upon the stated case with the question which he himself had to decide as arbitrator. But, notwithstanding that unfortunate form of expression, I do not think there is any reasonable doubt—if I did I would remit the case again to the Sheriff-substitute—that the Sheriff-substitute found as he did find because he preferred the evidence of the doctors who said that Euman's death was the consequence, indirect if you will, of the accident, to the evidence of those who saw no connection at all between the two occurrences. It is no business of the arbitrator to find that there is possible evidence on which some finding can be supported. He has got to judge between the evidence on the one side and on the other ; and in a case of conflict like this there is evidence upon which a decision in favour of either party could be supported. The phrase used by the Sheriff is one which, in cases under this Act, is appropriate only to this tribunal, which does not review the arbitrator's judgment as a Court of appeal reviews the decision upon fact of the Court below, but simply inquires whether there is evidence upon which the arbitrator's judgment can fairly be supported.

Now, coming to that question, which is the question for us, I am of opinion here that there was evidence upon which the arbitrator's judgment can be supported, and that therefore, he having given his decision, we should not disturb it. I think the case is a very narrow one, and I do not say what I would have done if I had been the arbitrator. I do not think it necessary to make up my mind as to that. This arbitrator has said that he is satisfied, and I think there was evidence on which he might say so.

I desire to say most emphatically that I entirely accept as the law of this matter what was laid down by the Court of Appeal in England in the

Nov. 28, 1912. case of Hawkins v. Powells Tillery Steam Coal Company, Limited.¹ I respectfully adopt the judgments in that case, which professed to follow—
 Euman v. Dalziel & Co. and I think they do follow—the law laid down by the House of Lords in several cases, but particularly in the case of Barnabas v. The Bersham Colliery Company.² I shall quote from Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton's opinion in Hawkins's case,¹ and with great respect I should like to adopt it as my own. But I shall first, for clearness, state what the facts of that case were. An elderly man was engaged on a morning shift in helping to push empty trucks up an incline and tumble them from off the rails. Ten minutes later he complained of pain, and he died in the evening of angina pectoris. There was a post-mortem examination, and the medical evidence upon it included these statements:—"There was a patch of atheromatous disease at the aortic valve, and another small patch at the mouth of one of the coronary arteries. . . . Having regard to the existence of those two patches very mild exertion on the part of a man of Hawkins's age might bring on a spasmodic attack of the heart, which might or might not end fatally." And then it was also proved that very many other things might bring on angina besides exertion in the case of a man who had this tendency to it; "it might be brought on by walking against a wind or by walking upstairs, or even by emotional excitement." Now, Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton went so far as to say this, that, if he was asked his own opinion as a man of ordinary common sense, he thought that the most probable conjecture was that the exertion which Hawkins had put forth in the course of his employment was the real cause of the attack of angina pectoris. And now I quote textually (from p. 995):—"So far I go with the applicant. But that is not sufficient to establish the case of those who are applying for compensation. They have to prove their case; that is to say, they must show with reasonable clearness that the accident actually did come from the employment. Many phrases have been used in this connection, all of them useful but all of them liable to abuse. Inference is certainly not excluded if it be a legitimate inference. Proof is required, but on the other hand proof does not mean proof to rigid mathematical demonstration, because that is impossible; it must mean such evidence as would induce a reasonable man to come to the conclusion as a fact that the employment was the cause of death. If that evidence is forthcoming, that is sufficient to establish the applicant's case." Now, I think that really states the matter fully, so far as it can be stated in a general proposition. Then the learned Judge goes to the facts of the particular case which I have just given to your Lordships, and says (at p. 995):—"We are bound to say that when dependants leave the case in that condition" (that is to say, not proved the one way or the other) "they have not given evidence justifying a Judge in deciding in their favour." I do not quote any more because it would make my remarks too long, but the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and of Lord Justice Buckley are precisely to the same effect.

Now, I accept all that law, and when I come to the application of that law to the facts of this case, I do not disguise from myself that it is a very narrow question whether the result should not be here Nov. 28, 1912. the same as there. It was argued to us with great force that the case was left in this position, that although it was very possible that this fall may have caused the appendicitis peritonitis, still there were other causes that might have caused it, and that, consequently, the case remains unproved. If the evidence of the doctors for the employers had been the only evidence in the case, that would be so. That is precisely the state of their evidence. They do not exclude the fall as a possible cause of peritonitis, but they say there is no reason that it should have been the cause more than something else, and they do not know what the actual cause of death was. But then I think that the other doctors, whom the learned arbitrator has preferred, do go the length that is necessary, and, accordingly, if that evidence commended itself to the person made judge in this matter, I think that is enough.

Euman v.
Dalziel & Co.
Ld. President.

If it is incumbent on me to note a distinction between the facts of this case and the facts in Hawkins's case,¹ there is one very obvious distinction. In Hawkins's case¹ there had been no accident in the popular sense of the word at all. I am quite aware that the word "accident" is used all through the discussions in connection with this statute in two different senses. The matter was noticed long ago by Lord Lindley in his judgment in the case of Fenton v. Thorley & Company, Limited.² His Lordship, at p. 453, says this: "The word 'accident' is not a technical legal term with a clearly defined meaning. Speaking generally, but with reference to legal liabilities, an accident means any unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss. But it is often used to denote any unintended or unexpected loss or hurt apart from its cause; and if the cause is not known, the loss or hurt itself would certainly be called an accident. The word 'accident' is also often used to denote both the cause and the effect, no attempt being made to discriminate between them." In the beginning of the series of cases it was strenuously argued that in order to entitle a person to recover there must be an accident in the sense of something happening extraneous to the person concerned, but that argument was finally set at rest by the case of Fenton v. Thorley,² and by the other well-known case—the aneurism case—of *Clover, Clayton, & Company, Limited, v. Hughes*³; so that there is no doubt that in the sense of the statute an accident need not mean an extraneous occurrence, though in popular parlance it often does. In Hawkins's case¹ there was no accident. Nothing happened. The man pushed the truck in the ordinary way with other men, and he upset it in the ordinary way. Nothing extraneous happened at all. In the case before your Lordships there was an accident. In popular language anybody would have said this man had met with an accident, because he tumbled from a ladder and fell to the ground and hurt himself very much; and then you have this, that the man went to bed, no doubt with a bad ankle but also with a bad shake, and he was ill and was in a low condition, and he never recovered from that low condition up to the moment of his death.

It seems to me that in the present case it was very much easier to reach

³ [1910] A. C. 242.

² [1903] A. C. 443.

Nov. 28, 1912. the inference (and Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton points out that inference is not excluded so long as it is fair inference) that the illness of which the Euman v. Dalziel & Co. man died was the result of accident than it was in the case of Hawkins,¹ where there was nothing to connect in time the angina pectoris with the particular exertion that had taken place at the time of pushing the truck. The first symptom did not appear until some time afterwards, and therefore the case was left in such a position that you could not tell what had brought on the attack. Here the case is left in a position in which you are certainly very far from mathematical certainty; but, at the same time, one cannot say that a person who draws the inference has no facts from which he could reasonably draw it. That inference has been drawn by a medical man; it has commended itself to the person who is made the judge of the facts, the arbitrator; and I cannot say that the arbitrator is wrong.

Accordingly, upon the whole matter, I am of opinion that we should answer the question of law by holding that there was evidence on which it could competently be found that the death resulted from the accident, and that the arbitrator's finding to that effect should stand.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have found this case of very considerable difficulty, and, if the statement by the learned Sheriff-substitute of the facts and of the opinion he had formed upon them were subjected to any severe critical analysis, I should say there was strong ground for the argument, which was in fact maintained, that there was nothing really before us to show more than that there was a probability one way and a probability the other way, and that the Sheriff himself had come to no final conclusion upon the question of fact. But then I think that is not the proper way of dealing with a case of this kind. We must take the whole case as it is laid before us, to see if we can find out what the arbitrator really intended to decide and what he has decided in fact. And so treating it I have come to think, with your Lordship, that the stated case clearly discloses a question of medical fact which the arbitrator was called upon to decide, and that the case states sufficiently clearly the decision upon that question at which he actually arrived.

There is no dispute that an accident happened to this unfortunate man arising out of and in the course of his employment, and that he was injured by it. The only question is whether it was the cause of his death. Now it is plain enough upon the learned Sheriff-substitute's statement that no one without sufficient medical knowledge could say that the death was plainly and obviously the natural consequence of the accident. It was a question for skilled opinion. There was, as is not unusual, a conflict of medical opinion. The doctors called by the employers are of opinion that there was no causal connection, so far as they could see, between the accident and the peritonitis which caused death. One of the doctors examined for the respondent, the claimant of compensation, does not go further than to say that in all probability the workman would have been alive now if he had not met with the accident. If the evidence stood there it would be very unsatisfactory and insufficient, but then there is another doctor who says in quite plain language that he was clearly of opinion "that the condition of which Euman died was consequent . . . of the accident," and he qualified that so far as to say that it may have been an indirect consequence, but a consequence it was.

Nov. 28, 1912.

Euman v. Dalziel & Co.

Lord Kinnear.

Now upon the question on which the medical witnesses were so divided it was necessary that the Sheriff-substitute should form his opinion as to which testimony he preferred, and he preferred to accept the evidence of Professor Glaister, which was to the effect I have already read, rather than the evidence of the other doctors. That was a question for him. I do not think it is possible for us to see upon his statement—nor is it necessary that we should see—why he preferred Dr Glaister to the other, and no Court could form any satisfactory opinion upon a question of that kind except the Court which heard and saw the witnesses set up against one another. I think there was here a clear question for the Sheriff-substitute which he had to decide upon evidence which was competently before him. That the opinion which he gave was an inference of fact from facts specifically proved is true, but that makes no difference either to the logical or the legal effect. As to the Sheriff-substitute's final deliverance, I think it would be putting an undue strain upon language to say that he had not in fact decided anything more than that the evidence was competent. I cannot entertain any doubt that what he meant to say was that, the evidence being competent, he had taken it into account and decided the case in the way in which he had previously given effect to his views before he was asked to state this case.

Upon the whole I have come to the opinion of your Lordship, that there is no ground upon which we ought to interfere with the decision of the Judge who is final upon fact.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I have had very great difficulty in this case, but in the result I am prepared to hold that that difficulty arises more from the form in which the learned Sheriff-substitute has presented the case for our consideration than from the substance of the case itself. I agree with the view of your Lordships.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative.

to them, a debenture over his assets, and should assign the debenture to the bank in lieu of the surrendered security. The moveables were surrendered and the debenture was obtained from J.; but before it had been assigned to the bank the company went into liquidation. The bank having claimed the debenture on the ground that the company were merely the holders of it for their behoof,—

Held that the company did not hold the debenture for the bank, but had, at most, come under a contractual obligation to assign it; that accordingly they were the parties beneficially interested in it at the date of the liquidation; and claim for the bank rejected.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Cullen.

THE BANK OF SCOTLAND presented an appeal against a deliverance of John Mackintosh Macleod, C.A., and Robert Dick Fraser, C.A., the liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited, Springvale Works, Glasgow, on a claim in the liquidation lodged by the Bank on 30th September 1910.

In their claim the Bank stated that they were creditors to the amount of over £23,700, and after narrating the details of the debt and of securities held by the Bank, the claim proceeded:—“(5) The Bank of Scotland claim to be entitled to the extent of £14,000 to a security constituted by a debenture to the total nominal amount of £17,000 created and issued by Frank A. Johnson, Limited, to Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited, in pursuance of, and in accordance with, an agreement, dated the 4th day of March 1910, and made between Frank Alexander Johnson, of the first part, Frank A. Johnson, Limited, of the second part, and Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited, of the third part. The Bank of Scotland maintain that the correspondence about the beginning of 1910 between Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited, or their agents, Messrs W. Baird & Company, and the manager of the Bank in Glasgow, constitutes a binding obligation on Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited, to make over this security, to the extent above mentioned, to the Bank. Reference is made in particular to Messrs W. Baird & Company's letter of 3rd February 1910 to the manager of the Bank in Glasgow. The Bank, on or about 4th February 1910, gave up security in the shape of gutta-percha and golf balls upon the express condition that the debenture, to the extent above mentioned, would be made available to the Bank as security forthwith.”

The facts relating to the Bank's claim, as set forth in the averments of the parties, were thus narrated by the Lord Ordinary:—

“A certain debenture for the overhead sum of £17,000 was, in March 1910, granted by the English Company, ‘Frank A. Johnson, Limited,’ in favour of Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited. Prior to the granting of this debenture Mr Frank A. Johnson had been the agent of Hutchison, Main, & Company in London, and had accepted a series of bills drawn by that Company in respect of his indebtedness to it. Some of these bills had been discounted with the Bank of Scotland and some with the British Linen Bank, while others were held by Hutchison, Main, & Company undiscounted. In or about February 1910 Johnson was in course of converting his business into that of a limited liability company. At the same time the Bank of Scotland was pressing Hutchison, Main, & Company to have the indebtedness of that Company to the Bank put on a more satisfactory footing. The Bank held certain corporeal moveables [the gutta-percha and golf balls above referred to] by way of security, and it is averred by the Bank (answer 7) that they agreed that they would transfer this security to the value of £2000 to the British Linen Bank, 'and should take in lieu thereof bills on F. A. Johnson for £3000 to be held in security, along with which, as collateral security, as mentioned in the next article, the Company (Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited) would give the Bank a debenture or floating charge over the assets of F. A. Johnson for the sum of £12,000.' Hutchison, Main, & Company were, of course, not in a position to give a debenture over the assets of F. A. Johnson; and what was meant by this is to be found in the next answer (No. 8). It is there set forth that the Bank of Scotland surrendered and passed on to the British Linen Bank part of the said corporeal moveables to the value of £2000 held by them in security, and that at the same time the agents of Hutchison, Main, & Company, Messrs W. Baird & Company, writers, Glasgow, wrote on 3rd February 1910 to the Bank of Scotland stating:—'We are authorised by the directors, and our London correspondents have instructions forthwith to procure from Mr Johnson a debenture or floating charge over the whole of his assets in the name of the Company for the amount required to secure the debt due by Mr Johnson to our clients.

 So soon as that debenture reaches our hands we have instructions to make it available to the Bank of Scotland as further and additional security for the repayment by our clients of their indebtedness to the Bank, and it is understood, in respect of the arrangements made, that the Bank will give to those interested in the Company the benefit of the arrangements referred to in past correspondence.'

 Bank of Scotland v.
 Liquidators
 of Hutchison,
 Main, & Co.,
 Limited.

"This letter was acknowledged and accepted by the Bank of Scotland by letter of 4th February 1910 from their Bank manager in Glasgow to Messrs Baird & Company, in which they said:—'With regard to the debenture or floating charge over Mr Johnson's assets, we shall rely on your having this completed as soon as possible, and sent to us for assignation to the Bank as a security for the Company's indebtedness.'

"It thus appears that the nature of the security which the parties contemplated was an assignation to the Bank by Hutchison, Main, & Company of a debenture to be granted in their favour over 'Johnson's assets.'

"Hutchison, Main, & Company proceeded to make an agreement, dated 4th March 1910, between them and (1) Frank A. Johnson and (2) Frank A. Johnson, Limited. This agreement recites that Johnson had acted as agent for Hutchison, Main, & Company, and had accepted bills to the Company, and that, after giving him credit for all these bills current (or unpaid), there was standing to his credit £1276, 2s.; that the English Company of Frank A. Johnson, Limited, was temporarily in need of funds; that Hutchison, Main, & Company had refused to transfer the agency to Frank A. Johnson, Limited, unless that Company and Johnson should, jointly and severally, undertake to pay the said bills and any sums that might become due to Hutchison, Main, & Company by Frank A. Johnson, Limited, in respect of advances made by Hutchison, Main, & Company after 31st January 1910, and costs, 'and to secure the repayment of the said sums in manner hereinafter appearing.' The agreement goes on to provide, inter alia, (art. 5) that Frank A. Johnson, Limited, 'shall

Bank of Scotland v.
Liquidators
of Hutchison,
Main, & Co.,
Limited.

The Bank reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 30th and 31st October 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—This was a case for the application of the principle enunciated by Lord Westbury in *Fleeming v. Howden*¹ that “an obligation to do an act with respect to property creates a trust.” By the letter of 3rd February 1910 Hutchison, Main, & Company obliged themselves to assign the debenture to the Bank, and accordingly when they received the debenture they held it in trust for that purpose. The liquidators had no higher right to the debenture than the Company. The debenture, having been sent to the Company for a specific purpose, never became their absolute property.² It was true that the security in favour of the Bank was not completed by assignation, but this was immaterial, for in such cases the Court disregarded the formal title and awarded the property to the person having the true beneficial interest therein.³ In the ordinary case if the Company had bound itself to grant a debenture in security of the debt and had gone into liquidation before doing so, the Bank could not have insisted on the security being completed. But here there was an onerous contract with regard to property in the hands of the Company, and the Bank had fulfilled its part of the bargain. If the Bank had purchased and paid for goods in the possession of the Company, it could have claimed the goods notwithstanding that the Company had gone into liquidation before delivery was made. On the same principle it was entitled to an assignation of the debenture for which it had given value. The obligation of the Company was definite both as to mode and time of performance, and this was a case in which specific implement of the obligation would not have been struck at by the Act of 1696. The case of Mansfield,⁴ cited by the respondents, was distinguishable, because there was no obligation there to grant the deed by which the security was extended. Further the reference in the schedule to the agreement of 4th March 1910 to bills discounted by the Bank, indicated that the debenture was intended to operate as a security in favour of the Bank, and gave the Bank a direct claim thereto. The reclaimers were entitled to a proof of their averments regarding the negotiations of parties and the arrangement which was come to.

Argued for the respondents;—The principle founded on by the Bank had no application in the circumstances because—in contradistinction to the position of the creditor in all the cases cited by the respondents—the Bank never had any beneficial interest in the debenture. In the contract between Hutchison, Main, & Company and Johnson, Limited, the only reference to the Bank was the enumeration in the schedule to the agreement of the bills discounted jus quesitum tertio in favour of the Banks. The mention of the Banks in the schedule appears to me to be descriptive merely. And in the body of the agreement the object of it and of the granting of the debenture is explicitly stated only as that of securing of the Scotch Company.”

by the Bank. This was merely for the purpose of identifying the bills, and conferred no jus quæsitum on the Bank.¹ It appeared from the correspondence that the assignation of the debenture to the Bank was no part of the arrangement concluded between the Bank and Hutchison, Main, & Company on 3rd February 1910, but even if it were, the Bank had no more than a personal right to insist on an assignation being granted, not a right to the debenture itself. The assignation would have been far more than a formal completion of title. It would have been a grant of further security which would have been struck at by the Act of 1696 if granted after,² or even within a period of 60 days before, liquidation. There was no fiduciary relation between the Company and the Bank; merely the relation of debtor and creditor. This was just the ordinary case of an uncompleted security, to which the Bank had no prior claim in a question with other creditors.³

Scotland v.
Liquidators
of Hutchison,
Main, & Co.,
Limited.

At advising on 29th November 1912,—

LORD SALVESSEN.—In this case the facts so far as material are fully narrated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary. The case turns on the effect of an agreement between the Bank and the Company under which, on the Bank surrendering moveables to the value of £2000 held by them in security, the Company undertook to procure a debenture or floating charge over the whole assets of their debtor, Mr F. A. Johnson, and so soon as the debenture reached their hands to make it available to the Bank as further and additional security for the repayment by the Company of their whole indebtedness to the Bank. This obligation was thus contingent on the Company obtaining the debenture in question, and so only pretable after such a debenture had been obtained. In point of fact the Company succeeded in making an agreement with F. A. Johnson, under which he undertook to execute a debenture for £17,000 in their favour, and this debenture was duly executed and delivered to the Company. The Company never refused to implement their agreement with the Bank, but a long time was occupied in adjusting the deeds by which the transaction was to be carried out, and before these had been completed the Company went into liquidation. The question is whether the liquidator can now be compelled to put the Bank in the same position as if they had obtained an assignation to the debenture prior to liquidation.

It was conceded by counsel for the Bank that if the obligation had related to a debenture or other property belonging to the Company the failure to complete the security before liquidation would have been fatal to the Bank's claim. It was argued, however, that a different principle applies where an obligation has been given to assign property belonging to

Nov. 29, 1912. a third party, and that the moment they, in fact, obtained possession of such property the debtors held it in trust for the creditors in the obligation, and that the liquidator could not take advantage of the insolvent Company's failure to implement their duty as trustees. Reference was made to various cases as supporting this proposition, and specially to a dictum of Lord Westbury in the case of Fleeming v. Howden.¹ In the course of his opinion Lord Westbury said: "An obligation to do an act with respect to property creates a trust, and if a fiar bound to fulfil an obligation acquires or retains by means of his neglect of that duty a greater estate than he would otherwise have had, he is a trustee of such excess of interest for the benefit of the persons who would have been entitled to it if the obligation had been duly fulfilled." This observation was made in a case where, while the formal title to landed property remained in the bankrupt, at the time of his death he held it under a condition to denude in favour of the next heir, and the ground of the decision was that the estate could only vest in the trustee under the sequestration subject to this condition. It must be read secundum subjectam materiam, and is no authority for the view that every obligation by a person to do an act with respect to property creates a trust which is not affected by the bankruptcy of the obligor. If it were otherwise the dictum is in direct opposition to numerous decisions in which it has been held that an obligation of a general kind to give security or to assign specific securities "at any time required," even although implemented before sequestration, is challengeable under the Bankruptcy Statutes if implemented within sixty days of sequestration.—*Tod & Hill's Trustee v. Union Bank*²; *Stiven v. Scott & Simson*³; Gourlay.⁴

It is unnecessary here to consider whether, if the debenture had been actually assigned to the Bank before liquidation, it would have created a good security in their favour. It is enough that the security had not been completed at that date, and that, apparently, not from any unwillingness on the part of the Company to grant it, but simply because of delays in adjusting the deeds for which the Bank was chiefly responsible. In the case of *Mansfield v. Walker's Trustees*⁵ we have an excellent illustration of the effect which sequestration has on the power of a bankrupt to deal with his property even in implement of an obligation undertaken long prior to the sixty days. Lord Brougham, while assuming that a person not yet bankrupt may do certain acts, which he had previously actually bound himself to do, during the period of sixty days within which bankruptcy operates retrospectively under the Act of 1696, yet decided that he has no power to do any act affecting his property after his legal existence as owner has altogether ceased. If, therefore, this had been the case of an unincorporated company it is plain that the Company could not after sequestration have granted an assignation of the debenture in favour of the Bank, even although, if they had done so at any time before sequestration, the assignation might have been good. I cannot see that in this respect there is any difference between sequestration and liquidation. It is true that the Company remains vested in its own assets, but the liquidator administers its whole affairs, and his duty is to distribute its assets substantially as they fall to be Nov. 29, 1912. distributed under the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, section 213). The other cases referred to, such as Watson,¹ Scotland v. Millar,² and Graeme's Trustee,³ are all cases where, while the formal title was in the bankrupt at the date of his sequestration, the beneficial interest in the property was already vested in the person who claimed to take it out of the sequestration, and were decided upon the footing that the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt tantum et tale as it stood vested in him. They have obviously no application to the facts here, for the debenture which the Company obtained from F. A. Johnson was beneficially vested in them at the date of the liquidation. No doubt they had undertaken a contractual obligation to assign this debenture to the Bank to the extent of some £14,000, but a contractual obligation is not equivalent to a trust, and while they might have been sued to implement it they could have conferred a valid title on any third party to whom they might have chosen to transfer it. I have therefore no difficulty in reaching the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, and substantially on the grounds which he has expressed more shortly.

On the other question, that the Bank, although no parties to the agreement between the Company and F. A. Johnson, had a jus quæsitum which entitled them to claim the benefit of the agreement to the extent of the bills referred to in the schedule, I also agree with the Lord Ordinary, and have nothing to add to the reasons which he has assigned.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion on both points. The reclaimers first maintained that the obligation, undertaken by Hutchison, Main, & Company, to obtain a debenture for £17,000 by F. A. Johnson over his assets, to be available to the reclaimers as security for £12,000 (afterwards alleged to have been increased to £14,000), was an inseparable part of a transaction, under which they parted with golf balls to the value of £2000 in exchange for the obligation in question. On this assumption, founding on the fact that Hutchison, Main, & Company actually got delivery of the debenture, although no assignation was ever executed, they assimilated the case to that of an agent, who, having received money for investment, and having invested it and obtained a bond or other security therefor, becomes bankrupt before the actual security writ is handed over. But, apart from the essential difference between the two cases, arising from the execution, in the one case, of a deed in favour of the creditor, and the absence of any such deed in the other, I do not think the averments of parties, read along with the documents produced, raise any such question. Both parties concur in stating (Answer 7 and Reply 7) that, when the reclaimers agreed to release the golf balls in favour of the British Linen Bank, they agreed to take "in lieu thereof" (these are the words both of reclaimers and respondents on record) bills for £3000 by Hutchison, Main, & Company on F. A. Johnson. No doubt, the reclaimers seem to allege, in Answer 11, that their surrender of the golf balls was on the faith of the arrangement, not only as to the bills for £3000 being handed to them, but

Nov. 29, 1912. also that they should obtain the debenture for £17,000 ; but this is denied by the respondents, who say, in reply, that "the security of the said debenture was not offered as a part of the arrangement concluded on 3rd February 1910 for the . . . transference of said goods to the British Linen Bank and the substitution of undiscounted bills in lieu thereof." I read the letter of 3rd February 1910, from the respondents' agents to the reclaimers' Glasgow manager, taken along with both parties' averments as to the antecedent arrangement about the surrender of the golf balls, and the absence of any reference to the golf balls and the substituted bills in the agreement No. 43 of process, in accordance with the view presented by the respondents.

Lord Guthrie.

But, even if the reclaimers' view of the arrangement is correct, their case seems to me to fail. I agree with Lord Salvesen that it cannot be supported by an unqualified application of the broad proposition, stated by Lord Westbury in Fleming v. Howden.¹ That is sufficiently clear from an admission made by the reclaimers. They did not dispute that they would have no case, if the obligation in question had related to property of the respondents' own. But, read literally, Lord Westbury's generalization would equally cover such a case. I may add, in reference to this admission of the reclaimers, that it seems to me that the elements of contingency and futurity, which are necessarily involved in such an obligation as the one in question, make the present case a fortiori of the one conceded by the reclaimers.

The respondents must bring up their case either to one of principal and agent or to one of fiduciary relation. Neither is averred on record, nor do the circumstances which are averred seem to me to involve, on principle or on authority, either the one case or the other. The relations were those of debtor and creditor, in which the creditors, instead of making their position immediately impregnable, chose, through their own fastidiousness about technicalities connected with the deed assigning the debenture actually in the hands of their debtors, to allow their opportunities to secure themselves by a completed security to pass.

On the question of jus quesitum, I think the Lord Ordinary was right in rejecting the reclaimers' claim. It was maintained that, although the reclaimers were not expressly named in the agreement No. 43 of process, their interests were sufficiently recognised by the reference in the preamble, and in article 5, to their bills set forth in the schedule. I think the respondents are right in their contention that the reference to these bills is merely for identification.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Your Lordships have so fully and clearly stated the circumstances in which this case arose, that I feel it unnecessary to recapitulate them. I concur in the opinions of your Lordships. To me it appears to be clear that at the date of the liquidation the debenture in question was still held by the Company, and that the Bank had no right to it, but had only a right to enforce a contract by which the Company was bound to assign the debenture to the Bank. Nothing can be more certain than that, in similar circumstances in the case of an individual becoming a bankrupt, a Nov. 29, 1912. company in the position of the Bank here could not possibly make good a preferential right on the subject as in this case, it being plainly an asset not made over while the person becoming bankrupt could do so legally to the prejudice of his other creditors. It lies upon the Bank to show that any different legal rule is to be applied where the insolvency is that of a limited company, as distinguished from a private individual or from a private firm. It is difficult to see that there can be any distinction in principle. The protection of the general body of creditors against non-completed preferences is as great in the case of a liquidation of a company unable to continue business from financial weakness as it is in the case of bankruptcy. No equitable or reasonable ground for a difference can be suggested, and none was pleaded so as to be even plausible. Having read your Lordships' opinions, I express my concurrence in the views expressed in them.

Repetition—Sale—Extent of subjects sold—Error in fact innocently induced by seller—Repetition of price—Interest.

Duncan,
Galloway, &
Co., Limited,
v. Duncan,
Falconer, &
Co.

In 1902, by a minute of sale, a firm of quarrymasters, who had a lease of a quarry, sold the goodwill of their business, their interest in the lease, and the buildings on the ground "in so far as belonging to" the sellers "or for which they are entitled to receive value or allowances at the termination of their occupancy." The sellers believed that certain buildings on the ground belonged to them or that they were entitled to receive allowances therefor at the termination of the lease, and they represented this to the purchasers. The purchasers accepted the representation without inquiry, the price of the buildings was adjusted by a valuator and paid accordingly, and the purchasers entered into, and continued in, possession of the whole subjects. At the termination of the purchasers' occupancy in 1908, it was ascertained that some of the buildings included in the valuation belonged to the landlord, and that nothing was payable to the tenants in respect thereof.

In an action at the instance of the purchasers against the sellers for repetition of the price paid for these buildings, held that the pursuers were entitled to repetition (with interest at 3 per cent from the date of payment), in respect that the money had been paid by the pursuers under an error in fact induced by the defenders.

On 17th March 1911 Duncan, Galloway, & Company, Limited, brought an action against Duncan, Falconer, & Company, quarrymasters, Arbroath, and James Wright and another, the individual partners of that firm, concluding for payment of £360, 14s. 8d., with interest at the rate of 5 per cent from 1st September 1902 until payment.

2D DIVISION.

quarrymasters carried on by the defenders at Carmyllie Quarries in Forfarshire; secundo, the tenants' part of the lease or leases held by them, whether written or verbal, current or held by tacit relocation, of (1) Carmyllie Quarries and pertinents thereof, (2) the farm of Slade and pertinents thereof, and (3) any other ground adjacent to the said quarries and farm, and all benefits of tenants under said lease or leases, or rights of occupancy, of the said quarries and farm; tertio, certain engines and machinery in or about said quarries; quarto, "the sheds, houses, and railways in, on, or about the said quarries, and all other railways used in connection therewith, in so far as belonging to" the defenders, "or for which they are entitled to receive value or allowances at the termination of their occupancy"; quinto, the crops, stocking, threshing-mill, and other articles on said farm and lands, so far as belonging to the defenders; and sexto, certain manufactured stones and quarried rock, all as these (primo to sexto inclusive) should exist at the close of 26th July 1902. The price of the subjects described under heads tertio and quarto was to be fixed by a referee, and was payable on 1st September 1902.

At the date of the agreement the defenders held the quarry and ground "with the houses and whole buildings on the premises" under a lease from Lord Dalhousie for nineteen years expiring at Martinmas 1880, after which the subjects were held from year to year by tacit relocation referable to the lease. After the sale the landlord agreed to accept the pursuers as tenants in room of the defenders, under the same conditions and stipulations, and the pursuers continued to occupy the subjects till 1908.

The parties averred;—(Cond. 5) "The houses and buildings sold to the pursuers by the defenders, under said head quarto of the agreement, included the following, viz.:—Double shed for facing machines, office, blacksmith's shop, tool furnace, and mechanic's shop, 61 feet by 17 feet, with grey slate roof. The defenders, at the time of the sale, represented to the pursuers that these subjects belonged to them, and a list of houses and buildings, including these subjects, was prepared by the defenders and submitted by them to the said George Anderson for valuation under said agreement as houses and buildings belonging to them and sold by them to the pursuers under said head quarto of the agreement. These houses and buildings were accordingly valued by him in terms of the remit to him under the agreement, and he fixed the price thereof, under said remit, at the sum of £320, 10s. This sum was paid by the pursuers to the defenders on 1st September 1902. Both pursuers and defenders were under the erroneous belief, at the dates of said sale and payments, that the defenders were owners of said buildings and others, and it was their intention that they should form part of the subjects sold. In any view, it was an implied condition of the contract between the parties that the defenders had a right to sell the said buildings and others. . . ." (Ans. 5) "Admitted that the defenders believed that they were entitled to be paid valuation for, or to remove, the buildings mentioned, and that they were pointed out to, and valued by, Mr Anderson on that footing. Quoad ultra denied." (Cond. 6) "Although the defenders believed that they were truly owners of said buildings and others set forth in condescendence 5, and represented to Mr Anderson (the valuator) and to the pursuers that they were owners thereof, said subjects were truly the property of the landlord and formed part of the subjects of which the pursuers obtained possession from the landlord under their lease. The defenders' said representations were unfounded in fact. The ownership of said subjects was never transferred by the defenders to the pursuers. The defenders also included in said valuation, as forming part of said houses and buildings and others referred to in head quarto of said agreement, a railway which connected the quarry workings with the Caledonian Railway Company's system, and they represented to the said valuator and to the pursuers that it was their own property and fell under the subjects sold to the pursuers under head quarto of the agreement. It was accordingly valued by the said George Anderson in terms of said remit. Said representation was unfounded in fact. The defenders, as well as the pursuers, were, at the dates of said sale and payment, in the erroneous belief that the portion of said railway, erroneously included, belonged to them. Only a part of said railway, which was valued as aforesaid, truly belonged to the defenders, the remaining portion, extending to 87 yards, having been the property of the Caledonian Railway Company, who claimed it successfully at the expiry of the pursuers' lease, in the knowledge and with the consent of the individual defenders, who were cognisant of, and participators in, the whole negotiations with reference to the ownership of said railway. The proportion of the price paid by the pursuers for the portion of the said railway, erroneously included among the subjects of sale, was £40, 4s. 8d., which sum was, under the bona fide belief on the pursuers' part, induced by the misrepresentations of the defenders that the whole of said railway belonged to them, paid by the pursuers to the defenders on 1st September 1902. . . ." (Ans. 6) "Admitted that the defenders believed that they were entitled to remove, or to be paid according to valuation for, the subjects mentioned. . . . Admitted that 79 yards or thereby of the railway, of the value of £36, 2s. 3d., belonged to the Caledonian Railway Company. Admitted that the valuation of said buildings and railway was paid or accounted for by the pursuers to the defenders. Quoad ultra denied. . . ." (Cond. 7) "At the expiry of the pursuers' lease in the year 1908, the said landlord claimed the main block of buildings and others at said quarries, being those specified in condescendence 5. . . . As a result of . . . negotiations, the landlord's claim to have always been owner of said buildings and others, and the claim of the railway company to have always been proprietor of a portion of the railway sold by the defenders as aforesaid were conceded both by the pursuers and by the defenders, without reservation. In point of fact, the claims of both the landlord and the railway company were well founded, and they were also entitled to prevent the removal of said buildings and erections by the pursuers, or anyone. Said buildings and erections were not severable trade fixtures, either at common law or by special contract." (Ans. 7) "Admitted that, on the expiry of the pursuers' tenancy in 1908, the landlord disputed his liability to pay valuation for the buildings mentioned in condescendence 5, that various meetings took place, and that the pursuers and the defenders ultimately conceded that he was not bound to pay valuation. Admitted that the pursuers and the defenders also conceded that the railway company owned part of the railway paid for by the pursuers. . . ." (Cond. 8) "The defenders thus never made good the obligation undertaken by them in said agreement to convey and deliver said buildings and erections and portion of said railway to the pursuers in ownership, and they are therefore in breach of contract, and Duncan, Falconer, & Co. liable in damages for such breach, or otherwise to make repetition of the price paid by the pursuers for these subjects. The pursuers have suffered loss, injury, and damage in consequence thereof to the extent of said sum of £360, 14s. 8d., with the interest thereof as aforesaid. . . ."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having broken their contract with the pursuers, are liable in damages for the breach. (2) The pursuers having suffered loss, injury, and damages to the extent sued for, in consequence of the defenders' said breach of contract, decree should be granted as concluded for. (3) It having been an implied condition on the part of the defenders in the contract of sale founded on that the defenders had right to sell the subjects condescended on, and the defenders having failed to implement said conditions, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (4) Separatim, the said buildings and others, and portion of railway, having been included in the subjects of sale, and the pursuers having paid the price of the same to the defenders, and the said subjects not having been conveyed or delivered to the pursuers, they are entitled to repetition of the price, with interest. (5) The defences, other than the defence proponed in plea 4 for the defenders, are irrelevant and ought to be repelled.

At the debate on the reclaiming note the pursuers added by amendment the following plea;—(6) The pursuers are entitled to repetition, with interest as concluded for, of the sum paid by them to the defenders as the price of the subjects specified in the condescendence in respect that—(1) The defenders represented to the pursuers that the said subjects fell to be included in the sale by the defenders to the pursuers contracted for by articles first (quarto) of the agreement of 17th July 1902. (2) The pursuers paid said price to the defenders on the faith of, and under error induced by, the said representation. (3) The said representation was untrue, and the said subjects were not made over by the defenders to the pursuers.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (4) In any event, the sum sued for is excessive. Et separatim the pursuers are not entitled to interest before Martinmas 1908.

On 31st January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) after hearing parties in the procedure-roll, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the fourth plea in law for the pursuers: Decerns against the defenders, conjointly and severally, for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £356, 12s. 3d. in full of the conclusion of the summons, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent from 1st September 1902; finds the defenders liable to the pursuers in expenses, and remits," &c.*

* "OPINION.—By agreement of purchase and sale, dated 17th July 1902, the pursuers purchased from the defenders the goodwill of the business of quarrymasters, carried on by the latter at Carmyllie Quarries in Forfarshire; the tenants' rights in certain leases; and also [Art. 1 (4)], 'the sheds, houses, and railways, in, on, or about the said quarries, and all other railways used in connection therewith, in so far as belonging to' the defenders, 'or for which they were entitled to receive value or allowances at the termination of their occupancy.' The amount to be paid by the pursuers was, in terms of article 4 of the agreement, fixed by arbitration, and the price paid. Both parties to the agreement were under the belief that all the subjects so valued and paid for belonged to the defenders, or, at all events,

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 5th and 6th November 1912. Nov. 29, 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) The ground of the pursuers' action as originally laid was breach of contract. This was untenable, because the defenders never contracted to sell the buildings and railway in question. Even if the defenders had possessed the right to remove the buildings, they could not have sold them until the landlord's claims were satisfied.¹ But they had not even that right; the buildings were not within the description of the subjects sold, and the property in them never passed to the pursuers. The pursuers had no claim for indemnity in respect of eviction—the only remedy for breach of warrandice²—since the pursuers could not be evicted from subjects which were never conveyed to them. Pari ratione the pursuers had no claim in respect of the defenders' failure to deliver the subjects, since the subjects were never for sale. The pursuers now

Duncan,
Galloway, &
Co., Limited,
v. Duncan,
Falconer &
Co.

that they were entitled to receive allowances therefor on the termination of their occupation of the subjects. This was not in fact the case. The pursuers' tenancy expired in 1908, and it was then found that certain of these subjects belonged to the landlords, and that part of the railway belonged to the Caledonian Railway Company. In the present action the pursuers seek to recover from the defenders the amounts so paid by them.

"The defenders maintain that the pursuers are not entitled to repetition, because both parties were in error upon a question of law. They contend that the subjects of sale, under article 1 (4) of the agreement, were the tenants' rights in the buildings situated on the ground contained in the leases that were being assigned, and that the purchaser took the risk of what might be found in law to belong to the tenants. I do not think this view of the agreement is sound. It appears to me that the defenders sold certain subjects pointed out to the valuator as being the tenants' property. In my view, therefore, the sale so effected involved warrandice that the subjects belonged to the defenders, or at all events, that they had a claim for their value on the termination of occupancy.

"The defenders, however, maintain that the agreement must be interpreted as a whole, and that, as there is no case of fraud, the pursuers can only recover by setting aside the whole agreement, which is now impossible, as restitution cannot be made. In this connection they found upon the second part of the first clause, which deals with the payment of £70 for the tenants' right in the leases. They maintain that the amount so fixed would, or might, have been different if parties had known that the subjects for the price of which repetition is now claimed did not belong to the defenders. I do not think this argument is sound, because it appears to me that the subjects covered by the 4th subclause of article 1 of the agreement are severable from the other subjects dealt with. In a case of sale, indemnification falls to be made where there is partial, just as where there is total, eviction.

"The question of the extent to which the pursuers ought to be indemnified falls to be considered. The pursuers ask for repetition of the money paid by them, with interest upon the amount so paid at the rate of 5 per cent from 1st September 1902 until paid. It was strongly argued for the defenders that the pursuers would be fully indemnified by receiving payment of the value of the buildings as at Martinmas 1908. That is all, they say, that the pursuers would have got if the defenders had imple-maintained—as stated in the plea added by amendment—that the price had been paid in error, and that they were entitled to repetition. Admittedly there had been error, shared in by both parties, but it was an error in law, as to the legal rights of the defenders under the lease, and this did not support a claim for repetition.¹ Even if it fell to be regarded as an error in fact, the pursuers were barred from claiming repetition, since they had the means of ascertaining the truth before concluding the transaction.¹ The contract must be read as a whole, and as restitutio in integrum was now impossible, the loss should be allowed to rest where it had fallen. (2) If the pursuers had a claim at all, it was not to repetition of the price, but only to indemnification for the loss they had sustained, and the measure of this was the value of the buildings at the termination of the pursuers' occupancy in 1908. Up to that date they had continued to possess the subjects, and all that they lost was the price which they would have got from the landlord for the buildings if they had in fact been included in the sale, as both mented the terms of the agreement of 1902. In the ordinary case of eviction the subjects are valued as at the date of eviction, but this rule is by no means universal, as is seen from the case of Cairns, (1870) 9 Macph. 284, where the purchaser was found entitled to repetition of the price paid, on accounting for the rents drawn by him during the period of possession. In the course of his judgment the Lord Justice-Clerk said: 'The inclination of my opinion is that warrandice in the contract of sale implies an obligation in the case of eviction to render back the price for which no equivalent was given, whatever further claims it may confer upon the purchaser.' That statement was not the ground of judgment, but the case shows that repayment of the price may be the proper means of indemnification where the purchaser has to have recourse against the seller under warrandice, express or implied. In the present case I think that there ought to be repetition of the price paid by the pursuers to the defenders for the subjects which were erroneously valued in 1902.

"It remains for me to deal with the question whether the pursuers are or are not entitled to interest upon this amount. The considerations and arguments dealing with claims for interest are to be found, as Lord Shaw said in the recent case of Greenock Harbour Trustees v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 49, stated with compendious accuracy in the judgment of Lord Fraser in the case of Blair's Trustees v. Payne, &c., (1884) 12 R. 104. It is there pointed out that interest, in the absence of express stipulation, is due upon money lent. This rule would appear equally to apply where money has been paid in error, and the use thereof has been enjoyed by one not otherwise entitled thereto. Against this it was said that the pursuers had had possession of the subjects they erroneously thought they were purchasing, and that the use of the subjects might be set against the interest claimed. If possession had been due to the defenders I should have given effect to this plea, but, for the period, at all events, after the termination of the first year of their tenancy, the possession of the pursuers is traceable to the landlords and not to the defenders. To some extent it may have been different at the beginning of their possession, because they had to make arrangement with the defenders as to acquiring the tenants' interest under the lease. I do not think, however, that I can exclude the claim for interest, but, in the whole circumstances of the case, I shall limit it to 3 per cent. If parties are agreed that the sum sued for represents the amount paid by the pursuers in respect of the property erroneously valued, as to which the error to which I have referred existed, I shall give decree therefor, with interest at 3 per cent from the date of payment."

parties believed them to be. The case of Cairns v. Howden,¹ referred Nov. 29, 1912, to by the Lord Ordinary, was a case of eviction, and had no application in the circumstances of this case. The action should be dismissed as irrelevant; or, alternatively, proof should be allowed of the value of the buildings as at 1908.

Duncan,
Galloway, &
Co., Limited,
v. Duncan,
Falconer &
Co.

Argued for the respondents;—The Lord Ordinary had come to a right conclusion, and on the right ground. This was a typical case of property sold and not delivered. The pursuers' case might also be presented as a condictio indebiti. The price of the buildings had been paid by the pursuers under the error, induced by the defenders, that they were included in the subjects of sale. In these circumstances the pursuers were entitled to repetition of the price.² They were also entitled to interest on the price since the date of payment. The defenders could not set off possession of the buildings against interest on the price, since after Martinmas 1902 the pursuers held from the landlord and not from the defenders.

At advising on 29th November 1912,—

LORD SALVESSEN.—In this case I have come to be of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has reached a sound conclusion, although I do not altogether agree with him in the grounds of his judgment. He has sustained the fourth plea in law for the pursuers, which proceeds upon the footing that the buildings, the price of which the pursuers now seek to recover from the defenders, were included in the subjects of sale under the agreement made between the parties of 17th July 1902. On referring to the agreement, however, I am quite clear that they were not so included. Under head Quarto of the first article the defenders sold to the pursuers the sheds, houses, and railways in or about the quarries, but they did so only "in so far as belonging to the parties of the first part [the defenders], or for which they are entitled to receive value or allowances at the termination of their occupancy." Now, it is common ground that the buildings, &c., of which the price is in question, although believed by the parties to fall under this clause did not in fact do so, as they were the property of the landlord, and there was no agreement with him that the tenants should receive any allowances in respect of them when their lease terminated. The legal position of the matter, therefore, was that the pursuers were entitled to enforce the agreement in every respect, but were not liable to pay for these buildings. What actually happened was that the defenders represented to the pursuers that these buildings were their property, and they were valued in terms of the fourth article of the agreement, and paid for accordingly. The true ground of action, therefore, was that the price had been paid under an error in fact, induced by the defenders' innocent misrepresentations, and this has now for the first time been embodied in a plea in law which we allowed the pursuers to add to their record.

I think there are sufficient materials upon record to enable us to sustain this new plea and to give effect to it by ordaining the defenders to repay the sum sued for (subject to the small deduction to which the Lord Ordinary Nov. 29, 1912. has already given effect). The case falls within the principles laid down in *Balfour*¹ and the Dalmellington Iron Company.² In the former case the Lord President (Ingria) said: "It is quite true that a party having made a payment in error must, before he can recover, show that the error was not induced by his own fault, but was due to adverse circumstances or to the proceedings of the other party." The facts admitted here bring the case within the last of these alternatives. The defenders represented in good faith that the buildings in question fell under head Quarto of the first article of the agreement, and this representation was accepted without inquiry and acted on by the pursuers, and it was not until their own lease terminated that they discovered their error. In the second case cited it was held that the pursuers were entitled to repetition, although information was in the possession of their manager which would have enabled him at the time to have discovered the mistake, for this information was not present in fact to his mind at the time of payment, and was not of such a character that it ought to have been present. Here all that can be said is, that, if the pursuers had taken legal advice and had studied the lease which they took over, they might have discovered that stone and lime buildings erected on the ground of which they were tenants were in law the property of the landlord, and that, apart from agreement, they could have no claim to an allowance from him at the termination of the lease. There is no suggestion that they actually knew they were paying for subjects for which they were not liable, and they might quite well have thought that there was some collateral agreement under which the landlord recognised the defenders' right to these buildings, which had been erected by their authors, and had agreed to take them over at valuation. On this ground I think that a clear case for repetition of the price is made out.

In this view it becomes unnecessary to consider what would have been the position if the defenders had actually professed to sell subjects which did not belong to them. Mr Chree's main argument proceeded on the assumption that there had been a sale of heritage of which the pursuers had obtained possession, and from which six years later they had been evicted by the true owner. As I have already pointed out there was no such sale so far as the buildings in question are concerned, and while the possession of the subjects might be attributed to the defenders' lease until its expiry a few months later, from the time tacit relocation took place the pursuers owed their right of occupation entirely to the act of the landlord in permitting the lease to be renewed. But the defenders' rights under the lease were transferred under head Secundo of article 1 of the agreement, and for these rights the parties contracted that £70 should be paid by the pursuers. It is nothing to the purpose that the pursuers have been fortunate enough to induce the landlord to take over at valuation certain workmen's houses which under the lease itself they were entitled to erect and to remove before the expiry of the lease. If these subjects fall under head Secundo they have already been paid for; if, on the other hand, they fell under head Quarto a claim might conceivably arise at the instance of the defenders against the pursuers, on the footing that they were never valued, and that they are still entitled to an allowance in respect of them. Having Nov. 29, 1912.

 in view the conduct of the parties themselves I cannot regard this as a very hopeful claim, but in any event it does not affect the right of the pursuers Duncan, to repetition of the price of other subjects for which they paid under a Co., Limited, mistake induced by the defenders' representations. v. Duncan, Falconer, &
 Co.

On the question of interest I was at first disposed to think that it would have been more equitable that no interest should be allowed except from Lord Salvesen.
 the date when the error was discovered, on the footing that the pursuers enjoyed possession of the subjects until that time without having paid extra rent for them. I am unable, however, to resist the view of the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuers' possession of these subjects was in law attributable not to the defenders but to the landlord, and that therefore the claim for interest is well founded at the moderate rate at which the Lord Ordinary has assessed it, and to which the pursuers offer no objection.
 I cannot, however, refrain from thinking that the case would never have reached us if the pursuers had pleaded their case properly upon record, for there is not one of the pleas, as they originally stood before the amendment, that I could have given effect to. The two first are based on breach of contract, which is obviously out of the question, and the third and fourth on the view that the buildings in question formed parts of the subjects sold under the contract, and that therefore it was implied that the sellers had a good title to them. The real ground of action is sufficiently averred upon record, but was not expressed in any plea, and the argument which was maintained with much plausibility by the defenders would not,
 I think, have been stateable except on this view. I propose that we should penalise the pursuers by finding neither party entitled to expenses in the Inner House, and quoad ultra that we should affirm the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, with the variation that we sustain the sixth instead of the fourth plea in law for the pursuers.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. The reclaimers presented an unanswerable argument against the Lord Ordinary's judgment, in so far as it sustains the fourth plea in law for the pursuers. That plea proceeds on the footing that the buildings and part railway in question were included in the subjects of sale by the defenders to the pursuers. But what was sold under the fourth article of the agreement of 17th July 1902 was only buildings and railways "in so far as belonging to" the defenders, or for which they were entitled to receive value, or allowances, at the termination of their occupancy. Now, it is common ground that the buildings and part railway in question were neither the property of the defenders, nor were the defenders entitled to receive value, or allowances, for them from the landlord, at the termination of their occupancy. The case has been put on a proper basis by the new plea, Plea 6, tendered by the respondents at the end of the discussion before us, and for which, fortunately for them, there are sufficient averments on record. In view of the late period at which this plea was added, I think Lord Salvesen's proposal as to the expenses of the Inner House discussion will do justice between the parties.

In sustaining the respondents' new plea, we negative the contention on the merits which was strongly urged by the reclaimers, namely, that the

Nov. 29, 1912. error being one of law, in an erroneous construction of the contract, or in an erroneous application of its scope, the pursuers are without remedy, or, alternatively, this remedy is limited to what their rights would have been had the defenders fulfilled their contract. I concur with Lord Salvesen in thinking that, whatever the source of the error may have been in the case of the reclaimers, the respondents' error was purely one of fact. The Lord Guthrie. question, left unascertained in the fourth article, as to which buildings and railways did and which did not belong to the defenders, and which buildings and railways they were entitled to receive value or compensation for, was one in the knowledge of the reclaimers. They pointed out the buildings, and the part railway, to which this case relates, to the valuator, as in the one category or the other, and the respondents had no reason to suspect that they were mistaken in their selection.

The other main argument for the reclaimers, founded on the alleged impossibility of separating the fourth article from the other provisions of the agreement, proceeds on the same fallacious view. The respondents' success does not depend on any attack on the terms of article 4. What they are complaining of is the erroneous way in which the reclaimers applied that article.

On the question of interest, I think the Lord Ordinary has taken the right course, although, had he given five instead of three per cent, I should not have felt inclined to disturb his judgment.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Refuse the reclaiming note: Adhere to the said interlocutor [of 31st January 1912] reclaimed against with this variation: Recall the said interlocutor in so far as it sustains the fourth plea in law for the pursuers, and in lieu thereof sustain the sixth plea in law for the pursuers, and decern: Find no expenses due to or by either party since said 31st January 1912."

JAMES ALEXANDER DONALD, Petitioner (Respondent).—

Nov. 29, 1912.

ALEXANDER DONALD, Objector (Appellant).—Morison, K.C.—Aitchison.

Donald v.
Donald.

Sheriff—Process—Challenge of validity of will ope exceptionis—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), First Schedule, Rule 50—"Cause"—Petition.

Rule 50 of the First Schedule to the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, enacts :—"When a deed or writing is founded on by any party in a cause, all objections thereto may be stated and maintained by way of exception, without the necessity of bringing a reduction thereof."

In a petition in the Sheriff Court, under sec. 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, for completion of title to lands belonging to a deceased person by his heir-at-law, objections were lodged by the executor and general donee of the deceased under a will executed by him. The petitioner in answer sought to set aside the will, averring that it had been impetrated by the objector from the deceased by fraud and circumvention. Nov. 29, 1912.

Held that, notwithstanding the terms of Rule 50, the will could not, even so far as constituting a bar to the granting of the petition, be competently set aside by way of exception in that process; and process sisted to allow the petitioner to bring an action of reduction. Donald v. Donald.

Observed by Lord Salvesen:—"I think it must be implied in Rule 50 that the objection which may be stated and maintained by way of exception is one which the Sheriff can finally dispose of, and that his judgment will supersede the necessity of bringing a reduction of the deed challenged."

Held, further, that the petition and answers constituted a "cause" within the meaning of Rule 50.

In April 1912 James Alexander Donald, Glasgow, presented a petition under section 10 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874,* for completion of his title to certain lands. The lands were the property of Alexander Donald (hereinafter referred to as Alexander Donald primus), who died on 18th October 1911 without having taken infirmament. 2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirling, Dum-barton, and Clackmannan.

A minute of objections to the petition was lodged by Alexander Donald (hereinafter referred to as Alexander Donald secundus), Hardgate, Duntocher, who stated that under the will of Alexander Donald primus, dated 17th October 1911, he was appointed executor-nominate and general donee; that as such general donee he had been confirmed executor-dative by the Sheriff at Dumbaron; that he had entered into possession and management of the deceased's estate; that he was in right of the whole heritable property which belonged to the deceased at his death; and that in the circumstances the petitioner had no right or title to make or insist in his application, which should accordingly be dismissed.

The petitioner lodged answers and a statement of facts in which he alleged that the will founded on by the objector had been impetrated by him from the deceased, while weak and facile, by fraud and circumvention, in circumstances upon which he condescended in detail.

The objector pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (4) Reduction ope exceptionis being incompetent in the present proceedings, the prayer of the petition should be refused, with expenses.

The petitioner pleaded;—(1) No title to object. (2) The said pretended settlement having been impetrated from the deceased while he was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon, by the fraud and circumvention of the objector, to the lesion of the said deceased Alexander Donald and his heir-at-law, should be set aside ope exceptionis. (3) The deceased Alexander Donald at the date of the granting of the said alleged settlement having been incapable of giving instructions as to the disposal of his means and estate, the said pretended settlement should be reduced and set aside ope exceptionis, with expenses.

On 10th July 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Macdiarmid) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the pleas in law for the objector and the first plea in law for the petitioner: Finds the answers relevant: Allows parties a proof of their respective averments relative to the will dated 17th October 1911, the petitioner to lead."

The objector, Alexander Donald secundus, appealed to the Court of Nov. 29, 1912. Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 29th and 30th October 1912.

Donald v.
Donald.

Argued for the objector;—The question of the validity of the will could not competently be dealt with in the present process. Rule 50 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907,¹ did not apply, for none of the conditions of the rule had been satisfied. What the objector really relied on was not the will, but his decree of confirmation thereunder, and a decree of Court was not a “deed or writing” within the meaning of the rule.² Nor was the present process a “cause.” It was a mere administrative proceeding instituted under, and still regulated by, section 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874,³ and the special code of procedure prescribed by the Titles to Land Act, 1868,⁴ section 27 and following sections. The rules of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, which expressly applied to “procedure in the ordinary Court,” had no application to such a proceeding as this, and that fact was expressly recognised by Rule 1. Further, neither Rule 50 in the Act of 1907 nor section 11 of the Act of 1877,⁵ which it re-enacted, made reduction competent in the Sheriff Court.⁶ It was obviously inconvenient to entertain objections to the validity of a will otherwise than by way of a reduction, for a reduction would be res judicata against all parties, while a decision in this process would not be binding on anyone except the parties thereto. The provisions of Rule 50 applied only where a document such as a receipt or a discharge was produced in evidence.⁷ It must be a document the validity of which could be considered and determined by the Sheriff in the cause before him. It was impossible to determine the validity of a will in the absence of all the beneficiaries and other parties interested in reducing or maintaining it. In any case, in a petition for service under section 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, the validity, as distinct from the construction, of a will was not a question which could competently be determined.⁸

Argued for the petitioner;—The terms of Rule 50 were very wide and perfectly unambiguous. They admitted of no doubt that the validity of the will could be questioned in the present process, at any rate to the effect of enabling the Sheriff to disregard it as an answer to the petition. The will was a “deed or writing,” and it was the will which was the basis of the objection, not the confirmation.⁹ The case of *Leggat Brothers v. Gray*¹⁰ had therefore no application. The will was “founded on” by the objector, because it was the foundation of his case. It was none the less “founded on” because it was produced in answer to the petitioner’s claim.¹¹ Rule 50 was not limited to deeds produced in evidence, for such deeds could be objected to ope exceptionis at common law and apart from statute.¹²

Further, the present process was a "cause." "Cause" was equivalent to "action," which included every civil proceeding competent in the ordinary Sheriff Court,¹ and had been held to include a petition for cessio.² The word "cause" was used in the same sense in section 39 of the Act of 1907, and in Rules 65 and 68. A note of any evidence led would be taken under section 33 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868. The proviso in Rule 1 of the Act of 1907 merely affected the form of the initial writ, and did not alter the nature of the process or exclude it from being a "cause." This was not a mere administrative proceeding, but corresponded to the old inquest before a jury. The whole of the conditions under Rule 50 being thus satisfied, it followed that the rule applied to the present case, and that an action of reduction was unnecessary. The same view had been taken on a construction of the corresponding section of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1877.³ The objector could adduce no argument except the argument from convenience, and that was irrelevant where, as here, the terms of the statute were clear and unambiguous. In any case, it was well recognised that a deed might in certain circumstances be set aside or disregarded for some purposes without being reduced for all purposes, and it was not necessary that all the parties having an interest under the deed should be convened in the process.⁴

Nov. 29, 1912.
Donald v.
Donald.

At advising on 29th November 1912,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—[After narrating the facts]—In this petition the question is raised whether the title produced by Alexander Donald, viz., the settlement already referred to, can be set aside by way of exception without the petitioner taking steps to have it set aside in a proper process of reduction. Both parties stated pleas of objection to the opposite party's title, and the Sheriff-substitute has repelled those pleas, and has allowed the parties a proof of their averments.

Objection was taken to the petition as not being a "cause," but this objection seems to me to be ill-founded. I cannot hold that the petition is not an "action," and if an "action" then it is a "cause." Under the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, action is defined as including "every civil proceeding competent in the ordinary Sheriff Court" (section 3). I have therefore no doubt that this objection is unsound. Further, it appears to me that the contention that Rules 50 and 51 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, cannot be grafted on to the procedure prescribed in the Titles to Land Act, 1868 (section 27 et seq.), applicable to petitions under section 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, is erroneous. The objection is also taken that as confirmation has been obtained on the settlement the petitioner is endeavouring to set aside a decree of Court. I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that this contention is unsound. It is the will that is challenged, and the case of *Leggat Brothers*⁵ has no application.

But although I hold that these contentions of the objector, as he is called

² Crozier v. Macfarlane & Co., (1878) 5 R. 936.

⁴ Dickson v. Carter, 5 R. 1023; Nivison v. Howat, (1883) 11 R. 182.

⁵ 1912 S. C. 230.

Nov. 29, 1912. in the process, cannot receive effect, it is a different and separate question whether the petitioner, whose right to be infest as heir-at-law is challenged by the production of the settlement cutting down his title, can in this process be allowed to challenge that settlement by way of exception, on the ground that being a "deed or writing" it can be dealt with as falling within the scope of Rules 50 and 51 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907. The Sheriff-substitute has held that the will itself can be set aside in this process. In that I cannot agree with him. The purpose of allowing documents produced in a process to be set aside ope exceptionis was to prevent unnecessary complications and delays in procedure when adminicles of evidence were put forward, and their genuineness or validity was challenged, as for example in a question where a claim for payment was met by the production of a receipt. Here the attack which is made is upon a document which is not merely a piece of evidence but is the very foundation of the defence set up by the objector to the petitioner's being declared infest. If allowed and successful it would not and could not be res judicata in other proceedings. That being so, it is evident that the rules of the Act, which were intended to simplify procedure and prevent delays, might, and indeed would, if applied to the setting aside of the settlement in this particular proceeding, lead to complication, trouble, and expense rather than to the facilitating of procedure. The contention of the petitioner here would practically set aside the law by which reduction is not competent in the Sheriff Court, for it is plain enough that if the contention to which the Sheriff-substitute has given effect were sound, every debtor, when sued by an executor, could have a trial for setting aside the executor's title, and practically there might be a succession of inquiries in different Sheriffdoms. It is, I think, plain that no such thing was intended by the Legislature, and although the rule has been in operation for nearly half a century no such thing has ever occurred.

In my opinion the law by which documents may be set aside ope exceptionis in the course of proceedings—which has been most beneficial in its operation—was never intended, and is not in the enactments so expressed as, to apply to a document forming the basis of a party's alleged right of action or the basis of a defence against an attack on title, in neither of which cases could a decision on exception have any effect beyond the then proceeding litigation. It could not invalidate the document. The statutory change in the law was intended to enable a Judge, even in the inferior Court, to take out of the way what might be brought forward in a process, so as to exclude it from being of weight in the proceeding before him. The intention was to enable the Judge to purge out what might be produced to affect his mind, if, for instance, it could be shown that the deed was not what it bore to be, or was invalid for want of formalities in signature, or was vitiated by erasure. It was never intended to give the power to consider questions of weakness and facility in the case of a will or settlement, which would be setting up a different process inside a process, a course which would have the very opposite effect from the intention of the statute—namely, to simplify procedure.

It appears to me that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute should be recalled, and that procedure in the case should be sisted to admit of the petitioner, if so advised, taking proceedings in the proper Court to have the Nov. 29, 1912, settlement in question brought to the test of reduction.

Donald v.
Donald.

LORD SALVESSEN.—This is an application presented under the Titles to Land Act, 1868, and the Conveyancing Act of 1874 in which the petitioner asks the Sheriff to find that certain facts are proved with regard to his relationship to the deceased Alexander Donald, and that he is entitled to procure himself infest in two heritable properties, belonging to the deceased but to which he had only a personal right. The petition was presented in the knowledge that the respondent is executor-nominate and general disponee of Alexander Donald under a will dated 17th October 1911, which is ex facie regular, and that he had been confirmed as such by the Sheriff of the county of Dumbarton. The petitioner is fully aware that standing the will in question he has no title at all to present the petition, and accordingly he challenges the validity of the will in the present process. He makes averments which the Sheriff-substitute has held to be relevant, to the effect that at the date of executing the will the deceased was weak and facile, and that it was impetrated from him by the respondent. The interesting question of procedure is whether it is competent in a process of this kind to set aside the will so far as it constitutes a bar to the granting of the crave of the petition. The Sheriff-substitute has held, although with some hesitation, that it is competent, and has accordingly allowed parties a proof of their respective averments relative to the will dated 17th October 1911, the petitioner to lead. It is this judgment which has been brought under review.

It was conceded by the petitioner's counsel that an action of reduction of a will cannot competently be brought in the Sheriff Court, but reliance is put upon Rule 50 of the First Schedule to the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, which is in these terms: "When a deed or writing is founded on by any party in a cause all objections thereto may be stated and maintained by way of exception without the necessity of bringing a reduction thereof." This rule, which has the force of statute, only slightly differs from section 11 of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1877, the terms of which I quote for the purpose of comparison: "When in any action competent in the Sheriff Court a deed or writing is founded on by either party, all objections thereto may be stated and maintained by way of exception, without the necessity of bringing a reduction thereof." The argument for the petitioner to which the Sheriff-substitute has given effect is that the will in question is a "deed or writing," that the petition is a "cause" within the meaning of the rule, and that the will is founded on by a party in that cause. It is therefore maintained that the course which the Sheriff-substitute has sanctioned is expressly within Rule 50, and that, whatever inconvenience may result in any particular cause from the application of the rule, the Act of Parliament must be given effect to.

The objector's counsel argued that the petitioner was in effect trying to set aside the decree of confirmation, and that it was decided in the case of *Leggat Brothers*¹ that this is incompetent ope exceptionis, as a decree of

Nov. 29, 1912. Court is not a "deed or writing" within the meaning of Rule 50. I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in rejecting this argument. What the petitioner is challenging is not the decree but the probative will on which it proceeds, and that a will regularly executed is a deed I think it is impossible to deny. Then again it was maintained that the rule applies only to actions in the ordinary Court of the Sheriff, and that a proceeding for completion of title is not an action in the ordinary Court. On this point also I am against the objector. The word "cause," although not defined by the statute, must, I think, be held to be equivalent to "action," and an action is defined as including every proceeding competent in the ordinary Sheriff Court. The very fact that Rule 1 exempts petitions like the present from the provision that they shall be commenced by initial writ appears to me to imply that the procedure otherwise shall be regulated by the First Schedule except in so far as it is prescribed by the statutes mentioned. No doubt it is a point in favour of the objector that there is no provision for making up a proper record in a petition for completion of title as there is in an ordinary Sheriff Court action, and that the Sheriff is entitled to dispose of the case summarily. Prima facie it would seem very inconvenient to try the validity of a will in an action where it was not imperative to have articulate statements as to the grounds on which it was attacked, and answers thereto. I am, however, unable to resist the view that this petition is a proceeding in the ordinary Sheriff Court as distinguished from the Small-Debt Court, or to find any substantial distinction between the meaning of the words "cause" and "action."

There remains, however, the question whether the will is founded on by a party in the cause within the meaning of Rule 50. In my opinion it is not. The object of section 11 of the former Act of 1877 and of Rule 50 was, I take it, to prevent a multiplication of procedure, and the cases in which it has been most frequently applied are where claims have been made which the defender pleads have been discharged under a writing which he produces. Such a receipt or discharge may no doubt be set aside by way of exception, but it is not, as Lord Moncreiff pointed out in the case of Neil v. M'Nair,¹ the foundation of the process, or, as here, the entire basis of the defence. Nor has it ever been held that section 11 or Rule 50 applies where the judgment of the Sheriff cannot be res judicata as to the validity of the deed or writing, or where the interests of other parties who are not parties to the cause, and cannot be compelled to appear, are concerned. I think it must be implied in Rule 50 that the objection which may be stated and maintained by way of exception is one which the Sheriff can finally dispose of, and that his judgment will supersede the necessity of bringing a reduction of the deed challenged. If it were otherwise, instead of obviating procedure, the section would have the effect of multiplying it. It so happens that in the present case the only person who is interested in maintaining the will is the objector; but a finding by the Sheriff in this action adverse to him as to the validity of the will would not prevent him recovering the moveable estate from persons indebted to the deceased, and there might conceivably be as many attempts to set aside the will as there were actions raised against debtors to the estate. Nov. 29, 1912.

The importance of this is all the more apparent from the consideration that, by section 45 of the 1907 Act, Rule 50 is applicable to small-debt procedure. Donald v. Donald.

A person who, like the objector, is general donee and executor of a deceased person might have to face a challenge of the will in his favour in every small-debt action by means of which he sought to ingather the estate, and, as the Sheriff sitting in the Small-Debt Court is final, different judgments might be pronounced. The unfortunate executor, however, would have no means of silencing once and for all challenges of this nature, for I have never heard of an action of declarator being raised to declare that a will duly executed, and on which confirmation has proceeded in favour of the executor-nominate, was a valid title of administration. The result of sustaining the Sheriff's judgment would be, that, while an action of reduction of the will itself is admittedly incompetent in the Sheriff Court, what amounts to a partial reduction of it might be granted in any number of actions which the executor was compelled to raise with a view to the due administration of the estate, or in which he was sued by persons who laid claim to some part of the deceased's estate, to which, but for the will, they would be entitled. The difficulties are further increased if we conceive of the common case in which the executor or trustee is not himself beneficially interested in the estate, but where there are a number of legatees or beneficiaries. In an application such as the present the will might in fact be set aside so as to oust the true beneficiaries of the heritage without their having an opportunity of maintaining its validity. I think the Legislature did not contemplate any consequences so extraordinary and anomalous, but what it did contemplate was the production of a document in the course of a process the validity of which could be effectively determined in that process as between the only persons interested, and where such determination would obviate once and for all the necessity of an action of reduction.

On these grounds, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the Sheriff-substitute has erred, and that we ought to recall the interlocutor appealed from. The objector expressed his willingness that an opportunity should be given to the petitioner, if so advised, to raise an action of reduction in a competent Court, and expressed his consent to the present action being sisted until it was seen whether the petitioner was prepared to take advantage of this opportunity. That proposal appears to me to be reasonable, and I think we ought to sist this process for a fortnight in order to give the petitioner such an opportunity.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against; sist process to allow the petitioner, if so advised, to raise an action in any competent Court to reduce the trust-settlement alleged to have been granted by the deceased Alexander Donald; sist process accordingly for fourteen days from this date, and continue the cause."

Melville v.
Adamson.Election Law—Lodger franchise—Procedure—Failure of claimant to appear after citation by objector—Discretionary power of Sheriff to refuse adjournment and admit claim.

A person on the county register of voters for the current year as a lodger claimed to be entered on the roll for the ensuing year in respect of his occupancy of the same lodgings. His claim was opposed, though no specific objection was stated to it; and he was cited to appear at the Registration Court, but was not present. The agent of the objector moved for an adjournment in order that the claimant might be cited of new, but admitted that he was unable to state any change of circumstances with regard to the claim, or any new facts not before the Court when the claimant was formerly admitted.

Held that the Sheriff was entitled, in the exercise of his discretion, to refuse the adjournment and admit the claim.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Mackenzie.
Lord
Skerrington.

At a Registration Court for the Eastern Division of the county of Perth, held at Perth on 2nd October 1912, David Adamson junior, Adylinn, Newton Street, Blairgowrie, claimed to be entered upon the Register of Voters for the division as a lodger in respect of his occupation of a bedroom at that address.

The Sheriff (Johnston) admitted the claim and, at the request of the objector, Lawrence Melville, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"The claimant was upon the Roll for the current year as a lodger in respect of occupation of this room. The claim was opposed on behalf of Lawrence Melville, solicitor, Errol, registered as a voter in said division; but no specific ground of objection to the claim was stated. An execution of citation of the claimant to attend the Court was produced. The claimant was not present. The agent for the objector moved for an adjournment in order that the claimant might be cited of new. I stated that I would grant an adjournment if the objector's agent was in a position to state that there was a change of circumstances or new facts not before the Court when the claimant was formerly admitted, which he desired to prove by securing the attendance of the claimant. The agent replied that he was not in a position to make such a statement. According to the course of practice which has long prevailed in the sheriffdom, a lodger claimant, who claims for the first time in respect of the premises, is not admitted to the Roll if he is objected to and fails to allow his opponent to sift his claim by attending the Court when required to do so. It was not suggested that the applicant had not been objected to on the occasion of his first admission. I refused an adjournment and admitted the claim."

The question of law was:—"Whether I was entitled to refuse an adjournment and admit the claim?"

The case contained a list of thirty-six other claimants for the lodger franchise, the circumstances of whose cases were precisely similar to those of Adamson.

The case was heard before the Registration Appeal Court on 2nd December 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—When a claimant who had been cited failed to appear at the Registration Court the proper course of procedure for an objector was to move for an adjournment of the diet, and to cite the claimant to appear at the adjourned diet, either under second diligence or under a second citation, with certification that if he did not appear he would be held as confessed. This had been laid down in practically these words by Lord Ardwall in Forrest v. MacIntyre.¹ Accordingly the Sheriff ought to have granted the adjournment craved. The course adopted by the Sheriff was in effect to make the declaration annexed to the claim conclusive evidence of the claimant's qualification, whereas under the statute it was only prima facie evidence.² The Sheriff's decision was based upon a number of unwarranted assumptions. He assumed, in the first place, that the original claim had been opposed; in the second place, that the agent at present acting for the objector knew, or was bound to know, the grounds of the former objection; and, in the third place, that the objector either had no fresh evidence, or was not entitled to bring fresh evidence to prove his objection if the objection were the same and not a different one. There was nothing to prevent the objector either making a completely new case or attempting to prove the old case by better evidence.

Argued for the respondent;—The question of adjournment was one for the discretion of the Sheriff, and so long as he had not exercised that discretion in an arbitrary manner the Court would not interfere.³ The objector in the present case had virtually admitted that there were no new facts in the case, and had not suggested any ground for supposing that there had been any mistake or error in the former proceedings when the claimant was admitted. The objector's action here was apparently merely a vexatious attempt to harass his opponents.

LORD DUNDAS.—[After narrating the facts]—Now, I cannot say that the position taken up by the Sheriff was unreasonable, still less that it was illegal. The question of granting or refusing an adjournment is primarily one for the discretion of the Sheriff, and unless there are strong reasons for doing so, this Court will not interfere with that discretion. This was pointed out by Lord Ardwall in the recent case of Forrest,⁴ and my brother Lord Mackenzie there said (at p. 504), using language with which I entirely agree, "I should be slow to interfere with the exercise by the Sheriff of his discretionary power to grant or refuse an adjournment, unless a clear case of oppression were made out, which it is unnecessary to discuss here."

In the present case the claimant was on the Roll; he had prima facie a right to be there. The objector moved for an adjournment, but he did not support or explain his motion upon any specific ground. I do not think that a party is entitled to obtain an adjournment as matter of right, for the mere asking, in order just to see how things may turn out, or in the hope, and perhaps expectation, that the claimant may fail to appear at the adjourned diet, and may be held as confessed by the Sheriff. I think that very anomalous and unfair results might follow in Registration Court

Of course, if any specific case of hardship, or of anything approaching to oppression, could be alleged, it would be a different matter; but there is nothing of that sort here. I am for answering the question put to us in the affirmative.

Melville v.
Adameon.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The question in this case is whether the Sheriff was entitled to refuse an adjournment. If he was not, then he was bound to grant one. Now, we have pointed out in various cases in this Court that the question of the reasonableness of a motion for an adjournment is always in the discretion of the Sheriff; and, unless a strong case is made out of unreasonable and unjust exercise of that discretion, this Court will not interfere.

It follows from the appellant's argument that, even in the case of a lodger who has been on the Roll for ten years consecutively, if an objector appears and says, "I object," without giving any explicit grounds for his objection, the Sheriff is bound, on a motion being made, to grant an adjournment to enable the objector to substantiate the objection which he has not defined. It is clear that the practical working of the Registration Courts would be greatly hampered if we gave any encouragement to such an idea. Previous cases make it apparent that there is a practice of citing claimants in order to gain some advantage, although the objector has no facts to justify his objection. I am therefore against giving countenance to any such general right of objectors. At the same time, there is no risk to legitimate objectors. For it is easy to come into Court with a specific ground of objection; and if, where such ground is stated, the Sheriff takes a course which prevents any legitimate objection being proved, then this Court would interfere. A claimant is sometimes cited by the objector to appear and all that is hoped is to gain some advantage from questioning him, or to get him struck off the Roll if he does not answer to the citation. In these Courts, it is well known, the business is actually conducted by the same agents year after year, and although any member of the public may appear, in practice that does not happen. I think that no encouragement should be given to the practice, to which I have referred, of objecting without any specific ground for doing so merely in the hope that the claimant will lose his vote by failing to appear in answer to a citation. In each case, whether the circumstances reasonably warrant a motion for adjournment is a question for the Sheriff's discretion. I therefore agree with the judgment proposed by your Lordship.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I had some difficulty about this case during the discussion, but what has fallen from your Lordships has removed my doubts, and I therefore concur.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

Garden's
Executor v.
More.

Succession—Destination to "heirs, executors, and assignees"—Mutual settlement.

A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement by which, "for the mutual love and affection which we bear to each other," the husband assigned and disposed to his wife, "in case she shall survive me, and to her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," the whole estate of which he should die possessed, and the wife assigned and disposed to her husband, "in case he shall survive me, and to his heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," the whole estate of which she should die possessed. The spouses reserved power "to us and each of us during our joint lives to alter or revoke these presents." In exercise of this reserved power the husband made a will, in which, after providing for certain legacies, he bequeathed his whole moveable estate to his wife. The wife made no further testamentary disposition. The husband died first, and after the wife's death a question arose as to the destination of her property, which consisted solely of the estate which she had taken under her husband's will.

Held that the bequest by the wife in the mutual settlement to her husband, and to his heirs, executors, and assignees, was conditional upon his survival of her, and that, as he had predeceased, the destination did not take effect, and her property fell to her heirs in mobilibus ab intestata.

Baillie's Executor v. Baillie, (1899) 1 F. 974, followed.

Succession—Testament—Precatory Trust.

A testator bequeathed his moveable estate to his widow, and stated in his will his "desire" that at her death some part of the estate should go to his brothers' and sisters' families—"In particular, I should like not less than £50 sterling left to" his brother's widow, "and I desire that my wife may make a settlement providing for this." The testator's widow having died intestate, held that her executor was not bound to give effect to the testator's request.

JAMES GARDEN, sheepdealer, Aberlour, and Mrs Elizabeth Cruick-1st Division.
shank or Garden, his wife, on 20th November 1905 executed a mutual settlement in the following terms:—"We, James Garden, sheepdealer, Aberlour, and Mrs Elizabeth Cruickshank or Garden, wife of the said James Garden, considering it a duty incumbent on us to settle our affairs so as to prevent disputes after our respective deaths, and for the mutual love and affection which we bear to each other, have agreed to grant these presents in manner after written—that is to say, I, the said James Garden, do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispose to and in favour of the said Elizabeth Cruickshank or Garden, in case she shall survive me, and to her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever, All and Sundry my heritable and moveable estate, of whatever nature or denomination the same may be, which shall belong and be addebt to me at the time of my decease, with the whole writs, vouchers, and securities thereof; and in like manner, I, the said Elizabeth Cruickshank or Garden, give, grant, assign, and dispose to and in favour of the said James Garden, in case he shall survive me, and to his heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever, All and Sundry my heritable and moveable estate, of what kind and denomination soever, which shall belong or be addebt to me at the time of my death, with the whole writs, vouchers, and securities of the same; and for the rendering this deed more effectual, we do hereby nominate and appoint the survivor of us to be the sole executor and universal legatory of such one of us as shall predecease, reserving always to us and each of us our respective liferents of the estates and effects above conveyed, with full power to us and each of us during our joint lives to alter or revoke these presents; and we dispense with delivery; and we consent to registration hereof for preservation. In witness whereof," &c.

In exercise of the reserved power of revocation, Mr Garden executed a last will and testament on 26th May 1909. He appointed trustees, conveyed to them his whole heritable and moveable estate, and directed them, after payment of debts and expenses, to make over to his wife all his free moveable estate. He further directed them to convey his heritage to a certain beneficiary, to whom he also left the fee of certain bank shares, but directed that his widow was to enjoy the liferent both of the heritage and of the bank shares. The will contained the following clause:—"It is my desire that at my wife's death some part of such estate as she may die possessed of should go to the families of my brothers and sisters, in particular I should like not less than £50 sterling left to the widow of my brother Alexander Garden, New Elgin, or her family, if she predeceases my wife, and I desire that my wife may make a settlement providing for this. I withdraw all former wills, and consent to the registration hereof for preservation. In witness whereof," &c.

Mr Garden died on 27th April 1911, and Mrs Garden died on 17th August of the same year. She never executed any writing of a testamentary nature other than the above-mentioned mutual settlement, and up to the date of her husband's death she was not at any time possessed of separate estate, the whole property of which she died possessed having been acquired by her under her husband's will.

Mr Garden's trustees, after paying the debts and expenses and satisfying the specific bequests, retained in their hands the residue of his estate, amounting to about £825, as questions had arisen as to the destination of this fund after Mrs Garden's death.

A special case was accordingly presented, the parties being (1) Mr Garden's trustees; (2) Mrs Garden's executor-dative and her heirs in mobilibus; (3) Mr Garden's heirs in mobilibus; (4) Mrs Agnes M'Gillivray or Garden, the widow of the testator's brother Alexander.

The second parties contended that the residue, being estate in bonis of Mrs Garden at the date of her death and the provisions by her in the mutual settlement having lapsed by the predecease of her husband, fell to her heirs in mobilibus ab intestata. The third parties contended that the mutual settlement, quoad the provisions made by the said Mrs Garden therein, was still operative, and that, on a sound construction thereof, they, as heirs in mobilibus ab intestato of Mr Garden, were entitled to the free residue of the estate of the said Mrs Garden. The second and third parties further contended that, on a sound construction of Mr Garden's last will and testament, the fourth party was not entitled to any payment from Mrs Garden's estate. The fourth party contended that, on a sound construction of Dec. 3, 1912. the said last will and testament, she was entitled to have paid to her out of Mrs Garden's estate the sum of £50 sterling.

Garden's
Executor v.
More.

The following were the questions of law:—“(1) Did the said Mrs Elizabeth Cruickshank or Garden die intestate, with the result that the second party, the said William Cruickshank, as her executor-dative, is now entitled to her whole moveable estate for the purpose of distributing it between himself and the other second parties as her heirs in mobilibus ab intestata? or (2) Did the bequest by the said Mrs Elizabeth Cruickshank or Garden, contained in the said mutual disposition and settlement, remain operative, notwithstanding the predecease of her husband, with the result that the third parties—the heirs in mobilibus of the said James Garden—are now entitled to the said moveable estate as conditional institutes in the bequest? or (3) Does the provision by the said James Garden in his said last will and testament, desiring his widow to leave £50 sterling to the widow of his brother, Alexander Garden, constitute that sum a debt upon the estate of Mrs Garden, and entitle the fourth party to payment thereof out of her executry estate?”

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Skerrington) on 9th November 1912.

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The question of the succession to Mrs Garden's estate was settled by the decision in Baillie's Executor v. Baillie.¹ The bequest in the mutual settlement expressly bore to be “for the mutual love and affection which we bear to each other.” It was intended therefore solely as a testamentary provision for the surviving spouse, and could not be held to import a conditional institution of his heirs, executors, and assignees if he predeceased. (2) With regard to the £50 legacy, it was not expressed as a condition upon which the wife was to take the husband's estate, and was therefore not a precatory trust. It was a mere recommendation which she had not carried into effect, and accordingly her executor could not act upon it.²

Argued for the third parties;—(1) The intention of the mutual settlement was “to prevent disputes after our respective deaths,” an expression which differentiated it from the deed which was under consideration in Baillie's case.¹ The settlement here was intended to regulate the succession to both spouses. There were really two settlements, and, as Mrs Garden had not exercised the power of revocation, her part of the settlement remained operative, and her husband's executors were entitled to the succession as conditional institutes. If Baillie's case¹ was indistinguishable, it required reconsideration, as the Court there had wrongly proceeded upon the case of Findlay v. Mackenzie,³ which dealt with a bond of provision to a wife in implement of the husband's natural obligation to support her. Here and in Baillie's case¹ the Court was dealing with the succession to the wife, who was under no obligation to provide for her husband; and effect ought to be given to the earlier cases of Boston

v. Horsburgh,¹ Halliburton, &c.,² and Clelland v. Allan.³ (2) As to the legacy of £50, they adopted the argument of the second parties.

Argued for the fourth party;—(2) The expression of the testator's "desire" amounted to a condition binding upon the wife as a precatory trust. The present case was stronger than either *Barclay's*⁴ or Hamilton's.⁵ In Barclay's case⁴ the bequest was weakened by the words "I hope"; moreover the amount of the legacy was not specified. In Hamilton's case⁵ the expression of desire was coupled with the words "I do not think they [my children] will object," which prevented the desire being construed as a bequest.

At advising on 3rd December 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After narrating the facts and reading the terms of the mutual settlement]—It is, of course, quite settled that mutual settlements like the one which I have just read are really testamentary and nothing else, and no one has argued to the contrary. Accordingly, after the husband's death, the wife took, not in respect of his mutual settlement, but in respect of his will, and she being dead and the estate having been in bonis of her, the natural result would be that it goes to her executors. But an argument was presented to us that the old mutual settlement acted, so to speak, as her will, and that by that mutual settlement she had disposed of all estate of which she might die possessed in favour of her husband and his heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever; and that the husband being dead, the husband's heirs and executors came in as conditional institutes.

I do not think I need say more than that, in my opinion, the question is absolutely disposed of by the case of Baillie's Executor v. Baillie,⁶ and unless we are prepared to overrule that case—which we cannot do—I do not think we could decide otherwise. And I am bound to say that, although there is upon the authorities, and especially upon the older authorities, some difference, it seems to me that the rule in Baillie's case⁶ is most consonant with common sense. An old couple like this, leaving mutual fortunes to each other, do it entirely out of what the settlement says, viz., "mutual love and affection to each other," and they really do not think of each other's heirs at all.

The only other point was this, whether there was a right in the widow of the husband's brother, Alexander Garden, to get £50? I think there is no such right. It is quite possible to constitute a precatory trust which is binding upon an executor; but if estate is left to a person not as an executor but as a beneficiary, then it must be left with a clearly expressed condition in order to bind him.

Accordingly I propose that we should answer the first question in the affirmative and the second and third questions in the negative.

LORD JOHNSTON concurred.

The Lord President intimated that LORD SKERINGTON, who was absent at advising, also concurred.

SHARPE & YOUNG, W.S.—CUTHBERT & MARCHEANK, S.S.C.—
GEORGE FORSYTH, Solicitor—Agents.

THE TRUSTEES AND MANAGERS OF SCOTT'S HOSPITAL, Petitioners.—
Fleming, K.C.—Lippe.

No. 40.

Dec. 3, 1912.

Trust—Administration—Powers of trustees—Power of investment limited by trust-deed—Application to nobile officium of the Court for enlarged power.

Scott's
Hospital
Trustees.

A testator by his trust-settlement, after directing that a hospital should be endowed with the residue of his estate, stated it to be his "particular desire" that the money devoted to this purpose should be, and remain, invested in landed property, and that if any portion of such property should be sold, the proceeds should be invested in the purchase of other land. The trustees presented a petition to the nobile officium of the Court for power to sell a portion of the estate, and to invest the proceeds in "approved trust securities," by which method of investment they stated that a considerably larger income would be obtained than by the purchase of land.

The Court refused the petition, holding that they had no power to grant a relaxation of the specific restrictions on investment contained in the trust-deed.

ON 18th July 1912 the trustees and managers of Alexander Scott's Hospital, who were also the trustees under the settlement of Alexander Scott, who died in 1833, presented a petition to the Court for authority, under its nobile officium, to sell the lands of Craibstone in the county of Aberdeen, which formed part of the trust-estate, and to invest the proceeds "in approved trust investments." 2D DIVISION.

Alexander Scott by his settlement directed the residue of his estate (including the lands of Craibstone) to be devoted to erecting and endowing a hospital to be called "Alexander Scott's Hospital." The settlement further provided:—"And in respect it is my particular desire and intention that the residue of my means and estate which is to be applied for the purpose of this said mortification shall be vested and secured on landed property of such description as may be likely to produce the best and surest revenue, and to continue permanently fixed and settled on such landed property in all time thereafter: It is hereby provided that in case it shall appear to my said trustees above named, or those to be assumed as aforesaid, after they have maturely and deliberately considered the matter and had some experience of the yearly returns and probable increase of value from the wood and otherwise of my said estate of Craibstone, that it is not likely to be such a beneficial investment for the purposes of the mortification as some other landed property, it shall in that event be in the power of my trustees (after the expiration of the liferent provision in favour of my spouse or under the burden thereof) to sell and dispose of the said lands and estate of Craibstone by public roup or private bargain. . . . And thereafter my said trustees shall be bound and obliged as soon as conveniently can be done to invest and lay out the said residue and remainder of my estate in the purchase of other lands situated in the county of Aberdeen, if such can be reasonably had, and failing thereof, in any of the adjoining counties, and shall settle and secure the lands so to be purchased by a deed or deeds for the purposes of the mortification for the said hospital allenary."

The petitioners stated that they had received an offer for the purchase of Craibstone at a price which, if invested in approved trust securities, would increase the income of the trust-estate by over £200 per annum, and that it would not be profitable to reinvest the proceeds in the purchase of landed property as directed by the settlement.

In 1868 and 1905 private Acts of Parliament had been obtained by which the Trustees and Managers of Scott's Hospital were incorporated and further powers of administration conferred on them, but no change was thereby made on the powers of investment.

The petition was unopposed.

On 3rd September 1912 the Court remitted to Mr Walter Finlay, W.S., to report.

In his report the reporter indicated the view that the powers craved would be expedient in the interest of the trust, but suggested a doubt as to the competency of granting them, and referred to the undernoted authorities.¹

The case was heard before the Second Division on 3rd December 1912.

Counsel for the petitioners, besides referring to the authorities quoted by the reporter, cited the case of *Trustees of Cawin's Hospital*² to illustrate the effect of the restrictions contained in the trust-deed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I fear that it is not within our power to do what is asked in this petition, and I think it is very much to be regretted, seeing that what is proposed is a very desirable thing indeed. But the donor of this estate has so very clearly expressed himself that we cannot do otherwise than follow his direction. In his deed he expressed himself to the effect that if, as he authorised, the estate of Craibstone was at any time parted with and converted into money then, as soon as convenient thereafter, his trustees should be bound and obliged to invest and lay out the residue and remainder of his estate in the purchase of other lands situated in the county of Aberdeen if such could be obtained without serious difficulty, and failing such, in any of the adjoining counties, to be settled and secured for the purposes of the mortification. Now, that is a very distinct and clear direction. I do not think it is in the power of this Court, merely because we think it expedient, to set aside the direction of the truster, against which nothing can be said except that it may not be possible to invest the money again in land so as to get the same or a better return than was got from Craibstone.

Dealing with the petition in that way, I think we must just follow what has been done in previous cases; and as the Lord President says in the case of Berwick,³—"The powers of trustees are defined by the trust-deed, and the Court will give no higher power. The trustees are not entitled to come to the Court for advice. If they have not the power given them by the deed, it is not competent for us to give it them." I do not think here the case is so serious as it might be in certain conceivable circumstances ; because, undoubtedly, there is a very easy mode of getting this matter settled, viz., by Provisional Order, though that would cost perhaps a little more money than would be expended in endeavouring to get a decision here. If we realise that the investment which is proposed would be one which would yield nearly a third more income than at present, it is very plain that the expense of getting a Provisional Order, which in a case like this would almost certainly be unopposed, would very soon be covered by the additional advantage obtained by investing this money in securities instead of in land.

 Lord Justice-
 Clerk.

On the whole matter, while expressing the view that this is a very desirable proposal if we had the power to sanction it, which I regret we have not, I think we must dismiss the petition.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree. I think the words of the trust-deed are so clear and specific that we have not the power to authorise the petitioners to invest the balance of the funds which they hope to receive in ordinary trust securities : I am afraid they are tied up to investment in land. I share your Lordship's regret in the matter, because it seems clear from the petition and the report that the sale to the North of Scotland College of Agriculture would be a good and proper transaction for the trustees to carry through ; and one would think that what they desire to do with the balance of the price is very sensible ; but I am afraid we have no power to sanction it. I am glad, however, to think that the petitioners can probably get what they want by another method.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I am of the same opinion. The footing upon which this proceeding is brought is that the trustees are under obligation, in terms of the truster's direction, if they sell Craibstone, as they are authorised to do, immediately to invest the proceeds in another landed property in the county of Aberdeen or the adjacent counties, and on the footing that it will be a more beneficial investment than if they should continue to hold Craibstone. They ask us to relieve them of that obligation imposed upon them by the truster.

If this case rested entirely upon the trust-disposition and settlement I think it would be incompetent for us to grant the application in the circumstances averred merely for the purpose of increasing the income of the trust, and not because the trust has in any respect become unworkable. It seems to me to be still more difficult when we find that there have been two Acts of Parliament by which this trust-disposition has been modified in important respects, but has not been affected as regards the point which is now before us. That looks very like an incorporation by Act of Parliament of the trust purposes which are not in terms affected by the Acts. I agree with both your Lordships in thinking that what the trustees propose to do under present conditions is eminently sensible ; but as they have got two Acts of Parliament in regard to this trust already I do not see why they

Dec. 3, 1912. should not obtain a third, especially looking to the extreme improbability of there being any opposition.

Scott's

Trustees.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The petition at first sight does not seem to raise the question which is really before us. It is titled a petition for authority to sell heritage; but it turns out that the trustees are not in any difficulty as to the sale of the heritage. The real question arises under that part of the prayer of the petition, in which the trustees ask authority to invest the proceeds of the sale of the heritage in approved trust investments. It seems to me that the question is really one arising on the terms of the trust-deed, as Lord Dundas put it; because, as I read the Acts of Parliament, especially the one quoted on page 3 of the petition, I think that, while introducing certain alterations, they say in effect that quoad ultra the trust-deed is to remain in full force. I concur in thinking that, whatever the truster's unexpressed intention may have been, the intention of the words of the trust-deed is unusually clear and comes to this, that for all time coming the estate of Craibstone was to remain as it was; or if it were sold the proceeds were to be permanently invested in landed property.

THE COURT refused the petition.

Church—Seats—Allocation—Heritor—Family pew.

A right to a family pew in a parish church, created by allocation to a proprietor of lands in the parish, remains, until another allocation is made, with that proprietor and his successors, so long as they retain the major portion of the lands, whether they occupy the pew or not.

Observed (per the Lord President), "When there has been legal allocation the heritor's right to his family pew is exclusive . . . as to the right to sittings in it, and the right to furnish it, and to exclude all others at least until the bell for service has ceased to toll."

Church—Seats—Assignment of sittings—Proof.

Opinion (per the Lord President), that an assignment of sittings in a family pew can only be established by writing.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

ON 11th January 1910 John Paterson, residing in Greenock brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, against Robert Brown, residing at Craighead, Blantyre, and Albert Edward Brown, residing at Beechcroft, Bothwell, craving the Court "To find and declare that the primary right to use the pew or seat, No. 94, in the area of the Parish Church of Bothwell belongs to the pursuer and his tenants in the said lands of Birkenshaw and others, and that exclusive of any right thereto, other than that of ordinary parishioners, on the part of the defenders or either of them; and that the pursuer has primarily the right of administration of the sittings in the said pew or seat; to interdict the defenders from using the said pew or seat without permission from the pursuer, except to the extent to Dec. 4, 1912. which ordinary parishioners are entitled to do so, and from interfering with the pursuer in any way in his exercise of his said primary rights Paterson v. Brown. to use and administer the sittings in said pew or seat."

The pursuer averred ;—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is heritably vest in the lands of Birkenshaw and others, in the parish of Bothwell and county of Lanark. The first defender is a wholesale spirit merchant, residing at Craighead, in the parish of Blantyre, and the second defender resides at Beechcroft, Bothwell, in the parish of Bothwell.

... " (Cond. 2) "At the last allocation of the seats in the Parish Church of the parish of Bothwell, which was made in accordance with the valued rent of the lands in the parish, there were allocated to the said lands of Birkenshaw the following sittings :—five sittings in pew No. 63, six sittings in pew No. 94 (being the whole pew), and nine sittings in pew No. 132 (being the whole pew). There have been attached to said pews for many years brass plates bearing the name 'Birkenshaw,' and the initials of the proprietor of the lands when the allocation was made. The lands to which the said sittings are allocated exceed 200 acres in extent." (Cond. 3) "Pew No. 94 has all along been the family pew of the proprietors of Birkenshaw, and as such was occupied by them, and those to whom they gave liberty of occupancy. The upholstery in it was their property." (Cond. 4) "Some years ago, as the late Mr James Paterson, the father of the pursuer, then the proprietor of Birkenshaw, was not permanently resident in the parish, the late Rev. Dr Pagan, who was then the minister of the parish, applied to him for liberty to grant sittings in pew No. 94. This liberty Mr Paterson granted, but only to Dr Pagan personally and during his own pleasure. He was not informed by Dr Pagan of the use made of the permission thus given. Denied that the first defender acquired any right in pew No. 94 in consequence of his having purchased or feued lands from the late James Paterson. The first defender's titles to such lands are referred to, beyond which no admission is made. He is called upon to produce said titles. Denied that the late James Paterson made an allocation in favour of the first defender of sittings in pew No. 94."

The defenders averred ;—(Ans. 4) "Denied, and averred a right to a portion of pew No. 94 was acquired by the senior defender years ago. For long the pew was unoccupied by any heritor, and was occupied by parishioners without specific title until about twelve years ago, when it was occupied by the defenders, and has since been occupied by them under the following circumstances :—The senior defender had feued from the late James Paterson (first) in 1872 1 rood 35 poles at Uddingston, part of his lands in the parish of Bothwell, and (second) in 1884 (a) 43½ poles, (b) 42 poles 5 yards, and (c) 3 roods 28 poles 4 yards, all parts of said lands in Uddingston in the parish of Bothwell. In 1884 the senior defender bought from the said James Paterson 2 acres 2 roods 2 poles 28 yards 8 feet, being other parts of the said James Paterson's lands in Uddingston in the parish of Bothwell. These lands so feued and purchased by the senior defender were and are parts of the lands in the parish of Bothwell which belonged to the said James Paterson in respect of which he was entitled to pew No. 94 in the Parish Church of Bothwell (if the same was allocated to him in or about 1834 when Bothwell Parish Church was rebuilt, which is not admitted). The senior defender's titles are produced and referred to. In virtue of said lands acquired by the senior defender he is entitled to some part of the pew No. 94 in the Parish Church of Bothwell as an heritor of the parish in trust for himself and his tenants. The senior defender built on said ground self-contained and other houses occupied by twenty tenants, whose rents are £787, as appearing on the Valuation-roll of the parish of Bothwell, a copy of which rent-roll is herewith produced. About twenty-two years ago the senior defender applied to the late James Paterson for an allocation to him of seats in the Parish Church in respect of said lands feued and purchased by the senior defender, and the said James Paterson allocated two sittings in pew No. 94 as a right or pertinent of the lands acquired by the said defender, with the further permission to use the rest of the pew No. 94 so long as the said James Paterson could not occupy it. This allocation was confirmed in writing, and was by the senior defender intimated to Dr Pagan, who stated that pew No. 94 was then occupied by William Ramsay, residing at Moss Park, Bothwell. Dr Pagan asked the senior defender as a favour not to dispossess Mr Ramsay, as he was an elder and a generous supporter of the church, and in respect thereof the senior defender did not exercise his rights in said pew No. 94 until Mr Ramsay removed to London about twelve years ago, since which time the defenders have occupied the same. The letter referred to has been mislaid and has not yet been found."

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The primary rights to use and administer the sittings in the said pew No. 94 being attached to the lands in which the pursuer is heritably vest, and the pursuer being thus entitled to exercise the said rights on behalf of himself and his tenants, to the exclusion of any right on the part of the defenders other than that of ordinary parishioners, decree of declarator and interdict should be granted as craved. (2) The defenders, or either of them, having no right or title to take possession of the said pew No. 94, interdict should be granted as craved. (3) Said pew No. 94, being the family pew of the pursuer, duly allocated to the lands in which he is heritably vest, he is entitled to the peaceable possession thereof to the exclusion of the defenders. (4) The church of the parish of Bothwell having been built prior to the year 1868, and the first defender not being on the roll of valued rent heritors of the said parish, or a valued rent heritor thereof, he is not entitled to an allocation of sittings in said church in respect of his ownership of the subjects mentioned in the defences. (5) Separatim, the defenders, having been offered by the pursuer accommodation in either of the seats allocated to the lands of Birkenshaw other than pew No. 94, are bound to rest satisfied with such accommodation while it is available for them. (6) The defences are irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(4) The senior defender having right and title as an heritor to two sittings in the pew in question, the action is incompetent, and should be dismissed, with expenses. Separatim, the senior defender having right and title as an heritor to an unallocated portion of the pew in question, the action is incompetent, and should be dismissed, with expenses. (5) The defenders as parishioners being entitled to occupy any vacant seat in the parish church, the action is incompetent.

On 28th March 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Thomson) granted declarator and interdict as craved.

The defenders appealed, and on 30th July 1910 the Sheriff (Millar) recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and dismissed the petition.

The pursuer appealed, and the case was heard before the First Dec. 4, 1912 Division on 19th and 20th June 1911.¹

On 13th July 1911, the Court, having ascertained from counsel at the bar that the pursuer did not renounce probation, recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute hoc statu, and allowed parties a proof with reference to the averments in articles 2 and 3 of the condescendence.

Thereafter proof was led before Lord Mackenzie, the import of which is stated in the opinion of the Lord President, infra, pp. 296 et seq.

The case was further heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 20th November 1912.

The argument was opened by the respondents, who contended :—Independently of any question of a past allocation, the possession by the respondents of the pew in question, which had been proved, fell to be continued as the status quo until disturbed by a new allocation. Subsisting possession of pews in a parish church by feuars in the parish, or parishioners, could not be disturbed except by a new allocation of the whole area of the church.² In any event, the Court could not grant decree in the terms sought. There was no such thing as a "primary right" known to the law; and the interdict craved was in such terms as to be unenforceable.

Counsel for the appellant were not called on.

At advising on 4th December 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The present action is raised by the pursuer as proprietor of the lands of Birkenshaw, and as such a heritor in the parish of Bothwell, and his object is to vindicate his right to pew No. 94 in Bothwell Parish Church. It is resisted by the defenders, who assert a right to two sittings in said pew. The senior defender is not resident in the parish, but he is a feuwar holding a title from the pursuer's predecessor to four acres of land occupied by tenement houses which he lets out. The junior defender is resident in the parish of Bothwell, but not upon the lands of Birkenshaw.

The pursuer avers that pew No. 94 was allocated to the lands of Birkenshaw as the family pew. He states that he wishes to occupy the said pew and had requested the defenders (who had occupied it under temporary permission given by the pursuer's father to the then minister, and by him communicated to the defenders) to remove some cushions, &c., therefrom. This the defenders refused to do, and the action became necessary. The defenders assert their right to sittings in the pew—(1) upon the ground of a so-called allocation by the pursuer's father; (2) upon the right quoad the senior defender as a feuwar; and (3) upon the right quoad the junior defender as a parishioner.

Paterson v.
Brown.

Ld. President.

The learned Sheriff-substitute, upon the fact of the allocation to the pursuer's author being (although not admitted on record) conceded at debate, and no writing being produced to evidence an "allocation" by the pursuer's father to the defenders, granted decree of declarator and interdict as craved. An appeal was taken to the Sheriff, who recalled that interlocutor and dismissed the petition. The learned Sheriff held that though the pursuer averred that pew No. 94 had been allocated to Birkenshaw, and that it "had all along been" (i.e., from the time of the allocation) the family pew, that was not an averment that the pew had been allocated as a family pew; and he went on to say, though no proof had been allowed, that there was no evidence that this was a family pew. Treating it as a non-family pew, he therefore held that the senior defender had a right in it as a feuar, and that therefore no declarator or interdict in the terms asked could be granted.

When the case, being appealed, came before your Lordships, at the first hearing you were satisfied that the Sheriff's reading of the averments in Conds. 2 and 3 was much too narrow and could not be supported; and that it was also out of the question to decide the case upon the footing that no evidence of No. 94 being a family pew had been produced, when no opportunity of producing such evidence had been afforded. Your Lordships therefore recalled hoc statu the interlocutor before mentioned and allowed the parties a proof of the averments as to No. 94 being a family pew. That proof was taken before Lord Mackenzie and is now before your Lordships, and counsel have been heard upon the import thereof.

The proof in my opinion establishes with absolute certainty that the seats in Bothwell Parish Church were allocated in 1834, and that pew No. 94 was allocated to the proprietor of the lands of Birkenshaw as the family pew. The evidence of Mr Sewell, the clerk to the heritors, with the relative document No. 39 of process—a document entitled "Sittings in Bothwell Parish Church"—would in my opinion be enough. The original heritors' minute-book is lost. But No. 39 comes from an almost equally good source. It is produced by the session-clerk. Once the allocation is finished, the session has more to do with the actual occupation of the church than the heritors. So that I cannot doubt that No. 39 was a correct copy of the original minute. Now it bears on the face of it that No. 94 is a family pew. The method of an allocation has been settled for all time since the decision in 1776 of Earl of Marchmont v. Earl of Home,¹ and it is not too much to say that almost every parish church in Scotland has been so allocated. Now that method was that each heritor, according to his valuation, had first a choice of a family pew, and then a second choice of so many more pews or seats as made up his share of the total area proportional to his valuation. This allocation bears on the face of it that things were gone about in this manner. Look at the list:

1. His Grace the Duke of Hamilton, by Robert Brown, Esq., and Robert Rutherford, Esq., W.S., the whole centre seat of gallery, No. 119; also in Nos. 120, 121, 122, 126, 127, 128, 18.
2. Walter Frederick Campbell, Esq., of Woodhall, by Mr Webster, his factor, No. 98; also in Nos. 95, 96, 97, and so on.

Then 16. Andrew Jack, Esq., of Uddingston, No. 94; also in Nos. 132, Dec. 4, 1912.
63.

So that in every case we have first of all a pew allocated and then the expression "also in," which shows to my mind as clearly as anything can be that this allocation was according to the rule laid down in Marchmont,¹ namely, that you first got the family pew and then made up the total allotted seats in other pews.

Paterson v.
Brown.

Ld. President.

Now Andrew Jack was the predecessor in title of the pursuer, and it is under his settlement that the pursuer takes his estate of Birkenshaw, Uddingston. I may say in passing that a sort of attempt in cross-examination to confuse the matter by suggesting that the estate of Birkenshaw proper does not correspond to the old possessions of Andrew Jack, who is not designed as of "Birkenshaw," but as of "Uddingston," is really quite beside the mark to anyone who is at all acquainted with the practice of Scots nomenclature. At the time of an allocation each heritor has his portion of the area allocated to him in proportion to his total share of the valued or real rent as the case may be (all the older allocations were on valued rent de facto), quite irrespective of the names of his lands in title deeds, and of the fact whether they consisted of one old estate or a congeries of various estates. As to his name, that would be as he was called at the time, and anyone who knows anything of Scotland can recall instances where at different times of a family history the territorial name of the family would be different. For instance, the Stewarts of Grandtully came to be commonly designated as the Stewarts of Murthly after Murthly became the chief family seat, though Grandtully was their oldest possession and was still in the family.

But the evidence does not end there. In the seats allocated to Andrew Jack there is a plate, "A. J. Birkenshaw," which is there to this day. Then in the evidence of Mrs Paterson, who is eighty years old, having been born in 1831, we have a history of the occupation of the pew 94 during the days of Mrs Jack, the widow of Andrew Jack, and under his settlement liferentrix of his estates, and then through the time of Walter Paterson, Mrs Jack's brother, and finally of James Paterson, the husband of the witness and father of the pursuer. There is, besides her testimony, ample testimony of other old people that No. 94 was occupied during all her time by Mrs Jack. Indeed there is no testimony the other way. It is true that there is evidence to the effect that Walter Paterson for many years sat in pew 63, being in disagreement with his brother. But Walter Paterson was only proprietor of the estate for a year, for Mrs Jack did not die until 1867, and Walter died in 1868. By the time he succeeded he had probably become accustomed to 63, and his early death scarcely left him time to change. Anyway, until the year 1882 the pew No. 94 seems not to have been occupied by any but Patersons. In that year they went away from the parish, and permission was given to Dr Pagan, the minister, to put other people in the seat, of which permission he availed himself. This is also borne out by the testimony of Mrs Pagan, widow of the minister, and by the lists of the actual condition of the occupation of the

Dec. 4, 1912. seats produced by her and written in her deceased husband's handwriting. These show Patersons in exclusive possession up till 1875, and in occupation after 1878, the date of the heading of the list, for obviously the deletions would be made subsequently—probably in 1882. This book is, of course, no testimony as to legal right, but is good evidence as to actual occupation. It also bears out historically the occupation by Walter Paterson of No. 63.

Paterson v.
Brown.

Ld. President.

Now, if one comes to the conclusion that No. 94 is the family pew allotted to the proprietor of the lands of Birkenshaw, it seems to me that the case is virtually ended. The mere fact that since 1882 the family has not used it can make no difference. A right to a family pew created by allocation remains with the lands as the family pew until another legal allocation, and is not lost because the family do not sit there. There are many family pews in parish churches which are not used by the family, but that does not affect the legal right, or prevent the proprietor of the lands vindicating his right if he wishes to sit there.

Now, what is the defence proposed? It is, first, that a so-called "allocation" of two sittings in No. 94 was made by the father of the pursuer to the senior defender when he feued four acres of the estate. I say "so-called," for allocation is quite an improper word for such an arrangement. Allocation means allocation to a heritor by the heritors as a body by agreement, or by the Sheriff on a petition. But, treating the grant as an assignment by the pursuer's father to the senior defender of two sittings in No. 94, I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that such an arrangement could only be established by writing, and no writing is produced. Further, from the evidence I am satisfied that no such arrangement was ever contemplated. Per se it would be most unlikely that the proprietor of Birkenshaw should assign to a feuar of four acres two seats in his family pew of seven sittings in all. But on the evidence I have no doubt that the pursuer's account is correct, viz., that after the family had for the time left the parish they allowed the minister to have the disposal of the seats, and that it was he who permitted the defender to use them—a use which he has long ago given up, and which he does not really wish to continue.

Failing that argument, the next defence is based upon the senior defender's position as a feuar. Now, it is quite true that the family seat is not a piece of independent property; it cannot be separately conveyed away from the estate, and if the estate is parted with as a whole it will pass as part and pertinent without mention in the conveyance. But to feu four acres out of an estate of 200 is not to part with the whole, and so long as the major part of the estate remains with the original proprietor and his successors the family pew remains with it, until a new allocation. All this is distinctly stated by Mr Duncan in his work on Parochial Ecclesiastical Law, and is amply borne out by the authorities there cited. Counsel for the defenders sought to rely upon the case of St Clair v. Alexander.¹ But in the St Clair case¹ a large portion of the estate had been feued out and practical possession of certain seats allowed to the feuar. In this state of affairs no exclusive possession was adjudged to any of the parties involved,

St Clair of Roslin, Miss Alexander of Rosebank, and David Wilson of the Dec. 4, 1912.
 Roslin Inn. But the whole point of the case, as clearly brought out in the ^{Paterson v.}
 opinion of the Lord President as given in Hailes' report and in the inter- ^{Brown.}
 locutor as given in Morison, was that there never had been a legal allocation ^{Ld. President.} of the church; that consequently nothing but occupation could be looked at, and that that occupation had been common to all the parties concerned.

That when there has been legal allocation the heritor's right to his family pew is exclusive, is absolutely certain. When I say exclusive I mean exclusive as to the right to sittings in it and the right to furnish it, and to exclude all others at least until the bell for service has ceased to toll.
 Whether after that a person without a seat is entitled to seek admittance to an unoccupied seat has never been decided and need not be decided now, for I entirely agree with Mr Duncan, who says that a person who has a sitting of his own which he is entitled to occupy cannot insist upon entering someone else's pew which is partially occupied, and the pursuer has all along been willing that the defender should have a sitting in any of the pews allotted to Birkenshaw except No. 94. The whole meaning of a family seat is that it is to be for the exclusive use of the family; the whole practice of churches—and some of your Lordships as well as myself are entitled to appeal to an experience of over fifty years in such a matter—is all the same way. The passage of Lord President Inglis's judgment in the Jedburgh case,¹ which denies exclusive use to a heritor and his family, is relative, not to a family pew at all, but to the total area given to a heritor in the allocation of the total space in the church.

The other defender, who is a parishioner, i.e., lives in the parish but never enters the church, has really no defence at all, for if he could assert a right, allocation would be an empty ceremony.

It only remains to consider what should be the form of the decree to be granted. The procedure here, which has been started in the form now imperative in the Sheriff Court by initial writ, is not calculated to suggest exact words for the conclusions of a declarator. I am of opinion that there should be declarator of the pursuer's right to pew No. 94 as his family pew, and a negation of any right on the part of the defenders to sittings therein. By a sitting is merely meant a right to go there and exclude others before service begins, and it does not touch the question of the rights of anyone to ask for a vacant seat in order to occupy it during worship. And in view of the attitude and actings of the defenders, I think there should be interdict against their putting furnishings or books into the pew or entering themselves therein at any time previous to the commencement of public worship. In view of the perfectly reasonable offer which was made by the pursuer before litigation in the letter of 2nd July 1909 and which the defenders refused, I think the litigation was necessary and justified, that the defenders have been wrong all through, and that consequently they must be held liable in expenses in all the Courts.

Paterson v. Brown. LORD JOHNSTON was present when the case was advised.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—
 “Find and declare that the pursuer, John Paterson, has right to the pew No. 94 in the area of the Parish Church of Bothwell as his family pew, and that the defenders have no right to any sittings therein: Therefore interdict the defenders from putting furnishings or books into said pew, or entering thereinto at any time previous to the commencement of public worship,” &c.

No. 42. JAMES WILSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Constable, K.C.—J. H. Henderson.

Dec. 5, 1912. JOHN SHEPHERD, Defender (Respondent).—J. R. Christie—Fenton.

Wilson v. Shepherd.

Interdict—Property in soda-water bottles—Participation in illegal use of property.

An aerated water manufacturer sought to interdict a drysalter from putting paraffin oil into bottles belonging to the pursuer. The pursuer averred that bottles belonging to him, and marked with his name, were lent by him to his customers in the course of his trade, and were brought to the defender by persons coming to purchase paraffin oil, and that at their request the defender put paraffin oil into the bottles, in the knowledge that the bottles were the property of the pursuer and that the pursuer objected to such a practice since it injured them for use in his business.

Held that the pursuer had relevantly averred participation by the defender in a wrongful use of the pursuer's property, which, if proved, would form a good ground for interdict against him; and proof allowed.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles. ON 1st November 1911 James Wilson, aerated water manufacturer, Edinburgh, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against John Shepherd, drysalter, in which (as amended) he craved the Court “to interdict the defender by himself, or by others acting for him or under his instructions, from putting paraffin oil or other liquid into bottles sent out by the pursuer to his customers, and embossed ‘James Wilson, Edinburgh,’ and known by the defender to be the property of the pursuer.”

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 1) “The pursuer, who is a member of the Edinburgh and District Aerated Water Manufacturers’ and Beer Bottlers’ Defence Association, is an aerated water manufacturer, and carries on business at Gilmore Park, Edinburgh. The defender is a drysalter, carrying on business at 52 Fountainbridge there. . . .” (Cond. 2) “The pursuer, in carrying on his said business, is in the habit, in conformity with the universal custom of the trade among aerated water manufacturers in Edinburgh and throughout Scotland, of lending his bottles containing aerated waters manufactured by him to his various customers on the understanding that said bottles are, when empty, to be returned to the pursuer, whose property they remain, and that no other use is to be made of them. This practice is well known to the defender. To facilitate the recovery of his bottles the pursuer uses bottles embossed, moulded, engraved, or otherwise impressed or marked with his name or his name and address, so as to be identified as the property of the pursuer. Said bottles are also stoppered with screw stoppers bearing the pursuer's name and address. The said bottles are expressly made for the pursuer and, as is well known to the defender, are never sold or alienated by him, but only lent to his customers as above described. The explanations in answer are denied. To ensure the return of bottles it is the practice of the trade, and of the pursuer, to charge a small deposit on each bottle so lent, which is repaid on the return of the bottles. This charge in no way represents the price of the bottle, nor is the transaction one of purchase and sale. Further, as a matter of convenience and by mutual agreement, aerated water manufacturers frequently collect each other's bottles from customers and take them to the Bottle Exchange, an organisation through which the bottles are subsequently distributed among their proper owners. It is for this purpose only that aerated water manufacturers accept, or are entitled to accept, bottles belonging to other manufacturers, and this practice in no way affects the rights of property in the bottles." (Cond. 3) "It has come to the knowledge of the pursuer that the defender for some time past has been filling bottles of the kind mentioned and belonging to the pursuer with paraffin oil and other liquid, and has been selling or supplying paraffin or other liquid contained in such bottles to his customers or the public. He also fills such bottles when tendered to him over the counter by customers who request him to fill them with paraffin oil or other liquid which they have come to buy. Such use by the defender of the pursuer's bottles is made without his authority or consent, and in knowledge of the fact that the bottles belong to the pursuer, and that the pursuer objects to such use being made of them." (Cond. 4) "In particular it is averred that the defender wrongfully filled pursuer's bottles with paraffin oil on the following dates, viz. :—[then followed averments of sales of paraffin oil by the defender on 30th and 31st October 1911 to Samuel Waugh and Andrew Forrest, both of whom were acting on the instructions of Peter Hope]. With reference to the statement in answer, explained that the pursuer having reason to suspect that the defender was making an improper use of his bottles complained to the Edinburgh and District Aerated Water Manufacturers' and Beer Bottlers' Defence Association, of which he is a member, that the Association instructed Peter Hope, its inspector, to investigate the matter, and that on the occasions mentioned Hope, in order to ascertain if the defender was in the habit of using the bottles in the manner complained of, instructed Waugh and Forrest, his assistants, to purchase paraffin from the defender and to tender the pursuer's bottles to be filled with it. At the time the defender did not know that Waugh and Forrest had any connection with the said Association or with the pursuer, and he dealt with them as strangers in the belief that they were independent members of the public. He did not know and did not ask whether the pursuer had consented to his bottles being filled with paraffin." (Cond. 5) "The defender was well aware that he was making an improper and illegal use of the pursuer's property, and one which was against the pursuer's wishes. The defender had previously been in the habit of filling aerated water bottles belonging to members of the said Association with paraffin and other liquids, and had been warned against the practice. In particular, on 7th October 1909, the defender filled with paraffin oil a large quart, embossed, aerated water bottle belonging to a member of the said Association and tendered to him by the said Samuel Waugh, and on 14th October 1909 the secretary of the said Association wrote to the defender in the following terms:—[a letter from the secretary objecting to the practice, and threatening interdict, and a letter from the defender in reply undertaking not to repeat the offence were here printed]. The acts of the defender which are complained of, and against a repetition of which interdict is sought, are in breach of the undertaking contained in said letter. On 10th March 1910 a printed placard or bill was delivered to the defender, intimating that proceedings would be taken against any person filling aerated water or beer bottles with paraffin oil or other similar liquids." (Cond. 6) "The use by the defender of bottles belonging solely to the pursuer, and embossed or marked as aforesaid, is both at common law and according to the custom of the trade a violation of the pursuer's right of property in said bottles, and is therefore wrongful and illegal. The defender is well aware of the fact that the pursuer and other aerated water manufacturers and brewers and beer bottlers in Edinburgh and district do not sell or alienate the bottles stamped with their name, and that no one can acquire a right of property in them or is entitled to make improper use of them without the consent of the owners." (Cond. 7) "By the defender's illegal actings the bottles are damaged most seriously for future use as aerated water bottles, and when they revert to the possession of the pursuer damage is done to other bottles in the wash-tub, causing the pursuer great trouble and expense. The pursuer's claim for damages in respect thereof is reserved. The pursuer, in view of the defender's disregard of the previous warnings referred to, is under serious apprehension that the defender will continue to use as his own property, or otherwise damage, bottles belonging to the pursuer as aforesaid, and in these circumstances the present action has been rendered necessary."

The defender averred:—(Ans. 2) "Not known and not admitted. Explained that it is the custom in the trade for shopkeepers who supply aerated waters to charge purchasers for the bottles in which such waters are contained. Said bottles thus become the property of the purchasers. Further, according to the custom of the trade, the said shopkeepers either purchase from manufacturers of aerated waters the bottles supplied, and receive repayment of the price on return of the bottles, or pay the price of such bottles as they do not return to the said manufacturers; and further, the aerated water manufacturers accept plain bottles and the embossed bottles of other manufacturers, whether members of the said Association or not, in exchange for their own embossed bottles supplied to customers."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender having illegally and unwarrantably, and after having been warned of the illegality of his said acts, and in breach of his undertaking as condescended on, filled and used, and the pursuer being apprehensive that he will continue to so fill and use without his authority, bottles belonging to the pursuer, and embossed or marked with his name and address, and bearing his name and address on screw stoppers, all as condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to interdict as craved. (2) The pursuer having sustained and having reasonable cause to apprehend that he will continue to sustain loss and damage through the unwarrantable and illegal acts of the defender as condescended on, is entitled to interdict, with expenses, as craved. Dec. 5, 1912.

Wilson v.
Shepherd.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the initial writ, the action should be dismissed, and the interim interdict recalled, with expenses.

On 31st January 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) sustained the first plea in law for the defender and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 8th and 15th November 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The pursuer had averred a relevant case for inquiry. It was not disputed that the defender's customers were making a wrongful use of the pursuer's bottles when they brought them to be filled with paraffin oil. In putting the oil into the bottles, the defender also was making use of them, since that was an act committed by him in the exercise of his trade. Alternatively, he was participating in the wrongful use made by those who brought the bottles.¹ On either view he was liable to be interdicted. The question whether the defender had any duty to inquire as to the ownership of the bottles did not arise in this case, since the pursuer averred, and was prepared to prove, actual knowledge on the part of the defender. The defender could not avoid decree by challenging the pursuer's title to the bottles; or at least, having raised the question, could not object to its being decided in this action. As a matter of fact there could be no doubt on the point, since the bottles originally belonged to the pursuer, and he had done nothing to lead the defender to suppose that he had parted with the property in them.² It was immaterial that the only instances of actual filling were instances where the defender had been "trapped" into doing the act complained of. All that the pursuer required to show was "reasonable grounds of apprehension" that a wrong would be committed,³ and as evidence of this a "trap" was as good as a genuine sale. Such a method of procuring evidence was recognised in practice,⁴ and in the case of *Burns v. Turner*⁵ the session papers showed that the only offence committed was a "trap" sale to an agent of the Bottlers' Association, as in the present case.

Argued for the respondent;—The pursuer's case depended upon his having a right of property in the bottles. This was a disputed fact, and could not be decided in an action of interdict where the proper contradictor was not present. In any case interdict could not be granted because no instance was alleged in which the proprietary rights of the pursuer had been invaded,⁶ and there were no grounds for apprehending that such an invasion would take place.⁷ The only cases of filling averred were cases in which the owner of the bottles consented to the filling, in order to "trap" the defender, and this would not support a crave for interdict.¹ There was no averment of any specific instance of an intention to infringe the pursuer's rights.² The pursuer allowed the bottles to leave his possession and could not thereafter complain if they ceased to be treated as his property. The defender dealt with the bottles at the request of the person having the actual possession, and had no duty to inquire who was the true owner or whether the owner had consented to their being used for paraffin oil.³ If there was any question of wrongful use of the pursuer's property, the guilty person was the customer who brought the bottle to be filled, not the defender, for he never made use of the bottle at all. The damage, if any, to the pursuer was done by the customer, in returning the bottle to the pursuer unwashed. In any event the terms of the interdict in the crave of the initial writ were too wide.⁴ *

LORD SALVESSEN.—I confess that my first impression of this case was that the Sheriff-substitute had reached a sound conclusion, but after having had the benefit of a full argument, I have come to be of opinion that there is a case for inquiry. The pursuer has amended his crave for interdict so as to restrict it to cases where the defender by himself or others fills liquid into bottles which he knows to be the property of the pursuer and not of the persons who bring them to his shop. This amendment obviates a number of the criticisms which were directed against the crave as originally framed, but which appear to me to be more appropriate if and when interdict comes to be granted.

Even as the case is now presented, I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in holding that it is founded upon the right of property alone, and is not based upon the view that putting paraffin oil into a bottle made and used for aerated water practically destroys its commercial value. If the pursuer had desired to found his case on the latter view, he ought to have qualified the expression "or other liquid." This expression is not intended, and I think cannot be construed, as meaning liquid ejusdem generis with paraffin oil. The reason why the use of the pursuer's bottles as receptacles for paraffin oil is put in the forefront is to emphasise the interest which he has in preventing such use, for it was explained to us that it is for practical purposes impossible to eliminate all such bottles from the dozens that are washed together, and the failure to eliminate a single bottle may result in the others becoming tainted. If these averments are well founded the pursuer has a clear interest to insist on the interdict for which he seeks, but his demand for interdict must still rest on the illegal or unauthorised Dec. 5, 1912.

use of his property.

Assuming the pursuer's averments to be well founded, I think it is plain Wilson v.
Shepherd.
that they disclose a relevant case against a customer who, after consuming Lord Salvesen.
the aerated waters which the pursuer supplies in the bottles embossed with his name, instead of returning the bottles and receiving back his deposit, proceeds to use them for other purposes. He has no right to retain the bottles after the contents have been consumed, and on tender of the deposit would have no defence to an action for delivery. There are, however, practical difficulties in the way of proceeding against customers, which are not so formidable when the action is taken against a retail merchant like the defender.

The real difficulty in the case is whether the unauthorised use of the pursuer's property is made by the customer alone, or whether in the circumstances averred the defender is not a party to it. It may be that the defender has no duty to inquire whether a bottle which a customer brings to him to be filled with paraffin oil is the property of that customer before complying with his request. On that matter I pronounce no opinion. In the ordinary case the possession of moveables implies property, but the pursuer offers to prove that the defender has been in the habit of filling bottles which he knew to be the property of the pursuer with paraffin oil although he has been warned not to do so, and has been informed of the injurious consequences which will in all probability result to the pursuer's trade. Now, I am unable to hold that such averments do not disclose a relevant ground of action. Assuming that the defender was the only dealer in paraffin oil in the district it is plain that without his active co-operation the injury of which the pursuer complains would not result. Further, it is the defender or someone in his employment who does the injurious act, that, namely, of putting paraffin oil into a bottle which he knows the customer has no right to use for that or any other purpose, and he does so in his own interest, as it enables him to effect a sale of a commodity in which he deals. I cannot in these circumstances hold that he is not a party to the use of the bottles, or that the pursuer is not entitled to a remedy against him.

It was further argued that as the only cases specifically averred on record as justifying the application were cases where the pursuer had sent men in his own employment to the defender's premises to have bottles belonging to himself filled with paraffin oil, he could not found upon these cases, as he must be held to have consented to the defender complying with his own request. I cannot assent to this argument. It is distinctly averred that the defender was ignorant that the messengers were pursuer's employees, and that he dealt with them as strangers. These cases are merely put forward as tending to prove that the defender followed a practice of filling customers' bottles with paraffin. But there is a further answer which I think is conclusive. In the defences the right to continue this practice is strenuously maintained, and it may be assumed that the defender will continue to do what he maintains to be within his rights, and what is certainly in accordance with his interests. There is thus a nice question of right to be determined which may quite well be tried in an interdict, for that is the

Dec. 5, 1912. appropriate remedy to prevent an apprehended wrong, even if no similar wrong has actually been committed. Assuming the averments in answer 2 to represent the defender's views, the pursuer has every reason to believe that he will act upon these views however detrimental such actings may be to the pursuer's trade.

Wilson v,
Shepherd.
Lord Salvesen.

These last observations practically negative another argument which was presented, namely, that the question of right ought to have been determined in a declarator and not in a process of interdict. The circumstances may turn out to be such that the Court would deem it inexpedient to pronounce an interdict, but nevertheless there is the highest authority for holding that what is practically a declaratory finding as to the rights of the pursuer may competently be pronounced in a process of interdict although interdict is refused—Perth General Station Committee v. Ross.¹ I think, therefore, that we ought to recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute and remit to him to allow parties a proof of their averments.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur in thinking that this case must be sent to proof. The appellant avers that the respondent, for the purposes of his business, has for some time been filling paraffin into aerated water bottles brought to him by customers to be so filled, knowing that these bottles belonged at the time to the appellant; that the appellant forbade any use of his bottles by anyone, except in connection with his business as an aerated water manufacturer; and that the persons who presented the bottles to be filled with paraffin had no right to tender them for these purposes. It is not denied that the appellant, on similar averments, would have a good ground of action against the customers. But if the elements of knowledge above mentioned are established, it seems to me that there will be good ground for interdict against the respondent, as a person without whose active participation the alleged wrongful use of the complainer's property would not have taken place.

Whether the interdict should be limited, and, in particular, should be confined to the case of a liquid which is injurious to the use of the bottles by the appellant for the purposes of his business (in which case alone, it may be, the appellant would be able to show sufficient interest to entitle him to the remedy craved), need not now be determined.

On the two other questions raised at this stage of the case, I concur in Lord Salvesen's opinion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur. I have all along been of opinion that this was a case for inquiry.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and remitted the cause to the Sheriff to allow the parties a proof of their respective averments, and to proceed.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Appeal against interlocutory judgment under Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 75), sec. 11—Leave to appeal—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 28.

The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, sec. 11, enacts that either party in any proceedings under the Act may appeal in the form of a special case from the decision of the Sheriff "in point of law or on the merits, or in respect of the admission or rejection of any evidence"; and that all enactments relating to appeals from decisions of Sheriffs and to the conditions of such appeals shall apply to an appeal in proceedings under the Act in the same manner as if such "appeal related to a matter within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court."

The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, sec. 28, has the effect of excluding appeal to the Court of Session against an interlocutory judgment of a Sheriff, unless, inter alia, leave to appeal has been granted by him.

Held (diss. Lord Salvesen) that the provisions of the latter section apply to appeals in proceedings under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876; and that, accordingly, an appeal by special case against a decision of the Sheriff repelling certain preliminary pleas in such proceedings was incompetent as, although the Sheriff had himself stated the special case, leave to appeal had not been formally obtained.

THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF THE COUNTY OF DUMFRIES brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries against the Provost and Magistrates of the burgh of Langholm. The pursuers craved the Court to find that the defenders were committing an offence within the meaning of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, by permitting sewage to flow into the River Esk or its tributaries, and to ordain them to abstain from doing so.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The action is irrelevant. (3) The pursuers' statements regarding pollution are lacking in specification, and ought not to be remitted to proof.

On 29th January 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) pronounced an interlocutor repelling these pleas and granting leave to appeal; and the defenders having appealed, the Sheriff (Fleming), by interlocutor dated 29th February 1912, adhered.

Against this interlocutor the defenders appealed by special case to the Court of Session. As the pursuers declined to adjust the special case with the defenders, it was adjusted by the Sheriff on the application of the defenders.

The question of law in the case was:—"Was I right in repelling the first, second, and third pleas in law for the defenders and appellants, or any and which of them?"

The respondents having objected to the competency of the appeal,*

* The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 75), enacts:—Sec. 11 (as applied to Scotland by sec. 21). "If either party in any proceedings before the [Sheriff Court] under this Act feels aggrieved by the decision of the Court in point of law or on the merits, or in respect of the admission or rejection of any evidence, he the case was sent to the Short Roll under reservation of the question of competency. Counsel were heard on the competency of the appeal and on the merits before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 13th November 1912.

Argued for the respondents;—The appeal was incompetent. (1) Section 11 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, which allowed appeal, but only in the form of a special case, applied only to summary orders restraining the commission of an offence, pronounced in terms of section 10 of the Act. There was no appeal competent against interlocutory judgments; if it were otherwise, the door would be open to deliberate obstruction by means of a multiplicity of appeals. In the case of County Council of Lanark v. Magistrates of Airdrie,¹ on which the appellants founded, the appeal was from a decision as to the substantial merits of the case. It afforded no authority for the view that appeal might be taken from interlocutors that were not final; and that view was inconsistent with the policy of the Act. (2) In any case, section 11 of the Act provided that all the enactments as to Sheriff Court procedure should apply to such appeals; and this introduced section 28 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907.² By that section, as the appellants had not obtained leave to appeal, the appeal was incompetent. The fact that the Sheriff had settled the special case on the application of the appellants was not equivalent to obtaining leave to appeal; and the appeal had not been noted as required by the Sheriff Courts Act.³

Argued for the appellants;—(1) Section 11 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act did not exclude appeals against interlocutory judgments; and the observations in the opinions in County Council of Lanark v. Magistrates of Airdrie,¹ and the subsequent history of that case⁴ showed that the right of appeal under the Act was not in any

The appeal shall be in the form of a special case to be agreed upon by both parties or their attorneys, and if they cannot agree, to be settled by the [Sheriff] upon the application of the parties or their attorneys. . . . Subject to the provisions of this section, all the enactments, rules, and orders relating to proceedings in actions in [Sheriff Courts], and to enforcing judgments in [Sheriff Courts] and appeals from decisions of the [Sheriffs], and to the conditions of such appeals, and to the power of the superior Courts on such appeals, shall apply to all proceedings under this Act, and to an appeal from such action in the same manner as if such action and appeal related to a matter within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court. . . ."

The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), enacts:—Sec. 28. way limited except as to the mode of appealing. (2) The provisions of section 28 of the Sheriff Courts Act¹ did not apply to the appeals specially provided for under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, and leave to appeal, therefore, was not required. The present appeal was in the same position as an appeal under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,² and leave to appeal was not required in that case. But even if leave to appeal were held to be necessary, the settlement of the case by the Sheriff on the application of the appellants was equivalent to the granting of leave to appeal.

Dumfries
County
Council v.
Langholm
Magistrates.

At advising on 5th December 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—We have here an appeal in the form of a special case stated by the Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876. The respondents (pursuers in the Sheriff Court proceedings) are the County Council of the county of Dumfries. The defenders (appellants) are the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the police burgh of Langholm. An objection to the competency of the appeal is taken by the respondents. The interlocutor of the learned Sheriff which the appellants seek to bring under our review is dated 29th February 1912. The Sheriff thereby adhered to an interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute (which repelled certain preliminary pleas for the defenders directed against the pursuers' title to sue, and the relevancy and specification of their averments), and remitted the case to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed. The objection to the competency is that this interlocutory appeal, though it is in the form of a special case as directed by the Rivers Pollution Act, cannot be entertained because it is brought without leave asked of and granted by the Sheriff. I think the objection is well founded, and must be sustained.

The Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, which, though applicable to Scotland, is conceived to a great extent in language presumably more familiar to an English than to a Scots lawyer, enacts (section 10) that the County Court (Sheriff Court) having jurisdiction in the place where any offence against the Act is committed, may "by summary order" require any person to abstain from the commission of such offence, and may require him to perform any statutory duty in respect of which he is in default, subject to such conditions as the said Court may think right to insert in the order, with power to the Court, previous to granting such order, to remit to skilled persons to report. Section 11 enacts that "if either party in any proceedings before the County Court" (Sheriff Court) "under this Act feels aggrieved by the decision of the Court in point of law or on the merits, or in respect of the admission or rejection of any evidence, he may appeal" to either Division of the Court of Session. "The appeal shall be in the form of a special case"; and there are further provisions, which I shall presently quote, as to the mode of procedure in such appeal. Reading these sections, I should infer the policy of the Act to be that the appeal in the form of a special case is intended to bring up "the decision" of the lower Court, with all or any of the pleas in law, or on the facts as found by the Sheriff, after the substance of the case has been determined. The "decision" is to be "by summary order." It is obvious that it may often be to the interest of defenders who are charged with some offence under the Act to avail themselves, for the mere sake of delay and putting off the evil day, of every right of appeal they can legally resort to. If the appellants' argument is correct, there might be a series of appeals by way of special case brought, as matter of right, upon successive points of law, fact, or procedure. I do not think the Act contemplated this.

Apart, however, from considerations of general policy, it seems to me that we must decide this question of competency having regard to section 11 of the Rivers Pollution Act and to the existing legislation as to appeals to this Court from the Sheriff Court. I think that section 11 must be read as one consistent whole, and not, as was suggested, to the effect that the first part of it, which I have already quoted, gives an absolute statutory right of appeal in no way limited or affected by what is contained in the later part of the section which I now quote. It provides that "subject to the provisions of this section"—i.e., as I read these words, subject to the appeal being duly taken in the form of a special case—"all the enactments, rules, and orders relating to proceedings in actions in County" (Sheriff) "Courts . . . and to the conditions of such appeals, and to the power of the Superior Courts on such appeals, shall apply to all proceedings under this Act, and to an appeal from such action in the same manner as if such action and appeal related to a matter within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court." In other words, an appeal from the Sheriff Court under section 11 is declared to be subject, apart from the special form in which it must be stated, to all enactments relating to appeals in ordinary Sheriff Court actions. Now, the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (section 28) defines what interlocutors other than "a final judgment," may be appealed to this Court; and these, besides interim decrees for payment and decrees of sist, are interlocutors "against which the Sheriff or the Sheriff-substitute, either ex proprio motu or on the motion of any party, grants leave to appeal." The proviso which follows has in my judgment no application here; for the Rivers Pollution Act makes no "allowance of appeal" except subject to the provisions above quoted. It seems to me clear that an interlocutory appeal like the present, though stated in the form of a special case, is not competent without leave.

The appellants sought to derive aid from what happened in County Council of Lanark v. Magistrates of Airdrie.¹ All that that case decided was that in proceedings under the Rivers Pollution Act an appeal in ordinary form is incompetent; it must be in the form of a special case. The Sheriff's interlocutor which it was there sought to review, though not technically a "final judgment," disposed substantially of the merits of the case, for he found that the defenders admitted that they were permitting sewage matter to fall or flow into the streams condescended on, and were thus committing an offence under the statute; repelled nine out of the ten pleas in law for the defenders; reserved meanwhile their eighth plea and, before making a remit as directed by section 10 of the Act, appointed parties to be heard as to the terms of the remit. The First Division held that the appeal was incompetent. The Lord President in the course of his opinion made Dec. 5, 1912. observations which seem to me to harmonise with what I have said as to the presumed policy of the Act and the scope and effect of an appeal in the form of a special case. But the present appellants found upon some obiter dicta in the opinion of Lord M'Laren. His Lordship pointed out that the interlocutor, not being a final judgment on the merits, could not, as the legislative provisions about appeals then stood, be appealed in the ordinary course, but towards the conclusion of his opinion he stated the view that "the Act does not limit the remedy to one appeal only, for on a question of the rejection of evidence, if the appeal were successful, the case would have to go back to the Sheriff for the evidence to be completed." So far I agree with Lord M'Laren, but I do not gather that he meant that if objection is taken in the course of a proof in the Sheriff Court to the admission or rejection of evidence, the proof must there and then be adjourned until an appeal in the form of a special case upon that objection is decided by this Court, and be thereafter resumed. I apprehend that, the objection being duly noted, the proof would proceed, and the objection could be subsequently considered—either separately, if it were the sole matter of appeal, or along with such other points in law or on the merits as it was desired to bring up for review—by an appeal in the form of a special case afterwards properly presented to this Court. I agree with Lord M'Laren that if the appeal were successful upon a point as to evidence which the Sheriff had improperly rejected, the case would have to go back to the Sheriff Court, and that a second appeal might, in that event, be necessary, and would be competent. But Lord M'Laren went on to say that he considered that, the Sheriff having disposed of a point of law, the appellants' remedy under the circumstances was by means of an appeal in the form of a special case. That question, however, as his Lordship expressly added, was not before the Court, which had no special occasion to consider section 11 closely in relation to the kind of question with which we are now dealing. Lord Kinnear, after summarising the provisions of the section, said: "But that is all to be 'subject to the provisions of this section'; that means that a party is to have the benefit" (and I venture to interpolate "and be subject to the inconveniences, if any") "of all the existing enactments, provided he takes his appeal in the form provided by this section, and not otherwise." This seems to be entirely in accordance with my view of section 11 already expressed. Lord Kinnear added: "I therefore think that in this form the appeal is incompetent, but the appellant's remedy is not thereby taken away, for he can raise all his points on appeal by way of special case, on a proper application to the Sheriff for that purpose." I understand his Lordship to mean that, though the appeal as presented was incompetent, the appellants might competently raise all their points on an appeal by special case brought at the proper time for that purpose. The subsequent history of the Airdrie case¹ discloses that the Sheriff's interlocutor was in fact subsequently brought under the review of the First Division and the House of Lords by an appeal in the form of a special case, but no question of competency was raised or considered.

County
Council v.
Langholm
Magistrates.

Lord Dundas.

I think nothing that was said or done in the Airdrie case¹—to which I have referred at such length on account of the insistent arguments upon it at our bar—affords any warrant for the proposition that, as matters stood prior to 1907, an interlocutor dealing solely with preliminary points such as title to sue and relevancy could competently form the subject of an appeal to this Court under section 11 of the Rivers Pollution Act. It seems to me doubtful whether any interlocutor other than a final judgment could have been so brought up for review, and some confirmation of that view is found in the procedure adopted by a very experienced Sheriff of Midlothian in the Portobello case.² Sheriff Davidson added a note to his interlocutor stating that he had “decerned in the matter of expenses at this stage to enable the defenders to appeal the case immediately.” But however this may be, the present question must, as I think, be decided upon a construction of the existing Act of 1907 and of section 11 of the Rivers Pollution Act; and construing these enactments, I think it is reasonably clear that an interlocutor such as we have here to consider cannot be appealed against without leave, even in the form of a special case. There is no hardship in this result, for the whole pleas of parties can always be brought up as matter of right at the proper time, and if peculiar reasons pointed to the advisability of a special case upon preliminary questions alone, the Sheriff might grant leave for such an appeal; or the course prescribed at the close of section 11 of the Rivers Pollution Act might be resorted to, and an application made at the initial stages of the proceedings, for their removal into the Court of Session, as was done in the recent Midlothian case.³

I should, perhaps, notice in conclusion a suggestion rather faintly made by the appellants’ counsel to the effect that, if leave was necessary here, it must be held to have been granted as matter of inference, from the fact that the Sheriff has stated a case. This, I think, will not do at all. An appeal must be duly noted in writing (see Rule 93 in the First Schedule to the Act of 1907), and when the Sheriff’s leave is necessary, and he is willing to grant it, he must do so in writing. Here there is no written note of appeal, and no signification in writing by the Sheriff that he either grants or refuses leave to appeal. I infer that the learned Sheriff desired to leave the whole question of competency for the decision of this Court.

For the reasons now stated, I think we must sustain the objection to the competency of this appeal.

The case was sent to the Summar Roll to be heard, reserving the question of competency. For the sake of convenience, and to avoid unnecessary expense, we heard counsel upon the merits of the appeal. It may be permissible, especially as one of your Lordships is of opinion that the appeal is competently before us, to say in a word that the appellants’ case appeared to me to possess no merits at all. The argument in support of it was in my judgment, and I believe in that of both my brethren, barely stateable.

LORD SALVESEN.—I cannot help regretting that a difficult question of Dec. 5, 1912. competency should have been raised in an appeal which admits of easy decision on its merits; but as we cannot proceed to consider the merits until we have held the appeal competent, and as the argument against the competency was strenuously maintained, it is our duty to decide it.

Dumfries
County
Council v.
Langholm
Magistrates.

The right of appeal in proceedings before the Sheriff presented under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, depends upon the construction of section 11. The First Division in the Airdrie case¹ held that these provisions are exhaustive and exclude the common law right of appeal. A statutory form of appeal by way of a special case is provided instead. Provided this form of appeal is used, any party aggrieved by "the decision of the Court in point of law or on the merits, or in respect of the admission or rejection of any evidence, may appeal from that decision" to the Court of Session. It was maintained that this clause must be read along with the previous section, which deals with the Sheriff pronouncing an order requiring a person to abstain from the commission of an offence under the Act and the conditions on which it is granted, and that "the decision of the Court" referred to in section 11 means either a final decision, or, at all events, one which settles the main controversy between the parties. I am unable so to read it. Such a decision would be a decision on the merits, but the appeal allowed embraces decisions on points of law in addition to decisions on the merits. In the present case the Sheriff has repelled a plea of no title to sue, which is a decision on a point of law. It can therefore, in my opinion, be properly brought up for review by means of a special case.

The view that I have arrived at appears to me to be in accordance with the opinions of Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear in the case I have already referred to. After referring to the terms of the Act, Lord M'Laren said: "I think it follows that the Act does not limit the remedy to one appeal only, for on a question of the rejection of evidence, if the appeal were successful, the case would have to go back to the Sheriff for the evidence to be completed. But here the Sheriff has disposed of a point of law; and if I were entitled to advise the appellants, I should advise that their remedy under the circumstances was by means of an appeal in the form of a special case"; and Lord Kinnear, after holding that an appeal in common form was incompetent, said: "But the appellant's remedy is not thereby taken away, for he can raise all his points on appeal by way of special case, on a proper application to the Sheriff for that purpose."

It is interesting to note that Lord M'Laren's advice was taken; and an appeal by way of special case was afterwards presented and entertained without objection, under circumstance which are, in my opinion, indistinguishable from those that are present here. No doubt the point that was argued before us was not taken; and the observations of the two Judges quoted above were obiter, so that there is no binding decision on the matter; but I agree with these observations, and I think the subsequent history of the Airdrie case² shows that they were understood by the parties as substantially settling the question of the competency of an appeal on a point of law before there had been inquiry.

Dumfries
County
Council v.
Langholm
Magistrates.

Lord Salvesen.

I would only add further that a decision on the merits may involve questions of law as well as questions of fact; but I think the Act intended to give a right of appeal on incidental questions of law which might arise before the merits were reached. There can be no better illustration of this than a decision repelling or sustaining a plea of no title. I am not moved by the suggestion that it is inconvenient to have appeals to this Court from interlocutory judgments, and that the right of appeal is liable to be abused for the sake of obtaining delay. The same observation might be made with regard to the provisions of the recent Sheriff Courts Act, which represents the mature views of the Legislature as to the decisions of the Sheriff which it is considered desirable should be appealable to the Court of Session. But the inconvenience is not all on one side. Nothing, for instance, could be more unfortunate than that there should be inquiry into the merits when it might turn out in the end that the pursuer had no title to sue.

It is not necessary, however, further to elaborate this matter, as I understand both your Lordships to hold that this appeal is incompetent on the second ground argued, namely, that the Sheriff has not granted leave to appeal, and that the interlocutor appealed against, if it had been pronounced in an ordinary action, would not have been appealable without such leave. I fully recognise that such a restriction upon the right of appeal where the decision is not final might be very desirable, as the Sheriff would presumably not grant leave unless he considered there was a real question of law to be decided, and so mere dilatory appeals would be excluded. The question, however, is whether the proviso at the end of the section introduced this limitation on the statutory right of appeal already conferred by the earlier part. When one turns to the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, I think it will be found that no provision is made for an appeal in the form of a special case. The rules of procedure connected with appeals, so far as they were founded on by the respondents, all deal with appeals in ordinary course. Where an interlocutor is appealable to the Court of Session without leave, all that the appellant has to do is to write upon the interlocutor sheet or on a separate paper a note of appeal. He does not need to consult the Sheriff; and when the note of appeal has been duly signed, the process is transmitted by the Sheriff-clerk to the Court of Session. Where the interlocutor is one which requires leave, the appellant must ask and obtain leave within four days of its signature. This procedure does not appear to me to be applicable to an appeal in the form of a special case. I understand that your Lordships are prepared to hold that an application for a special case should take the place of an application for leave to appeal. I see no warrant for so adapting the language of the Sheriff Courts Act to circumstances to which it does not apply. It is only after the parties have failed to agree on the form of a special case that under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act an application falls to be made to the Sheriff to state a case. If parties agree, the Sheriff is not asked to intervene, and there is no time limit within which the case falls to be adjusted. I fail to see, therefore, how the rules relating to an appeal of a totally different kind can be made applicable to this special form. On the same footing, it would seem to follow that if the appealing days prescribed for an ordinary appeal have expired before the special case has been adjusted, the appeal would be incompetent. The ordinary rules prescribed by the Sheriff Courts Act Dec. 5, 1912. become still more difficult to apply in the case of an appeal founded on the rejection or admission of evidence. Is the statutory right of appeal to ^{Dumfries} County Council v. ^{Langholm} Magistrates. depend in this case also on leave being granted? I apprehend that would be to take away the right of appeal expressly conferred in probably a majority of the cases to which it applied. It was suggested that the proof before the Sheriff would have to be stopped so as to admit of a special case being presented to determine the validity of the Sheriff's finding on the question of his rejection or admission of the evidence. I do not agree. I think the Sheriff would continue to take the proof so far as he held it competent; although in the ordinary case it might be well for him to delay issuing his decision until he ascertained whether his rulings were sound, or whether further evidence required to be led, otherwise he might find himself in the position of having issued a decision on a proof which had only partially been led, or allowed his mind to be influenced by evidence which he ought not to have admitted. This serves to illustrate how impossible it is to apply a code of procedure, designed to regulate the recognised mode of appealing the judgment of an inferior Court, to an appeal on specific grounds and in a form which I understand is only recognised in this particular statute.

I regret, therefore, that I am unable to concur with the majority of your Lordships in holding that this objection to the competency is well founded. It is not for the Court to legislate so as to create a new code of procedure applicable to a case for which the Sheriff Courts Act of 1907, which now regulates appeals in ordinary cases, makes no provision. If the latter clause of the section is read as your Lordships propose, it really takes away the right of appeal conferred by the statute on points of law, or on the admission or rejection of evidence, unless the Sheriff grants leave to appeal within a given number of days after his interlocutor has been pronounced. I may add that the alleged advantage from so construing the section is really more apparent than real; because I think it may be assumed that parties will not agree upon a special case, and, failing agreement, that the Sheriff will not state such a case unless there is some genuine question of law for the decision of a superior Court. On these grounds I am of opinion that this objection to competency also fails.

On the merits, all I need say is that I entirely agree with the opinion of the Sheriff as expressed in his note, and indeed I think the argument for the appellants was barely stateable.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair. This case was sent to the Roll to be heard on the merits, reserving the question of competency. Being of opinion that the case is not competently before the Court, we are not in a position to consider, still less to decide, the merits. But it is right to say that my impression is, not only that the appeal was unfounded, but that the only objection brought before us was so plainly unstateable that I should have been surprised had the Sheriff, if the request had been made to him, granted leave to appeal.

The question of competency depends on section 11 and section 21 (5), (6), (7) of the Rivers Pollution Act of 1876 and section 28 (c) and Rules 92 and 93 of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1907.

Dec. 5, 1912.

Dumfries
County
Council v.
Langholm
Magistrates.

Lord Guthrie.

The appellants say that, under the first paragraph of section 11 of the 1876 Act, they got an unqualified and unconditional right to appeal such judgments as those of the Sheriff-substitute of 29th January 1912 and of the Sheriff of 29th February 1912, by way of a special case prepared and adjusted as this one has been. They contend that the provisions of the fourth paragraph (read along with section 21), under which "all the enactments, rules, and orders relating to proceedings in [the Sheriff Courts of Scotland], and to enforcing judgments in [Sheriff Courts], and appeals from decisions of the [Sheriffs], and to the conditions of such appeals, and to the power of the superior Courts on such appeals, shall apply to all proceedings under this Act, and to an appeal from such action in the same manner as if such action and appeal related to a matter within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court," do not apply to or qualify or control the absolute right of appeal contained in the first paragraph of section 11.

If the appellants are wrong in this view, they do not seriously dispute that, before the interlocutors in question could be appealed from the Sheriff to the Court of Session, leave to appeal would be required, which could be granted ex proprio motu or on an application for leave to appeal, in terms of section 28 (c). It was suggested indeed, rather than argued, that the Sheriff's signature of the present stated case implied, or was equivalent to, leave to appeal having been granted by him. But, apart from the fact that the respondents have throughout kept open their objection to the competency of the stated case, there is no provision in the statute, if leave to appeal be necessary, for any equivalent to the regular procedure.

I cannot assent to the appellants' view. I see no reason to think it probable, and it seems to me to be in plain opposition to the terms of section 11. It is true that there are no qualifications and conditions in the first paragraph of section 11. But that paragraph is only part of a section, and the whole section must be read together. It is true also that the qualifications and conditions, in the fourth paragraph of the section, are prefaced by the words "subject to the provisions of this section." But it does not appear to me that these words introduce any difficulty. They would only have done so if there had been any insuperable difficulty in reading the condition in question consistently with the second paragraph of the section, or any intolerable hardship caused by so doing. I confess I see neither insuperable difficulty nor intolerable hardship, or any difficulty or hardship at all. Taking the section as a whole, I read it as allowing an appeal in the form of a special case against an interlocutory judgment in a prosecution under the Act, but only on leave to appeal having been got by the ordinary statutory method.

It was said that the respondents' contention was inconsistent with the case of the County Council of Lanark v. Magistrates of Airdrie.¹ But the point was not taken in that case.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent, and remitted the case to the Sheriff to proceed as accords.

Ship—Bill of lading—Seaworthiness—Exemption in bill of lading from liability for latent defect—Effect of incorporation in bill of lading of Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904.

A bill of lading contained a stipulation that "any latent defects in the hull and tackle shall not be considered unseaworthiness, provided the same did not [result from want of due diligence of the owner . . . or manager." By a "clause paramount" it was provided that the bill of lading was "to be read and construed as if every clause therein contained which is rendered illegal or null or void by the [Australian] Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904, had never been inserted therein." Held, that the incorporation of that Act in the bill of lading did not render the stipulation as to latent defects null and void; and that it was open to the shipowners, sued for damages to the cargo arising from unseaworthiness due to defects in the ship, to establish as a defence that the defects were latent and did not result from want of due diligence on their part.

ON 17th January 1912 Charlton & Bagshaw, cornbrokers, Liverpool, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Thomas Law & Company, shipowners, Glasgow, in which they claimed payment of £202, 10s., in respect of damage to a cargo of wheat carried by the defenders in their ship "Elginshire," from Sydney to Liverpool, under bill of lading dated 11th April 1911, of which the pursuers were endorsees and holders.

"Shipped in good order and condition by W. R. Cave & Co. on board the good ship 'Elginshire,' . . . forty-two thousand six hundred and seventy-seven bags wheat being marked and numbered as in the margin, and to be delivered (subject to the exceptions and stipulations hereinafter mentioned) in the like good order and condition. . . . (1) The following are the exceptions and stipulations referred to:—The Act of God, Perils of the Sea [and other usual exceptions]. . . . But nothing herein contained shall exempt the shipowner from liability to pay for damage to cargo occasioned by bad stowage, by improper or insufficient dunnage, or ventilation, or by improper opening of valves, sluices, and ports, or by causes other than those above excepted, and all the above exceptions are conditional on the vessel being seaworthy when she sails on her voyage; but any latent defects in the hull and tackle shall not be considered unseaworthiness, provided the same did not result from want of due diligence of the owner, or any of them, or of the ship's husband or manager."

On the discharge of the cargo at Liverpool, part of the wheat was found to be damaged by seawater.

The pursuers averred:—"Said damage was caused by the said ship being in an unseaworthy and unfit condition at the commencement of said voyage to carry said cargo safely. In particular, the planking of the starboard side of the fore deck, in the neighbourhood of the forward hatchway, was much worn and very thin, and so decayed as to be unable to withstand the ordinary wear and tear of the voyage undertaken, and of the vessel working in a seaway, with the result that during the ordinary working of the vessel during the voyage water was admitted and damaged the wheat. Farther, there was not any dunnage protecting the goods on the middle stringer of the lower hold which it was necessary should have been there, and the dunnage in the neighbourhood of the foremast was quite insufficient to protect the goods from leaking through the mast coat. Farther, the ceiling not being grain tight, a quantity of loose wheat was found in the bilges damaged."

The defenders denied these averments, and averred;—"If any defect existed at the beginning of the voyage (which is denied), it was a latent defect, and not resulting from the want of due diligence on the part of the defenders or of the ship's husband or manager."

"(a) insert in any bill of lading or document any clause, covenant, or agreement declared by this Act to be illegal; or

"(b) make, sign, or execute any bill of lading or document containing any clause, covenant, or agreement declared by this Act to be illegal.

"Penalty: One hundred pounds.

"8. (1) In every bill of lading with respect to goods, a warranty shall be implied that the ship shall be, at the beginning of the voyage, seaworthy in all respects, and properly manned, equipped, and supplied.

"(2) In every bill of lading in respect to goods, unless the contrary intention appears, a clause shall be implied whereby, if the ship is at the beginning of the voyage seaworthy in all respects, and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the ship nor her owner, master, agent, or charterer shall be responsible for damage to or loss of the goods resulting from—

"(a) faults or errors in navigation [and a number of other causes]."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders' statements are irrelevant. Dec. 5, 1912.

On 9th March 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains pursuers' second plea quoad the defence founded upon the following exception in the bill of lading:—'But any latent defects in the hull and tackle shall not be considered unseaworthiness provided the same did not result from want of due diligence of the owner or any of them or of the ship's husband or manager': Finds that this exception is ruled out of the contract by the terms of the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904, which is incorporated in the bill of lading by the clause paramount: Quoad ultra repels pursuers' second plea: Allows a proof" &c. Charlton &
Bugshaw v.
Law & Co.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Millar), who, on 11th July 1912, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor of 9th March 1912, in so far as it sustains the pursuers' second plea in law quoad the defence founded upon the exception in the bill of lading therein narrated, and the finding that the exception is ruled out of the contract by the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904, which is incorporated in the bill of lading by the clause paramount: Quoad ultra adheres to the said interlocutor: Allows both parties a proof of their averments, and remits the cause to the Sheriff-substitute for further procedure."*

* "NOTE.— . . . Under the common law a shipowner, apart from express stipulation, is liable in absolute warrandice of the ship as to seaworthiness—that is to say, he not only undertakes due diligence to make the ship seaworthy, but he is liable further for any latent defect in the ship which makes it unseaworthy. That absolute warrandice on the part of the shipowner may be varied by express agreement so as to limit, or even terminate, any warrandice on his part.

"In the bill of lading, which is the basis of the contract in the present case, the following exception is introduced among the others narrated in it:—'But any latent defects in the hull or tackle shall not be considered unseaworthiness provided the same did not result from want of due diligence of the owner or any of them or of the ship's husband or manager.' The reply of the pursuers is that this clause is struck at by the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904, passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia. This statute is introduced into the contract by the clause paramount, printed in red ink at the top of the bill of lading, which says:—[The Sheriff quoted the clause paramount]. The effect of that is that the words of the Sea Carriage of Goods Act are introduced into the bill of lading, and must be 'construed simply as words occurring in this bill of lading'—Lord Esher in Dobell & Company v. Steamship 'Rossmore' Company, [1895] 2 Q. B. 408. Excerpts from the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904, have been produced, and the terms of the Act, so far as relating to this point, are given in Carver's Carriage by Sea (5th edition), at page 998. The section upon which both parties relied, although other sections were quoted by way of illustration, was section 5 (b):—[The Sheriff quoted the subsection]. It seems to me that the first part of that section expresses the nature of the obligation on the owner or charterer, and the second part the purpose for which that obligation is to be enforced. The obligation on the owner or charterer is to exercise due diligence and to properly man, equip, and supply the ship, and the purpose is to make and keep the ship seaworthy, and to make and keep the ship's hold, &c., fit and safe. In other words, the owner or charterer is to exercise due diligence and to properly man, &c., so as to make the ship seaworthy, and to make and keep the ship's hold, &c., fit and safe. The part of the clause as to properly

Charlton &
Bagshaw v.
Law & Co.

The Sheriff having granted leave to appeal, the pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 12th November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The defence of latent defect was irrelevant in view of the provisions of the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904 (Australia), which was incorporated in the bill of lading by the clause paramount. (1) The Act, by section 8 (1), provided that an absolute warranty of seaworthiness should be implied in every bill of lading. By contrast with the terms of section 8 (2), where the words "unless the contrary intention appears" were inserted, it was evident that this was not a mere statement of the common law warranty of seaworthiness which might be superseded by contract, but an express enactment which the parties to a bill of lading had no power to alter. (2) In any event, section 5 (b) of the Act expressly annulled any contract which weakened the absolute warranty of seaworthiness. That section dealt with four separate classes of obligation, viz.:—(a) To exercise due diligence. (b) Properly to man, equip, and supply the ship. (c) To make and keep the ship seaworthy. (d) To make and keep the ship's hold, &c., fit for the carriage of goods. The class of obligations to make and keep seaworthy was not qualified by the phrase "to exercise due diligence," nor by the words "to properly man, equip, and supply." The seaworthiness of a ship was manning, equipping, and supplying the ship does not apply to the exception in the bill of lading in question, and, therefore, we are left with the words 'any obligation of the owner or charterer to exercise due diligence, to make and keep the ship seaworthy, and to make and keep the ship's hold, &c., fit and safe.' The result of that examination of the clause is that section 5 declares that, where any bill of lading or document contains any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby any obligations of the owner or charterer of any ship to exercise due diligence to make and keep the ship seaworthy, and to make and keep the ship's hold, &c., fit and safe, is weakened, that clause, covenant, or agreement shall be illegal, null, and void, and of no effect. Now, if the clause only refers to exercising due diligence, that does not apply to a clause which exempts the owner from liability for a latent defect of which he had no knowledge and, therefore, could not have avoided by any diligence on his part. The clause in the bill of lading in question is one which does deal with latent defect, and, therefore, I do not think that the Sea Carriage of Goods Act declares it illegal, null, and void, and of no effect.

"The question may be illustrated by the effect given in the American Courts to the Harter Act, which has a similar clause to that in the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, although not exactly in the same terms. The Harter Act is set out on page 144 of Carver on Carriage by Sea, above referred to, and the section is section 2 of the Act. At section 103 (c) of his book, page 147, he says:—'On the other hand, there seems to be no prohibition of clauses framed to relieve shipowners of the absolute warranty of seaworthiness of the ship on sailing, which, under United States law as well as English law, is implied in the absence of express agreement, . . . thus an exception of latent defect in the hull or machinery has been held to be valid'; and he quotes two cases that have been decided in the United States to that effect. That opinion in Mr Carver's book supports the view which I have ventured to take. Accordingly, I think the interlocutor must be recalled in so far as it sustains the pursuers' second plea, and that a proof should be allowed to both parties of their averments."

a matter distinct from its manning, equipment, and supply.¹ *Macfadden v. Blue Star Line*² and "Carib Prince"³ were decided on the terms of the United States Act of Congress known as the Harter Act,⁴ and had no application, because that Act only required due diligence of the shipowner and did not impose an absolute warranty of seaworthiness. Dec. 5, 1912.
Charlton &
Bagshaw v.
Law & Co.

Argued for the respondents;—The stipulation in the bill of lading that latent defects should not be considered unseaworthiness was valid. (1) Section 8 (1) of the Act merely stated the existing common law warranty which could be contracted out of; but even reading it as a clause in the contract, nothing in the Act, or in the bill of lading, made it incompetent for the parties to waive that clause, as they had done. Incorporation in a bill of lading of the Harter Act, which was in similar terms to the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, had no effect on the warranty implied at common law, and did not prevent contracting out of the common law warranty so as to exempt the owner from liability for latent defects.⁵ (2) The obligations referred to in section 5 (b) of the Act were obligations "to exercise due diligence" and "to properly man, equip, and supply the ship," in each case so as "to make and keep the ship seaworthy." To "make and keep" seaworthy was a higher obligation than that imposed at common law, and therefore it would naturally be qualified by the words "due diligence." On the appellants' construction of the section the word "and" after "diligence" was ungrammatical, and the exercise of "due diligence," regarded as a separate obligation, was so vague an expression as to be meaningless, especially when the subsequent clauses exhausted the shipowners' duty. The words "man, equip, and supply" raised no difficulty, because failure to do so properly would result in unseaworthiness.⁶ In construing the section there was a presumption in favour of the respondents' view, because (1) the Act was to be read as part of the bill of lading, and therefore must be construed consistently with the terms of the bill of lading, and so as to give effect to all of them, including the exemption of latent defects, if possible; and (2) by section 7 a penalty of £100 was imposed for any contravention of the Act, and therefore it ought to be construed as favourably as possible towards the respondents.

At advising on 5th December 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The pursuers, a firm of cornbrokers in Liverpool, sue the defenders, who are shipowners in Glasgow, for £202, 10s., being loss and damage alleged to have been sustained by them on a parcel of wheat carried by the defenders' ship "Elginshire" from Sydney to Liverpool, under a bill of lading of which the pursuers are endorsees and holders.

Dec. 5, 1912. The defenders on record tender £125. The sum here at stake is therefore not a large one ; but a difficult and important question of construction is raised. If the case is to be fought out, there must admittedly be proof ; but the pursuers seek at this stage to exclude from probation a certain portion of the defenders' averments. The Sheriff-substitute decided this point in the pursuers' favour, but the Sheriff took an opposite view, and the pursuers have appealed.

Charlton &
Bagshaw v.
Law & Co.

Lord Dundas.

The pursuers aver (Cond. 4) that "said damage was caused by the said ship being in an unseaworthy and unfit condition at the commencement of said voyage to carry said cargo safely." The defenders (Ans. 4) deny this, and aver "that the vessel was in every respect seaworthy and fit to carry said cargo safely" ; but they further say that "if any defect existed at the beginning of the voyage, which is denied, it was a latent defect, and not resulting from the want of due diligence on the part of the defenders or of the ship's husband or manager." The defenders accordingly found upon the express exception in the bill of lading that "any latent defects in the hull and tackle shall not be considered unseaworthiness, provided the same did not result from want of due diligence of the owner (sic), or any of them, or of the ship's husband or manager." The pursuers retort by referring to the terms of the clause paramount, which I need not quote. They say that the exception about latent defects and due diligence is "illegal, null, and void, and of no effect," because it is, in the language of section 5 (b) of the Australian Act of 1904, a clause or covenant whereby the obligations of the owner "to exercise due diligence, and to properly man, equip, and supply the ship, to make and keep the ship seaworthy," &c., is "lessened, weakened, or avoided." The learned Sheriff has decided the point against the pursuers. I have come to the same result, but by a somewhat different line of reasoning.

The Sheriff has expressed, in a careful note, his view of the construction to be put upon section 5 (b) of the Act of 1904. The construction is a feasible one ; but I confess I should have great difficulty in adopting it as being what the Legislature meant in 1904, mainly owing to the terms of section 8 (1) of the Act, which, by the way, are equally imported into the contract by the concluding words of the clause paramount. Section 8 (1) enacts, apparently as a matter of public policy, that in every bill of lading a warranty shall be implied that the ship shall be at the commencement of the voyage seaworthy in all respects, and properly manned, equipped, and supplied. Subsection (2) deals with certain presumptions (in favour of the shipowner) which shall also be implied, unless the contrary intention appears. It rather seems to me that the scheme of the Act is that the absolute warranty of subsection (1) is not to be capable of avoidance or qualification, though the exceptions of subsection (2) might be waived by consent. It is true that the warranty of seaworthiness under subsection 1 is no more than what the common law recognises, and that such common law warrandice may be varied or excluded by agreement of parties. But it seems to me that the terms of subsection (1), in marked contrast to those of subsection (2), are absolute, and not merely "unless the contrary intention appears." I am disposed, therefore, to think that section 8 (1) presents a serious difficulty in the way of adopting the Sheriff's construction of section 5 (b), because its warranty of seaworthiness being, as I think, absolute and Dec. 5, 1912.

 indefeasible, any clause in the contract which bears to lessen or avoid the owner's obligation inherent in that warranty is by section 5 (b) null and void.
Charlton &
Bagshaw v.
Law & Co.

After all, however, and this to my mind lies at the root of the whole Lord Dundas.
 matter, we are not here considering the effect of an Act of Parliament having the force of public law in limiting or annulling the agreement of private parties. The question is as to what the parties to this particular instrument, most unhappily framed as it is, intended to agree to by their contract. They have incorporated the Act, but have put their own interpretation on it, as they were entitled to do, in interpreting the word "unseaworthiness." The parties say and agree that it shall not include latent defects not arising from want of due diligence. So viewing the question, I think one must conclude, looking to the express and unambiguous terms of the clause in the bill of lading, that the parties cannot have intended its effect to be overridden by the incorporation, in quite general terms, of the whole provisions of the Act of 1904. I must say, however, that I do not admire the form of contract here resorted to. The bill of lading contains express clauses and stipulations; but it is prefaced (truly rather by way of postscript) by the clause paramount, which imports into the contract all the terms and provisions of an Act of Parliament per aversionem, and declares that the bill of lading is to be construed as if every clause in it which is rendered illegal, null, and void by that Act had never been inserted in it, or had been cancelled from it. It would surely have been simpler and more rational to adjust the bill of lading so as to show plainly on the face of its own language what it means, and what its stipulations and exemptions are meant to be. The mode in which this instrument is patched together seems to me to be in the highest degree complicated and clumsy, and calculated to give rise (as it has done) to dispute and litigation. It is to me surprising that it should be adopted or tolerated in the mercantile world.

I have said nothing about the Harter Act, or the decisions pronounced upon it. Its language is not the same as that of the Australian Act of 1904, its second clause is not identical with section 5 of the latter Act, and it does not seem to contain any clause corresponding to section 8 of the Act of 1904. It appears to me that it might be rash to proceed upon supposed analogies derivable from a different Act, or from decisions as to its language. I prefer to base my judgment upon a construction of the particular instrument before us.

On the whole matter I am of opinion, though not without some difficulty and hesitation, that we ought to affirm the interlocutor of the learned Sheriff, and send the case back to the Court below for proof.

LORD SALVESEN.—In this case I am of the same opinion as the Sheriff. The only point in controversy turns upon the construction of certain clauses in the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904, passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia. The apparent object of that Act was to prevent shipowners in charter-parties or bills of lading stipulating that they should be exempt from liability for loss or damage to cargo carried in their

Dec. 5, 1912. Charlton & Bagshaw v. Law & Co.
Lord Salvesen. vessels where it appeared to the Legislature of the Commonwealth that such exemptions were unreasonable or inequitable or contrary to public policy. In its general scheme the Act is therefore similar to the Harter Act—an Act of the Congress of the United States which came into force in 1893, and which has been the subject of construction in several cases both in the United States and in England. It was justly observed, however, in the course of the argument that the decisions with regard to the Harter Act have no proper application to the Act with which we are now concerned, as its language, although in some respects similar, is by no means the same. It is, however, permissible to observe that in the view of the framers of the Harter Act it was not deemed unreasonable that a shipowner should protect himself from liability in respect of the unseaworthiness of his vessel where due diligence had been used properly to equip, man, provision, and outfit the vessel, and to make her seaworthy and capable of performing her intended voyage. Accordingly, a bill of lading which, as in the present case, stipulates that any latent defects in the hull and tackle shall not be considered unseaworthiness, provided the same did not result from want of due diligence of the owners or any of them or of the ship's husband or master, is not struck at as an illegal stipulation under the Harter Act.

With these general observations I proceed to consider whether the stipulation to which I have just referred is rendered illegal by the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904, which, by what is called the "clause paramount," is incorporated in the bill of lading, and is declared to govern the construction of the whole clauses therein contained. The two sections of the Act chiefly relied on were sections 5 (b) and 8 (1). I do not attach any importance to the latter, because it is merely expressive of the common law of this country, and I presume also of Australia. Now, our common law, although it implies a warranty of the seaworthiness of a vessel in every contract of carriage, does not prevent a shipowner from making an agreement with the shipper of goods for qualifying this warranty. There is no provision in section 8 (1) that any stipulation which qualifies the absolute warranty is to be treated as null or void; and I take it that the section is merely declaratory of the obligations of the shipowner with regard to the seaworthiness of his ship at the commencement of the voyage where parties have not expressly contracted with regard to this matter.

Section 5, however, deals with the case of a bill of lading, and provides that any clauses whereby "(b) any obligations of the owner or charterer of any ship to exercise due diligence and to properly man, equip, and supply the ship, to make and keep the ship seaworthy, and to make and keep the ship's hold, refrigerating and cool chambers and all other parts of the ship in which goods are carried, fit and safe for their reception, carriage, and preservation are in anywise lessened, weakened, or avoided . . . shall be illegal, null and void, and of no effect." The argument for the appellants was that this section is to be construed as dealing with obligations of four different classes: to wit, obligations (first) to use due diligence; (second) to properly man, equip, and supply the ship; (third) to make and keep the ship seaworthy; and (fourth) to make and keep the ship's hold, &c., fit and safe for the reception, carriage, and preservation of cargo. On this reading it is admittedly impossible to account for the "and" which Dec. 5, 1912, connects the first two clauses, and difficult to explain why so vague a clause as "to exercise due diligence" should stand by itself, more especially as any breach of the Act, by inserting in any bill of lading any clause, covenant, or agreement declared by the Act to be illegal, is a penal offence. The Sheriff has accordingly rejected this interpretation, and holds that the particle "to" in front of the clause "make and keep the ship seaworthy," &c., is to be construed as equivalent to "so as to." In my opinion that is the proper, as it is a perfectly natural, interpretation. The due diligence which the shipowner is called upon to exercise is diligence "to make and keep the ship seaworthy, and to make and keep the ship's hold fit and safe for cargo," and the same applies to the immediately succeeding clause, "and to properly man, equip, and supply the ship." Unless the subsection is so read, there is no standard of what constitutes "proper manning, equipment," and so on. The obligation in that case is an absolute one, and rightly so, because there is no difficulty in the shipowner ascertaining what is the proper crew to man his ship, or the equipment and supplies which are required that she may be seaworthy for the contemplated voyage. The other obligation is merely one of due diligence, for a defect constituting unseaworthiness may be latent and not capable of being discovered by ordinary care and vigilance. So read, the subsection as a whole is perfectly reasonable and is in line with the Harter Act, on which no doubt it was largely modelled. On the other view there would be an absolute obligation imposed upon the shipowner of keeping the ship seaworthy even when she had been injured on a voyage and could not be repaired while the voyage lasted, and any qualification of this absolute obligation in the bill of lading would be a penal offence. The common law obligation in such a case is just what is expressed in the clause, namely, that due diligence must be exercised to keep the ship seaworthy, but the common law is not so unreasonable as to exact performance of what may be impossible. On these grounds I have reached the same conclusion as the Sheriff, and I think we should adhere to the interlocutor appealed from.

LORD GUTHRIE concurred with Lord Dundas.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff.

No. 45. WALTER BOWIE AND OTHERS (William Bowie's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Constable, K.C.—Russell.

Dec. 5, 1912.

MRS ELIZABETH ASHWORTH HARRISON OR WATSON AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Morison, K.C.—MacRobert.

Bowie's
Trustees v.
Watson.

Agent and Client—Fraud of Agent—Liability of client—Bond left in custody of agent—Fraudulent discharge of bond by agent.

Sale of Heritage—Assignment of Writs—Right in Security—Bond fraudulently discharged handed to innocent purchaser of property—Right of purchaser to retain bond.

The purchaser of a certain property, burdened with a bond, paid the full price of the property, and received along with the disposition the bond and a forged discharge thereof from the seller's agent, who was also agent for the bondholders and had custody of the bond. On the agent's death it was found that he had embezzled the sum in the bond. In an action by the bondholders against the purchaser of the property for delivery of the bond,—

Held that the pursuers were entitled to delivery of the bond in respect (1) that the bond was not one of the property titles carried to the defender by the assignment of writs, (2) that the pursuers, having given their agent no authority to discharge the bond, were not liable for his fraudulent discharge thereof.

1ST DIVISION. ON 11th April 1911 Walter Bowie, farmer, Paisley, and others, the
Ld. Ormisdale. testamentary trustees of the late William Bowie, farmer, Paisley, brought an action against William Goudie, New Jersey, U.S.A., the seller of a certain heritable property, and Mrs Watson, Craignair, Bridge of Weir, the purchaser of it, and her husband, Thomas Watson, as her curator and administrator-in-law, for reduction of a discharge, bearing to be signed by the pursuers, of a bond and disposition in security in their favour granted by Goudie over the property; and secondly, for delivery to them of the bond then in the hands of Mrs Watson.

The following narrative of the circumstances is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—"The pursuers of this action are testamentary trustees. In the course of administering their trust they lent at Whitsunday 1904 the sum of £500 to the defender William Goudie, receiving in security of their loan a bond and disposition in security over certain heritable property, consisting of a house at Bridge of Weir called 'Craignair.' William Bowie, a writer in Paisley, was agent for both parties in the transaction.

"The pursuers aver—and the argument proceeded on the footing—that William Bowie was the agent in the trust, and that the bond and disposition in security, with the other trust papers, were retained by him in that capacity. The interest on the loan was regularly accounted for by him to the pursuers down to Whitsunday 1910. Mr Bowie died in September 1910.

"At Whitsunday 1909 the defender William Goudie sold and disposed the property which formed the subject of the security to the defender Mrs Watson for £650, William Bowie acting as his agent in the matter. Mrs Watson employed another agent to represent her, and through him paid the £650 to William Bowie. Along with the disposition of the property Mrs Watson received, and now has in her possession, a discharge of the bond, bearing to be signed by the pursurers, and the bond itself. It is not now disputed that the signatures of the pursuers to the discharge are forged, and that the whole of the £500 was embezzled by William Bowie. Dec. 5, 1912.

Bowie's
Trustees v.
Watson.

"The pursuers have raised the present action for reduction of the discharge, and for the delivery to them of the bond and disposition in security. Defences have been lodged by Mrs Watson and her husband, who state that they are willing to hand over the bond on receiving in exchange therefor £500. No defences were lodged for William Goudie."

With regard to the conclusions for delivery the pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The said pretended discharge being reduced, the defender Mrs Watson, as being in possession of the said bond and disposition in security, should be ordained to deliver same to the pursuers, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defender Mrs Watson having paid the said sum of £650 conditionally upon receiving a valid disposition to Craignair, and in addition, the said bond and disposition in security and a discharge thereof, and having received said deeds in good faith, is entitled to retain the said bond and disposition in security and discharge until repaid the said sum of £500. (4) Separatim, the pursuers having entrusted the custody of said bond and disposition in security to the said William Bowie, are barred from obtaining redelivery thereof from these defenders, who received the same bona fide and for value, until they repay to the defenders the said sum of £500. (5) In any event, the pursuers having received payment of the said sum of £500 by their agent, the defenders Mr and Mrs Watson should be assoilzied.

On 13th June 1911, on the motion of the pursuers, the comparing defenders not opposing, decree was pronounced in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons; and on 11th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced this further interlocutor:—"Decerns and ordains the defender Mrs Elizabeth Ashworth Harrison or Watson to deliver up to the pursuers the bond and disposition in security described in the summons." *

* "OPINION.—[After the narrative quoted supra—I have now to decide by which of two perfectly innocent parties the loss brought about by the fraudulent conduct of William Bowie is to be borne.

"The law-agent of the pursuers, William Bowie, had no implied authority either to call up the bond or to accept repayment of the loan (Peden v. Graham, (1907) 15 S. L. T. 143), and it is not averred that they had given him any special authority to do either the one or the other—I am unable, therefore, to say that they were in any sense blameworthy or negligent in allowing William Bowie to retain possession of the bond.

"And on the other hand, I cannot see how the purchaser of the property could have carried through the sale in any other way than she did. It is not suggested that William Bowie was otherwise than a reputable agent at the time of the transaction. Mrs Watson paid a full price for the subjects, and was entitled to obtain a clear title. She took the usual steps for doing so, and she only paid the price on obtaining what purported to be a clear title.

"But the discharge which was handed to her, and which bears that the amount of the loan had been received from her by the creditors in the bond, has been reduced, the deed being admittedly a nullity. The compearing defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Mackenzie, and Lord Cullen) on 5th December 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) The defender Mrs Watson was entitled to retain the bond as one of the writs included in the clause of assignation of writs in the disposition of the property. (2) Further, she was entitled to retain the bond, in respect that she had paid a full price for the property, and had received a discharge of the bond from the pursuers' agent who had implied authority to give it.¹ (3) In any event, the pursuers should suffer the loss resulting from their own agent's fraud, rather than the defender, who was not connected with it in any way.²

bour Trustees, (1880) 7 R. 645). What she did do was to pay to William Bowie, as agent for William Goudie, the seller of the property, £650, and William Bowie embezzled £500 of that sum, took the bond from the repositories of the pursuers in his office, and, along with what purported to be a discharge of the bond, but which was no discharge, handed it to the purchaser. He had no authority to deal with the bond in connection with the sale of the security subjects, and it seems to me that the legal position as in a question with the purchaser was just the same as if he had picked the bond from the pocket of the pursuers. He had no right or title to hand it to the purchaser, and in my judgment the purchaser has, now that the signatures to the discharge have been ascertained to be forged, no right or title to retain it. She received it in absolute good faith, having, as she honestly thought, paid full value for it to the creditors in it, but none the less was the delivery to her of the bond tainted with fraud, just as the discharge which was handed to her along with the bond was tainted with the vice of forgery. Without a discharge or other evidence of repayment to the creditors, the purchaser had no right to take the bond, and obviously she would have declined to accept the mere possession of the writ as, of itself, equivalent along with the disposition of the property to a clear title. It appears to me that the bond in this case is in the same position as the cow in the case of Morrisson v. Robertson, 1908 S. C. 332.

"The defender Mrs Watson maintained that the forgery of the discharge was something entirely independent of her contract with William Goudie for the purchase of the property, and that the security writ having been handed to her in implement of that transaction, which it is not proposed to set aside, and which was not in any way tainted with fraud, she is entitled to retain it. She is not, she says, concerned with the forged discharge, and is not seeking to take any advantage or benefit from it. She is simply claiming a right to retain possession, for what it is worth, of a writ which in due course came into her hands in fulfilment of the contract of sale and purchase. In my opinion, she is taking advantage from the forged document, for she received the bond simply and solely because the bond was falsely said to be discharged by the receipt of her money, not by William Goudie the seller, but by the pursuers.

"The position which was brought about by the fraud of William Bowie here seems to me to be entirely different from that disclosed in the case of Brocklesby v. Temperance Building Society, [1895] A. C. 173, on which the defender based her contention. That case was decided on the ground that LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers in this action are a set of trustees who Dec. 5, 1912. were in right of a bond and disposition in security which had been granted by a certain William Goudie over a villa in Bridge of Weir for £500. Their agent was a Mr William Bowie, and in accordance with what is almost universal custom that agent had possession of their security writ, namely, the bond and disposition in security. William Bowie was also agent for Goudie, the proprietor of the subjects over which the bond was granted. Goudie arranged through his agent a sale of the villa to the defender Mrs Watson. Mrs Watson wished that the property should be conveyed to her clear of encumbrances, and arranged with Bowie that that should be done. Accordingly, having paid a full price, she was handed a disposition of the property, and at the same time was handed the bond over the property, and also a discharge of the bond. After Bowie's death it was discovered that the discharge of the bond was a forgery, but that Bowie had lured the pursuers into security by going on paying the interest to them as if nothing had happened.

Bowie's
Trustees v.
Watson.

The pursuers now bring this action, first of all, for reduction of the discharge as a forgery, and, secondly, for delivery of the corpus of the bond. Mrs Watson admits the forgery, and therefore has no defence, admittedly, to the reductive conclusions; but she seeks to retain the corpus of the bond until she is paid the sum of money which she parted with in respect of it.

The Lord Ordinary has decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and I am of opinion that he is quite right. The forgery being admitted, the discharge goes for nothing, and prima facie therefore the bond belongs to the persons who are designated as creditors in the bond. Now, what right can Mrs Watson have to retain it? She must in some way connect herself with it by some form of title flowing from the pursuers. But that is just what she cannot do. It seems to me that to succeed she would have to establish this proposition, that the mere leaving of a bond and disposition in security with your agent is equivalent to a mandate to that agent to deal with it. That is a perfectly impossible proposition, and it is shown to be an impossible proposition by the fact that the agent could not deal with the bond without forging a new deed. So far as I can see, even in England, where one is allowed to pledge title-deeds, the mere deposition of a deed with one's agent does not give any mandate to raise money upon it. But in our law, where the pledging of titles is unavailing to create a security, it is an impossible proposition.

the pursuer, though himself innocent of fraud, had put it in the power of another to commit the fraud by clothing him with authority to intromit with certain deeds, with the result that these deeds came to be in the possession of the defenders on a perfectly good title, irrespective altogether of any forged documents. The forgery of further documents, executed in order to serve ulterior purposes of the fraudulent agent, was not in any way necessary to establish the defenders' right to hold the deeds. In Brockleby's case the forgery was not ancillary to the main transaction; in the present case it is.

"It is a very hard case for the defender Mrs Watson, but, in my opinion, the loss occasioned by the fraudulent conduct of William Bowie must be borne by her. I shall decern against her for the delivery of the bond and disposition in security to the pursuers."

Dec. 5, 1912.

Bowie's
Trustees v.
Watson.

Accordingly—although I think it is a very hard case for this lady—it seems clear that the pursuers, who were in no way to blame, are entitled to possession of their bond.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The only conclusion of the action with which we are now concerned is that in which the creditors in the bond ask that their bond be delivered to them. Now, the defender cannot produce any discharge, because, admittedly, the discharge was forged, and therefore is a nullity. The bond is now in the hands of the purchaser of the property over which it was granted, she having obtained it from Bowie, the seller's agent, who, as the agent of the creditors, had custody of the bond. That agent was the forger, and the question is—Which of two innocent parties is to suffer by his forgery?

The argument addressed to us rested on two grounds, the first of which was that the defender was entitled, in virtue of the assignation of writs in the disposition of the property, to retain this bond as one of the writs. I think the conclusive answer to that is that the bond is not one of the titles to the property. It is a burden upon the property. The purchaser was not entitled to receive it, and the seller had no right to grant any assignation which covered it. Mr Morison admitted that he could not succeed unless he was able to associate the bond with the contract of sale. But you cannot associate a bond with a contract of sale between the person who is the debtor in the bond and the buyer. The consent of the creditor was needed, and admittedly it never was got; and if it never was got, then Bowie had no more right to deal with the bond in this case than he had right to include, under the sale of Goudie's villa, land adjoining that villa which belonged to a third party, the titles to which happened to be in his custody for the time being.

The second ground upon which the case was argued was that in some way the creditors had armed Mr William Bowie, the fraudulent agent, with the means of committing this fraud. Now, I quite admit that if Bowie had in some way been clothed with authority to deal with the bond in the way of receiving payment and granting a discharge—if he had got that authority from the creditors, then, even if he had fraudulently discharged it, it might have been that the creditors who were his clients would have had to suffer, and not the innocent buyer who provided the money to enable the bond to be discharged. But there is nothing of that kind here; there is no suggestion that there was any authority, either written or verbal, given by the creditors to their agent Bowie to become a party in any way to the transaction that was carried out. I therefore think that the conclusion which the Lord Ordinary has reached is right.

LORD CULLEN.—I entirely concur.

Lendrum v.
Ayr Steam
Shipping Co.,

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)— Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Unexplained death—Seaman found drowned—Inference from proved facts.

In a claim for compensation by the dependants of a ship steward, who was last seen alive in his bunk, and was found drowned next day in the harbour near to the place where his ship had been lying, the arbitrator awarded compensation.

Circumstances in which the Court (diss. Lord Guthrie) recalled the award of the arbitrator, holding that there was no evidence to justify the inference that the accident which caused death arose out of the employment.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Ayr, between Mrs Mary Kerr or Lendrum and Edward Lendrum, the widow and son respectively of the deceased Edward Lendrum, and the Ayr Steam Shipping Company, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute (Shairp) awarded compensation, and at the request of the defenders stated a case for appeal.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.

The case stated :—

"The following facts were admitted or proved, namely :—That the deceased Edward Lendrum was on 16th December 1911, and had been for some time previous to that date, employed by appellants as a cook and steward on their steamship 'Turnberry'; that, at intervals during a period of nine or ten years prior to his death, he had been in the appellants' employment as a steward on different steamships belonging to them;—[then followed findings as to the wages earned by the deceased, and as to the dependency of the pursuers on his earnings]—that on the morning of the said 16th day of December 1911 the 'Turnberry' was lying in the harbour of Larne; that the said now deceased Edward Lendrum served the crew of the ship with breakfast in the usual way; that the crew thereafter rested, having been working on the previous night; that the ship was to sail at 6 o'clock P.M. on said 16th December 1911; that the said deceased Edward Lendrum, after having served breakfast as aforesaid, had no meal to prepare or serve till shortly before the sailing of the ship; that it was customary for him to rest in the afternoons, especially on Saturday afternoons, as his work on Friday evenings was usually heavy and prevented him from obtaining sufficient sleep; that he slept in a bunk in a small, ill-ventilated room entering directly from the saloon of the ship; that the said room and saloon were both on deck, and that in going from his room, or from the saloon to the deck, the said Edward Lendrum would pass a lavatory, situated at the door leading from the saloon, which lavatory was the one used by Lendrum while aboard the said ship; that the captain of the ship, John McDonald, about 4 o'clock P.M. on said 16th December 1911, went to the saloon and told the said now deceased Edward Lendrum, whom he saw lying in his bunk, to prepare and serve tea for the crew before the ship sailed; that Lendrum just turned in his bunk and looked at the captain, but made no reply to him, and that the captain then returned to his own room; that the captain afterwards sent the chief officer of the ship, John M'Innes, to see if Lendrum was getting the crew's tea ready, and that M'Innes shortly afterwards reported to the captain that he could not find Lendrum in the ship; that the captain and chief officer then (about 5.30 P.M.) went and looked in Lendrum's bunk, and saw that he was not in it; that they found some of his clothes on a settee in the saloon, and his purse and watch lying by themselves in the saloon, but away from the clothes; that Lendrum's disappearance from the ship was at once reported to the police, and his dead body dressed in his day underclothes was next day found in the sea at a point between the place where the stern of the ship had been on 16th December 1911 when Lendrum disappeared and a slip situated a short distance from where the stern of the ship had been; that Lendrum was drowned, and his dead body bore no marks of violence to account for his death otherwise; that he was a good-tempered, sociable man, and pleasant to deal with, always able to do his work, and never seen by the captain of the ship to be the worse of intoxicating liquor, though he was not a teetotaler; that he was subject to attacks of nausea and sickness, and was seen on various previous occasions vomiting over the side of the ship; that his son, Edward Lendrum, who frequently sailed with his father in said ship, and to whom his father's tendency to sickness was well known, immediately on hearing of his father's death, expressed the opinion that he had fallen overboard while vomiting; that, in March 1911, a shortage of £3, 14s. 6d. was found in the liquor stock under the charge of the said deceased Edward Lendrum, but, by an arrangement with his employers, said sum was being gradually paid back by him, with the result that after his death it was found that on balancing accounts between the deceased and his employers there was a debit balance against him of only 11s. 1d.; that once, when the ship was lying in Ayr Harbour, he was seen hanging over her side by a rope, which was fastened to the ship's taffrail, and was round his waist; that he was holding on to the rope with both of his hands held above his head, and that he was not in the water; that he afterwards explained to his son Edward that he was trying to recover a towel which had fallen overboard; and, that he did not commit suicide.

"I accordingly, taking into consideration the whole facts admitted and proved, drew the inference in fact that, between 4.30 and 5.30 P.M. on 16th December 1911, the said now deceased Edward Lendrum left his bunk in the said steamship 'Turnberry,' went on her deck, and accidentally fell overboard, and was drowned, and I held that said accident arose out of and in the course of his employment as a cook and steward on board said ship.

"I therefore found the appellants liable to the said Mary Kerr or Lendrum in compensation under said Act to the extent of £300, and I also found the appellants liable to her in the expenses of process."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether on the facts admitted and proved I was justified in holding that the deceased Edward Lendrum met his death as aforesaid by accident arising out of and in the course of his said employment?"

After a hearing, the Second Division, on 29th October 1912, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the note for the appellants, remit to the arbitrator to answer the following questions, viz., (1) The facts as to the clothes which the deceased was wearing when he was lying down in his bunk on the last occasion when the captain saw him alive: (2) The facts as to the clothes which the captain found in the saloon after Lendrum was missed, and whether there were any of deceased's clothes in the saloon when the captain went to wake him: (3) Whether it was proved that six empty whisky bottles, of another kind than those supplied by the ship, were found under the deceased's mattress, and whether it was proved that the deceased's bunk had been overhauled eight days before his death, and that there were no whisky bottles there then: (4) Whether it was proved that there was a shortage of 18s. 3d. referable to the eight days during which the vessel had been running since her overhaul, this shortage being subsequent to that referred to in the case stated by the arbitrator, and discovered after the deceased's death: (5) What in fact was proved as to the height and construction of the bulwarks of the vessel, and the height of the deceased: (6) Was a plan produced and proved as part of the facts of the case? Note.—If No. 6 is answered in the affirmative, the Sheriff-clerk will transmit the plan for the use of the Court.”

Dec. 5, 1912.

Lendrum v.
Ayr Steam
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

The arbitrator reported as follows:—“In terms of the foregoing remit, I have respectfully to report to your Lordships (1) that on the last occasion when Captain M'Donald saw the deceased Edward Lendrum alive, and lying in his bunk, he (Lendrum) had his waistcoat on, but the captain could not say whether Lendrum had on his trousers or not, as the lower part of his body was covered with the bedclothes, nor was the captain able to say whether or not Lendrum had his coat on; (2) that after Lendrum was missed, there were found in the dining-saloon of the 'Turnberry,' on a settee, Lendrum's jacket, waistcoat, trousers, cap, necktie, collar, boots, purse (containing a few coppers), and watch, the purse and watch not being in the pockets of the clothing, but that there was no underclothing, and that none of the above-enumerated articles of clothing were observed in the dining-saloon by Captain M'Donald when he went previously to wake Lendrum; the clothes, when found, were not folded up, just thrown off; (3) that it was not proved that six empty whisky bottles, of another kind than those supplied by the ship, were found under the deceased's mattress, nor was it proved that the deceased's bunk had been overhauled eight days before his death, and that there were no whisky bottles there then; (4) that it was not proved that there was a shortage of 18s. 3d. in the stock of liquor controlled by Lendrum referable to the eight days, 8th to 16th December, during which the 'Turnberry' had been running after her overhaul, but that it was proved by the admission of the defenders' cashier that, on an accounting, only the sum of 11s. 1d. was due to the Company by Lendrum at the date of his death; (5 and 6) that the height and construction of the bulwarks of the 'Turnberry' are shown on a plan produced by the pursuers at the proof on 15th May 1912, the accuracy of which plan was admitted by the agents of the parties, and that it was proved that Lendrum was 5 feet 6 inches in height. The said plan accompanies this report, and shows the half rounds where Lendrum was seen vomiting on two occasions previous to his death.”

Thereafter the case was again heard before the Second Division on 28th November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—In order to succeed, the pursuers required to prove death by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. It might be that they had fairly established death by an accident arising in the course of the employment, Lendrum v.

Ayr Steam

but there was absolutely no evidence to show whether the accident did or did not arise out of the employment, and no facts proved from which any inference could be drawn. The evidence was inconclusive, and the facts consistent with either hypothesis. In such a case the pursuer was not entitled to an award.¹ The case belonged to the class typified by *Bender v. "Zent,"*² *Marshall v. "Wild Rose,"*³ and *Burwash v. Leyland & Company,*⁴ rather than the class of which *Mackinnon v. Miller,*⁵ "Swansea Vale" v. *Rice,*⁶ and *Lee v. Stag Line Company*⁷ were examples.

Argued for the respondents;—The point for decision was not whether on the facts proved the Court would have come to a different conclusion from the arbitrator, but whether there was any evidence to support the arbitrator's judgment.⁸ It was impossible to say that there was no evidence in this case upon which it could competently be found that death resulted from an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. The facts were very similar to those in *Mackinnon v. Miller,*⁹ where the Court had refused to interfere with the arbitrator's decision. Further, it was to be noted that the deceased here had work to perform at the time, and was not off duty as in some of the contrary decisions.

At advising on 5th December 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—This case, which relates to the unexplained drowning of a seaman, is, I think, both an important and a difficult one. The facts, as found by the learned arbitrator, are not in all respects as complete and specific as one would desire, even after a remit to and report by him upon certain points. The material facts may be summarised as follows. On the crucial date, 16th December 1911, the now deceased Edward Lendrum was, and had been for some time, employed as cook and steward on the appellants' steamship "Turnberry," which on that day was lying in the harbour of Larne. She was to sail at 6 P.M. The deceased was, as customary, resting in his bunk in the afternoon; it was a small ill-ventilated room on the deck level, adjoining the saloon; the men's lavatory was on the same level and close by, as shown on the admitted sketch plan. About 4 P.M. the captain told Lendrum, whom he saw lying in his bunk, to prepare and serve tea for the crew before the ship sailed. Lendrum turned and looked at the captain, but made no reply; he had his waistcoat on, but the captain cannot say whether his coat and trousers were on or not. About 5.30 the chief officer was sent to see if Lendrum was preparing the tea, and reported that he could not find him on the ship. The man was never afterwards seen alive; his coat, waistcoat, trousers, cap, tie, collar, and boots, and his purse (containing a few coppers) and watch were found by the captain and chief officer on a settee in the saloon; the clothes were not folded, just thrown off; none of the articles named were observed in the saloon by the Dec. 5, 1912. captain when he went to Lendrum about four o'clock. The body, clad in underclothes, was found next day in the sea near where the "Turnberry" had been lying; the man was drowned, and there were no marks of violence on the body. He was a good-tempered, sociable, pleasant man, and sober, though not teetotal. He was subject to attacks of nausea and sickness, and was seen on various previous occasions vomiting over the side of the ship; but the case does not state whether these attacks of sickness occurred at sea only, or also when the ship was in harbour, nor are any dates given, even approximately, of any of the attacks. There had been, in March 1911, a shortage in the liquor stock under Lendrum's control; but the sum (£3, 14s. 6d.) was, by arrangement, being gradually paid back by him, and the debit balance had been reduced to 11s. 1d. A strange episode is stated, for which no date is given, when Lendrum was seen hanging over the ship's side, suspended by a rope round his waist, and explained that he was trying to recover a towel. The arbitrator finds that he did not commit suicide. The ship's rail was 3 feet 5 inches above the deck; Lendrum's height was 5 feet 6 inches.

Lord Dundas.

The learned arbitrator has awarded compensation to the dependants. I have come to the conclusion, for reasons to be stated, that his award cannot stand; but before dealing with these reasons, I shall make some observations upon the law and authorities bearing on the case. During the discussion counsel for the parties judiciously limited their citation of reported cases to six, which they seemed to be agreed, and so far as I see they were right, are the most nearly in point to the present case. These were *Mackinnon v. Miller*¹; "Swansea Vale" v. *Rice*²; *Lee v. Stag Line Company*³; *Bender v. "Zent"*⁴; *Marshall v. "Wild Rose"*⁵; and Burwash v. Leyland & Company.⁶ In the first three of the cases the decision was in favour of the applicants; in the remaining three, in each of which the Court differed from the arbitrator, the decision was in favour of the employers.

*Mackinnon v. Miller*¹ is, I think, much the strongest case in favour of the applicant. Miller, an engineer on board a steam tug which lay moored to the jetty at Kinlochleven, was last seen alive about 5 A.M. on 15th February 1908, asleep in his bunk; an hour later he was missed; his working clothes were lying beside the bunk; his body, clad in nightdress, was recovered two days later in the sea, close by where the tug had been lying; suicide was negatived. The Sheriff-substitute awarded compensation, and the Court declined to interfere with his conclusion. The Lord President pointed out that though there was no direct testimony, there was nothing antecedently wrong in saying one might come to a certain inference although that inference was only based on circumstantial evidence. "The deck was a place where Miller had every right to be; the deck was a place where even at that hour of the morning he might fairly be, not perhaps in the direct carrying out of his duties, but for indirect purposes with which these duties were not unconnected." The Sheriff-substitute had drawn an inference in which the Court thought there was nothing violent, and they would not disturb his conclusion. It is fair to observe that Miller's case¹ was prior in date to the decision by the House of Lords in *Marshall v. "Wild Rose,"*² which I think stands as the leading authority on this matter. Upon the other hand, in the later case of "Swansea Vale,"³ Lord Shaw said: "I see no occasion to differ from, but much to incline me to agree with, the judgment in the case of Mackinnon v. Miller,¹ and in particular with the judgment of Lord Dunedin." I do not at all suggest that *Mackinnon v. Miller*¹ was wrongly decided. But after all, the decision in each of these cases must depend upon its own facts; and there were facts in that case—e.g., that the height of the ship's rail was only 20 inches, and the existence, as the report discloses, of various obstacles or stumbling-blocks upon the deck, which differentiate it from the present case. "Swansea Vale" v. *Rice*³ was, I think, a comparatively simple and plain-sailing case upon its facts. Rice was first mate upon a voyage from Greenock to Algiers. At 4 A.M. he complained to the captain of being sick and giddy, took a dose of castor oil, and went on deck to keep his watch (4 to 8 o'clock); he was not seen after 7 A.M. The County Court Judge awarded compensation, and the Court of Appeal and House of Lords upheld his decision. There was more than mere conjecture to proceed upon; this sick officer, when last seen, was on active duty, discharging a responsible office. As Lord Shaw put it: "A man engaged in a variety of duties is sent in a sick and giddy condition to perform those duties and into a position of danger." The third case is Lee v. Stag Line Company.⁴ Lee was engaged as ship fireman on a voyage in the tropics; he was new at the work; he was put on duty one night from midnight to 6 A.M., which was longer than his usual watch (12 to 4), owing to the illness of another fireman; about 4.45 A.M. he was missed, and he was never seen again. Shortly before he had been seen on deck getting a drink. It was proved that the firemen while on duty were in use to go on deck for fresh air. The ship's rail was three feet high; the deceased was six feet in height; the ship was given to rolling, and was rolling slightly that morning. The County Court Judge drew the inference that Lee died as the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and the Court of Appeal held that there was evidence to justify this inference. Cozens-Hardy, M.R., observed: "It was usual—I think I may say necessary—in the tropics to come on deck for fresh air. That makes all the difference. Although the man's regular duty was in the stokehole, he was really acting equally in the discharge of his duty in coming on deck." I come now to the cases in which the applicants were unsuccessful. The first in date is *Bender v. "Zent,"*⁵ which, on its facts, affords a sharp contrast with the case of Lee.⁴ While a steamship was on the high seas, the chief cook and baker (Bender) was lost overboard; the weather was fine, the ship steady, and there was a 4-foot rail and bulwark all round. The man was last seen about 5.35 A.M. Dec. 5, 1912. The County Court Judge awarded compensation, but the Court of Appeal took the opposite view. The Court fully recognised, as did Lord Dundas in Mackinnon v. Miller,¹ the competency of drawing an inference from facts that an accident arose out of as well as in the course of an employment, and though no direct testimony is available. But the onus is always upon the applicant, and none the less so although, by the workman's death, a greater burden is thrown on his dependants. The facts afforded ground for conjecture, but did not warrant the inference which the County Court Judge drew from them. Only three days after the judgment in *Bender v. "Zent"*² the same Court decided the important case of Marshall v. "Wild Rose".³ The rubric, which seems to be fully borne out by the opinions, bears broadly that "the unexplained drowning of a seaman engaged on board ship does not of itself raise any presumption that his death was the result of an accident arising out of as well as in the course of his employment so as to entitle his dependants to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906." Lord Moulton (then L.J.) said: "The point is a very important one, and I hope it will go to the highest tribunal, so that we may have directions upon it. It may be expressed in a very few words: Is the unexplained drowning of a sailor by falling from his ship when at sea a sufficient prima facie case for compensation?" The facts of Marshall's case⁴ were brief and scanty. He was second engineer on a steam trawler lying in Aberdeen harbour; he came on board one evening at ten o'clock; steam was to be got up by midnight; he went below, and undressed himself, excepting shirt, trousers, and socks; he came up on deck later, saying to the chief engineer that he was going for a breath of fresh air; it was a very hot night. He was missed at midnight; and his body was found next day in the sea just under the rail on the starboard quarter, where the men were in the habit of sitting in hot weather. The County Court Judge awarded compensation; but the Court of Appeal, and a majority of the noble and learned Lords, took the opposite view. Lord Shaw, one of the majority, pointed out that "the name of inference may be apt to be given to what is pure conjecture"; that there was no room for anything but conjecture as to what Marshall did, or what befell him, after he came up on deck that night, and that, assuming his death to have been due to an accident arising in the course of his employment, there was no ground for any inference that it arose out of the employment. The latest of the six cases to which we were specially referred is that of Burwash,⁴ which was decided by the Court of Appeal contemporaneously with Lee v. Stag Line Company.⁵ The facts in Burwash's case⁴ were remarkably like those now under consideration, but were in several respects more favourable for the applicants; yet the decision was against them. A ship's cook disappeared while the vessel was at sea. When last seen he was at his work in the galley, where there was no possibility of his falling overboard.

Dec. 5, 1912. He was suffering from a disease which caused him to go frequently to the lavatory, and to reach it he had to go on to the open deck at a point 8 feet from the ship's rail, which was 3 feet 7 inches high; it was dark at the time, and the ship was rolling. The County Court Judge awarded compensation, but the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. Cozens-Hardy, M.R., observed that "there is no evidence to show how the cook got out of his galley in the course of his duty, and no evidence from which it can be inferred how the man went into the sea," and added that "the case is not beyond the region of surmise." Farwell, L.J., treated the matter as "really a pure case of guesswork." Kennedy, L.J., said: "It is a mere matter of conjecture. The man was lost in the sea by drowning, and we know nothing more than that." After alluding to *Bender v. "Zent,"*¹ his Lordship went on to say: "The proof certainly lies upon the dependants, but here there is nothing to show how the man came to leave the galley. If he did leave the galley justifiably he was never seen. With reluctance I feel myself obliged to say that the inference we are asked to draw here goes beyond anything justified by the circumstances which existed at the time." The case of Burwash,² if rightly decided, as I think it was, affords a direct and strong authority adverse to the present applicants.

The weight of the authorities now reviewed seems to be in favour of the employers in the case before us. I think one may deduce from the decisions (1) that the burden is always upon the applicant to prove that death resulted from an accident arising out of as well as in the course of the employment; (2) that such proof need not be by direct, but may be by circumstantial evidence; but there must be facts from which an inference can be drawn, as distinguished from mere conjecture, surmise, or probability; and (3) that an award by an arbitrator cannot stand unless the facts found are such as to entitle him reasonably to infer his conclusion from them. Now, when one turns to the facts of this case, the precise cause of Lendrum's death is left in mystery and darkness. I think there are legitimate grounds for at least a suspicion of suicide. The man leaves his bunk, and is found drowned; he has divested himself of his upper clothing, part of which he certainly had on when last seen, and leaves it, and his purse and watch, in the saloon; and if he had occasion to be sick, the lavatory was nearer to his bunk than the ship's side. But the Sheriff-substitute negatives suicide, though it does not appear how he reached that inference from the facts as disclosed. Leaving suicide out of account, I do not say that the arbitrator might not reasonably infer that death was due to an accident arising in the course of the employment. But the question is whether he could so infer accident arising out of the employment. I am unable to hold that he could. The onus is on the applicant in that matter; and I can see nothing in the facts which could warrant the inference. The facts here are no stronger, to my thinking, than those in *Marshall*³ and in Bender,¹ and less strong than those in Burwash.² Mr Moncrieff urged that the last known fact before Lendrum's disappearance was the captain's order to him to prepare tea ; that he was thereafter a man on active duty ; Dec. 5, 1912. that in all probability he was, while engaged in that duty, taken sick, and while vomiting, fell over the side and was drowned. But the sickness is absolutely conjectural. I am not clear that in any case one could hold that being sick over the side was an act springing from or caused by his employment, so that a fall overboard while vomiting could be said to be an accident arising out of the employment. A case might occur where a cook, engaged in his duty, was forced by the motion of the vessel to leave his work and vomit over the side ; and I could understand in such a case an inference that his consequent fall overboard was an accident arising out of his employment ; but there is no case of that sort here. It is enough, however, as I think, that the suggestion of sickness and its hypothetical consequences is here entirely in the region of guess and surmise and conjecture. In my judgment, therefore, the Sheriff-substitute could not competently draw an inference from the facts found that the accident (assuming there was an accident) arose out of the employment of the deceased. That view, if correct, would sufficiently dispose of the case. But I may add that, looking to the peculiar way in which the Sheriff-substitute's conclusion is expressed, I am not satisfied that he intended to draw the inference which the applicants suppose him to have drawn. The inference in fact which the arbitrator says he drew is merely that Lendrum left his bunk, went on deck, accidentally fell overboard, and was drowned. He then goes on to say : "And I held that said accident arose out of and in the course of his employment." It looks to me as if the Sheriff-substitute had overlooked the distinction between "out of" and "in the course of," and the necessity for establishing both points in order to entitle an applicant to compensation. What the arbitrator says he infers in fact might warrant him in holding that there was an accident in the course of the employment ; but it would not, I think, justify the further conclusion that it arose out of the employment. It appears to me that, having drawn his inference in fact, he proceeded to deduce a conclusion in law which the inference in fact was not sufficient to support. But whether or not this interpretation of the Sheriff-substitute's conclusion is the correct one, it seems to me that his award cannot be sustained ; and that the question put to us must be answered in the negative.

Lord Dundas.

LORD SALVESEN.—[After stating the facts found proved with regard to Lendrum's death]—There are only three possible ways by which to account for his death—foul play, suicide, or accident. Foul play is out of the question, and as to suicide the facts proved do not seem to me to justify an inference that he took his own life. It is expressly found that he was a good-tempered, social man, pleasant to deal with, and was never seen by the captain to be the worse of intoxicating liquor, although he was not a teetotaler. On the other hand it is proved that there had been a shortage in the liquor stock under his charge of £3, 14s. 6d. in March 1911 ; but by an arrangement with his employers this sum was being gradually paid back, with the result that at the time of his death he was only due them 11s. 1d. There was therefore nothing in his relations with his employers which would lead him to take his own life. On the other hand, it remains a mystery why he should have removed such parts of his clothing as he had on when in his bunk and taken his clothes to the saloon. It was suggested that as his own bunk was small and ill ventilated he had taken his clothes there to dress in greater comfort. This, of course, is possible, but does not explain why he should have removed the waistcoat which he had on while in his bunk. If he was intending to drown himself he might perhaps, before going on deck, divest himself of his clothes and leave such valuables as he had behind, or if he had become suddenly deranged his actings might be accounted for. In the course of performing his duties in preparing tea for the crew he would naturally first dress himself, and there would seem to be no reason why he should divest himself of such of his day clothing as he already had on. Counsel for the respondent suggested that he had taken off his trousers before lying down, and might require to remove his vest in order to put on his braces. This seems on the face of it extremely improbable, more especially as braces did not form part of the clothing which he left behind. His conduct in removing his clothes is certainly mysterious; but, having in view all the circumstances, I do not think any inference can be drawn that he met his death by his own wilful act. The Sheriff-substitute has found in fact that he did not commit suicide, by which I suppose he means that there was no evidence from which he could reasonably draw the inference that he had done so. If that is the meaning of the finding I am prepared to assent to it, because, although the possibility of suicide has certainly not been excluded, the presumption is the other way.

The last alternative is that he met his death by accident; and, difficult as it is to figure what kind of accident could have happened to him under the circumstances, I hold that the probabilities point in that direction. The theory presented by the respondent was that he had suddenly felt an attack of sickness coming on, that he had rushed on deck to vomit over the side of the ship, and that in so doing he had overbalanced and fallen. It is possible that this happened, although I cannot say there are any facts found which make it probable. It is true that on several previous occasions he had been seen vomiting over the side of the ship, but it is not said how long before his death he was last so seen, nor whether such vomiting took place while he was at sea. There is no finding that during the day of the accident, or even during the last voyage of the "Turnberry," he had complained of sickness or shown any symptoms of indisposition. He had gone about his duties in the morning apparently in the ordinary way, and had been idling or resting the rest of the day. He must have understood the captain's message or he would not have got up; and, as there was a lavatory close to the saloon in which he could conveniently have been sick, it is difficult to understand why he should have passed the door of this lavatory and gone out in his stocking soles on to the deck of the vessel on a December afternoon when it must have been perfectly dark. Further, as the rail of the vessel over which he is supposed to have leaned was 3 feet 5 inches above the deck, and Lendrum was a small man—5 feet 6 inches in height—it is not easy to understand how he could have overbalanced, even if he had had a paroxysm of sickness. A slip on the deck or a stumble would not account for his falling overboard, although he might well have stumbled in the dark. The circumstances of his disappearance appear to me to be wholly wrapped in mystery. Dec. 5, 1912.

Assuming, however, that Lendrum accidentally fell overboard, has the respondent proved that this accident arose out of his employment? As cook and steward he had no occasion to go near the sides of the vessel. At the time in question his duties would require him to be in the saloon and in the galley or between the two, but he could scarcely have been in the performance of his duty in the attire in which his body was found. If it had been affirmatively proved or could be reasonably inferred that he did rush to the side of the ship in order to vomit, and had thus fallen overboard, I should have been prepared to hold that the accident had arisen out of his employment; but when one comes to theorise on the manner in which he met his death, one is in the region of pure conjecture. All that can be affirmed is that his falling overboard is entirely unexplained, and the theory of the respondent seems to be just as improbable as any other theory which might be suggested on the other side. That the man sometimes did eccentric things is proved by the fact that on one occasion he was observed hanging over the side by a rope fastened to the ship's taffrail and round his own waist, and that on that occasion he was holding on to the rope with both hands held above his head. The explanation that he afterwards gave to his son, that he was in this way trying to recover a towel which had fallen overboard, does not make his conduct much more rational. The case therefore seems to me to fall within the category of which *Bender*¹ and *Marshall*² are excellent illustrations. In the latter case Lord Shaw of Dunfermline said: "What did the sailor Marshall do when he left his berth and went on deck? Nobody knows. All is conjecture. Did he jump overboard, walk overboard, or fall overboard? One can infer nothing, all is conjecture. Was there an accident at all, or how and why did the deceased unhappily meet his fate? No doubt the occurrence took place during the period of his engagement, but did it take place in the course of his employment, or . . . in the course of some occupation grafted on to his employment but in no way part of it, necessary to it, or usual in it?" Each of these pertinent questions can be put with equal force here. Indeed, in Marshall's case,² there was a greater probability that the man had fallen overboard while sitting on the top of the bulwarks than that he met his death in any other way. I adopt the answer of the learned and noble Lord in that case as applicable to the present, when he says: "There can be in my view nothing dignified with the name of an inference on this subject, but again only conjecture."

We were referred to the decision of the First Division in the case of Mackinnon,³ and counsel for the respondent argued that the facts there were no more convincing than in the present, and yet the Court had refused to disturb the finding of the arbitrator in favour of the workman's dependants. There was, however, one important fact in that case which made the likelihood of an accidental falling overboard much greater than in the present, namely, that the bulwark was only 20 inches in height, whereas the rails of the "Turnberry" were 3 feet 5 inches, or more than twice the height. Dec. 5, 1912. its facts the present case much more closely resembles those which were held by the Court of Appeal not to entitle them to draw the inference that the cook of the "Zent" had met with an accident arising out of his employment. The Sheriff-substitute has made no finding that the accident which he infers Lendrum met with arose out of his employment. Indeed, as I read his statement, he seems to have assumed that it was enough to reach that conclusion because Lendrum fell overboard while in the course of his employment. In short, he has not adverted to the distinction that was so clearly pointed out by the Judges who decided the cases of *Bender*¹ and Marshall.² In my opinion there are no facts from which an inference can reasonably be drawn that the accident—assuming it to be proved—arose out of Lendrum's employment. I am therefore for answering the questions of law put to us by the arbitrator in the negative.

Lendrum v.

Lord Salvesen.

LOED GUTHRIE.—It is admitted that the deceased Edward Lendrum was drowned while in the course of his employment by the appellants. On the question of whether the occurrence arose out of the employment, had I been in the arbitrator's position, I think that, on the facts held proved by him, I should have drawn a different inference from that at which he has arrived. But the only question for us being whether he could reasonably hold, as he has done, that the respondents had proved that the death of the deceased Edward Lendrum was due to an accident arising out of his employment by the appellants, I am not prepared to say that such a conclusion, taking into consideration, as the arbitrator says he does in the second last paragraph of the case, "the whole facts admitted and proved," could not be reasonably drawn. I emphasise this distinction, because it seems to me that it has not always been maintained in the cases which have been cited to us, and which your Lordships have fully discussed. Thus, Lord Justice Kennedy in the case of Burwash v. Leyland & Company,³ said in the passage quoted by Lord Dundas,—"I feel myself obliged to say that the inference we are asked to draw here goes beyond anything justified by the circumstances which existed at the time." With great deference it appears to me that we are not asked to draw any inference. What we are asked to do is to consider whether a certain inference could be reasonably drawn—not whether we ourselves could or could not draw it. In this case I could not draw the arbitrator's inference, but I think all the same it could be reasonably drawn. I do not decide that there was sufficient legal evidence to warrant the arbitrator's decision, but only that there was such legal evidence as might reasonably warrant the inference.

Not only do the circumstances not suggest, they seem to me to negative, the idea either of violence or of suicide. The arbitrator has found as a fact that the deceased did not commit suicide, and the averments of the appellants bearing on suicide have either been displaced altogether by the arbitrator's report or so minimised as to lose all significance. An intention to enter the water for any ordinary legitimate purpose being equally out of the question, the respondents say that, by a process of exclusion, they have reduced the possible explanations of the deceased's death to accident. I Dec. 5, 1912. think they are so far right. The difficulty remains that they must prove to the satisfaction of the arbitrator that the accident arose out of the deceased's employment, and, if the arbitrator is in their favour, they must prove to our satisfaction that the facts proved by them made it reasonable for the arbitrator to decide for them.

Lendrum v.
Ayr Steam

Lord Guthrie.

If, as the arbitrator thinks, it is sufficiently proved that the deceased met his death by overbalancing himself while vomiting over the ship's side, fell into the water and was drowned, I have no doubt that this occurrence would be an accident arising not only in the course of but out of the employment. The death did not result from the sickness, but from the sickness occurring at a time when the circumstances connected with the employment introduced a special risk. The difficult question is whether there were grounds for the arbitrator coming reasonably to the view he did.

It is admitted that, whatever view be taken, there are circumstances in the case which are difficult to explain. If the result were that there was no more reason to infer accident arising out of the employment than accident arising outwith the employment—if there were no circumstances to suggest that the deceased was in the discharge of his duties when he fell overboard—then, as all the cases show, the respondents must fail, because the arbitrator could not reasonably come to the conclusion at which he has arrived. In that case he would not be drawing a reasonable inference from facts, there being in the case I am assuming no facts from which an inference in the respondents' favour could be reasonably drawn. He would be proceeding merely on conjecture and surmise as to what was conceivable.

The arbitrator, as I read the evidence, had it sufficiently proved that immediately before the accident the deceased received an order to prepare and serve a meal for the crew, that he understood the order and got up out of the bunk where he had been sleeping with the view of fulfilling the order, that when the accident must have happened he would naturally have been in the course of actively executing that order, and that the captain understood he was at the time of the accident so employed, and that the deck from which he must have gone overboard was a place where he might have occasion to be in the discharge of his duties. This being proved, it seems to me that very little more was required to lead reasonably to the inference at which the arbitrator has arrived. The additional circumstances were found by the arbitrator in the facts thus stated by him:—"He was subject to attacks of nausea and sickness, and was seen on various previous occasions vomiting over the side of the ship," and he adds,—"His son Edward Lendrum, who frequently sailed with his father in said ship, and to whom his father's tendency to sickness was well known, immediately on hearing of his father's death expressed the opinion that he had fallen overboard while vomiting." Now if this statement by the arbitrator only means that the deceased was unusually liable to sea-sickness, and does not imply a general proneness to nausea on land as well as at sea, and if the statement is consistent with the deceased's attacks having been long previous to the drowning, then I would agree with your Lordships that the facts thus held proved could not reasonably be held as sufficient, along with the circumstances above detailed, to warrant the inference which he has drawn. But I do

Dec. 5, 1912. not so read the arbitrator's findings. Although they are lacking in important details, which I think they might have contained, I read them as sufficient to lead to the reasonable inference that the deceased had gone from his cabin into the saloon to dress, that while dressing he was seized with an attack of nausea, and that, leaning too far over the bulwark while in the act of violent retching, he overbalanced himself and fell overboard. I do not say I should have thought these facts sufficient in view of no complaint of sickness having been made by the deceased or appearance of illness observed, and in view of the height of the bulwark as compared with the deceased's height. But my difficulty arises, as I think, on a balancing of evidence. I am not prepared to hold that this is a case in which, as the Lord President put it in Mackinnon's case,¹ the arbitrator has "proceeded entirely contrary to evidence or upon no evidence at all." The facts in *Mackinnon's case*¹ seem to me in essential features to have been very like those in the present case. No doubt the bulwark was only 20 inches, while in this case it was 41 inches; but I do not find any point made of the height of the bulwark in any of the learned Judges' opinions. Had the Court had occasion to review the arbitrator's award instead of merely determining whether it involved a conclusion which could reasonably be arrived at, such an element would no doubt have been dealt with. In view of the functions which we are discharging, I do not think this difference between the two cases, the only one I can discover, is relevant.

Lendrum v.
Ayr Steam

Lord Guthrie.

I therefore think that on the facts admitted and proved, the arbitrator was justified in holding that the deceased Edward Lendrum met his death by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the appellants.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Your Lordships have so fully dealt with the facts of this case and with various cases which were quoted in the debate, that I feel it would be mere repetition if I were to attempt to go over the same ground again, agreeing as I do with the opinions of Lord Dundas and Lord Salvesen in every particular. In the cases in which a person in employment is found dead, there being no one present who can give any evidence as to how the death came about, difficult questions may arise as to whether the surrounding circumstances which are proved amount to evidence establishing that the death arose out of the employment, assuming that the primary condition is established that it occurred in the course of the employment. I say "proved," for without proof there can be no case on assumption. The numerous cases which were referred to give illustrations both of proof sufficient and proof that falls short of sufficiency. The applicant for an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act is in no different position from any other litigant who pursues an action. He must prove his case. He is not entitled to succeed on likelihoods or deductions made from data insufficient to bring conviction to the mind. If the situation is obscure, then he cannot succeed. It has to be remembered that the employer who is sued under the Act is not in the position of an insurer. He has no bargain with his employee as an insurance company has with one insured. A person insuring his life stipulates that, on his death, he shall pay a premium out of his own funds, the insurance company on his decease shall pay a certain sum to his executors. When the death occurs the right to the agreed-on sum emerges, and the burden of proof of exemption from liability rests on the insurers. If they set forth any defence, such as suicide, the burden of proof is on them. But in the case of an employer under the Act, he has received nothing from the person who is killed. He has undertaken no obligation. Any claim against him is a claim under the statute, by which he is ordained to pay compensation. He is in the position of being compelled by law to compensate his employee if these conditions are fulfilled—(1) that the workman has been injured or killed; (2) that the injury was caused by an accident; (3) that it occurred in the course of the employment; and (4) that it arose out of the employment. In this case it is the last question that is the important one—Did the deceased die from an accident arising out of his employment? I concur with your Lordships in thinking that this has not been proved so that the question can be answered in the affirmative. Lord Guthrie holds the arbitrator could hold it proved (1) that the deceased was sick; (2) that he went and leaned over the rail; (3) that he overbalanced himself and fell into the water. I am unable to see how any one of these three things can be held to have been proved by any circumstantial evidence expressed in the finding of the arbitrator; and unless they were all proved there could be no justification for deciding as the arbitrator has done. It appears to me that, as was expressed by Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton (now Lord Moulton) in the case of Marshall,¹ “the facts here amount to nothing more than the unexplained drowning of the seaman.”

Lendrum v.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Lord Justice Farwell in the same case seems to me to put the matter most tersely and clearly, and I adopt his words when he says: “It is perfectly plain from the decisions of the House of Lords as well as of this Court that the onus is on the claimant to make out his case. He has to prove affirmatively that he brings himself within the Act. The Act of Parliament has thought fit to add to ‘in the course of his employment’ the words ‘arising out of the employment,’ showing that both these two things are necessary. I cannot see myself how it is possible to infer from the mere fact that a man disappears in the course of his employment—that is, in the course of the voyage on his ship if he is employed as a sailor,” or as here when the ship was in harbour—“without more, that he disappeared in consequence of an accident arising out of his employment.”

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustain the appeal: Answer the question of law therein stated in the negative: Therefore recall the award of the arbitrator, remit to him to dismiss the claim, and decern; find the appellants entitled to their expenses of the stated case, and remit,” &c.

A collector and canvasser, who had contracted pleurisy, claimed compensation from his employers, averring that in order to finish his work timeously one day he had to over-exert himself in climbing the stairs of a tenement; that he became "sweated" and contracted a chill which developed into pleurisy; and that he thus sustained an accident in the course of his employment. The arbitrator, without allowing a proof, dismissed the application as irrelevant, holding that the workman had failed to aver an "accident" within the meaning of the Act.

In an appeal, held that the arbitrator was right.

1st DIVISION. In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, between William M'Millan, canvasser, Glasgow, and the Singer Sewing Machine Company, Limited, Glasgow, the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire (Glegg) dismissed the application as irrelevant, and at the request of the applicant stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the applicant had made, inter alia, the following averments:—"1. The pursuer is a collector and canvasser, and resides at 44 Phoenix Park Terrace, off Garscube Road, Glasgow. The defenders are a limited liability company, and carry on business at 58 Bothwell Street, Glasgow. 2. The pursuer entered the defenders' employment as a collector and canvasser on or about the 15th day of February 1912, at a salary of 10s. per week and commission, made up of (1) 5 per cent on sums collected, and (2) 10 per cent on goods sold. The said salary of 10s. per week was increased to £1 per week in or about the middle of March 1912. 3. On or about Monday, the 6th day of May 1912, the pursuer was engaged in the ordinary course of his employment as canvasser and collector with defenders in canvassing and collecting accounts from defenders' customers in the Maryhill and Lambhill districts of Glasgow and neighbourhood thereof. The weather was quite dry all day. Pursuer was engaged up till about eight o'clock on the evening in question, when he found that it would be necessary for him to tax his energies to the utmost in order to enable him timeously to overcome the work before him, and the pursuer had to complete said work in the evening of said Monday, 6th May, as it was his duty and instruction to do so. 4. The last calls of the pursuer consisted of calls on a number of customers of defenders for the collection of accounts in three different tenements in Maryhill, viz.:—(1) Mrs Thomson, 173 Cumlodden Drive; (2) Mrs Gibbin, 7 Morrison Street; and (3) Mrs Crossan, 9 Morrison Street. The pursuer had called at said tenements earlier in the day, but none of said customers were at home, and accordingly, on the evening of said 6th May 1912, and about eight o'clock, the pursuer proceeded to call at the house of the said Mrs Thomson. The said Mrs Thomson resided in a flat in said tenement, three stairs up. While walking up said stairs the pursuer over-exerted himself and became sweated, with the result that he contracted a chill. He completed his other two calls on Mrs Gibbin and Mrs Crossan, but on arriving home he had to go immediately to bed. 5. As a result of having contracted said chill he was confined Dec. 7, 1912. to bed from 6th to 14th May 1912, on which latter date he was taken M'Millan v. Singer; suffering from pleurisy as a consequence of said chill, and he has since said 6th May been incapacitated from resuming his occupation. Sewing Machine Co., Limited.

6. Said chill contracted by the pursuer was an accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and arose out of and in the course of pursuer's employment as a collector and canvasser foreshaid with defenders."

The case further set forth:—"I heard parties' procurators on the relevancy of the appellant's averments, when I found that the appellant had failed to make a relevant statement that (1) there was an accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and (2) assuming there was an accident, said accident arose out of the appellant's employment. I therefore dismissed the application, and found the respondents entitled to expenses."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether on the facts contended on the arbitrator was right in dismissing the application as irrelevant?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 7th December 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The injury, viz., the chill and subsequent pleurisy, undoubtedly arose "out of" the applicant's employment. Further, it was an "accident," for the passage of a disease germ into the body could be an "accident"; it was "a physiological injury,"² and was strictly parallel to the "anthrax" and other cases.³ Provided the time, place, and circumstances in which the germ entered the body were sufficiently averred, such an injury was an "accident,"⁴ and the time, place, and circumstances were here specifically averred. [The LORD PRESIDENT referred to Blakey v. Robson, Eekford, & Company, Limited.⁵]

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I had occasion some time ago to complain—as I might almost say—of the way in which, by the use of decided cases, we are, so to speak, driven from point to point and made to arrive at a result very far distant from the point at which we started; and I confess that I think in this case we have a very flagrant example of that process. It is really almost painful to see to what a pitch of extravagance we are asked to go as the result of what—I must admit—seems to be quite reasonable argument upon the authorities.

Looking at this as a plain man, I think that nothing could be further

All that the claimant can say is that in the course of his ordinary work he got overheated—he got, as he puts it, sweated—and that, when he got home, he felt he had contracted a chill and afterwards found he was suffering from pleurisy.
